

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

LAWYERS' REPORTS,

ANNOTATED.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

LAKE SHORE & MICHIGAN SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appl.,

v.

Edward S. RICHARDS, Surviving Partner of Richards, Maynard & Company.

(182 ILL. 59.)

1. A statute making the judgment of the appellate court conclusive on all questions of fact does not violate the provisions of the Illinois Constitution authorizing appeals and writs of error to the supreme court in all criminal cases and cases in which a franchise or freehold or the validity of a statute is involved, and "in such other cases as may be provided by law."
2. A motion to direct a verdict for defendant is abandoned by proceeding to introduce evidence to sustain the defense after the motion is overruled, if it is not renewed.
3. A breach of contract which will justify the party not in default in abandoning performance and suing for damages on account of a breach by the other need not be of such a character as to render the further execution of the contract by him impossible, but if the other party refuses to treat it as subsisting and binding upon him, or by his act and conduct shows that he has renounced it and no longer considers himself bound by it, there is in legal effect a prevention of performance by the other party.

4. It can make no difference whether a contract has been partially performed or the time for performance has not yet arrived, in determining the right of one party to regard it as abandoned by the other.

5. Upon election to treat the renunciation of the contract by the other party, whether by declaration or by acts or conduct, as a breach of the contract, the rights of the parties are to be then regarded as culminating; and the contractual relation ceases to exist, except for the purpose of maintaining an action for the recovery of damages.

as the law of contract itself. Where the contract is entire,—indivisible,—the right is unquestioned. The undertakings on the one side, and on the other, are dependent, and performance by one party cannot be enforced by the other without performance, or a tender of performance, on his own part." Norrington v. Wright, 5 Fed. Rep. 768.

That language presents merely the case of immunity from liability on the part of the one who chooses to regard the contract as rescinded, because the other party is not in a position to enforce performance by reason of his own default. Such cases are the most simple and at the same time perhaps the most common in which the right of rescission is exercised. In addition to this class there are several well-marked classes of cases in which the aggrieved party has sought, not only to relieve himself from his contract obligation on account of the other party's default, but has in addition sought to make such default the ground for affirmative relief. Thus, there are cases in which the aggrieved party has sought to recover back what he had delivered under the contract or its value; in which he has sought damages for the breach; and in which he has claimed the right to perform no more on his part but to recover the profits which he would have made had he done so.

In the early cases the right to rescind because of nonperformance by the other party is made to depend upon whether the covenant of the party seeking to rescind was dependent upon performance of that of the other party or independent of it. The courts held that in case it was independent it must be performed whether that of the other party was or not. There was much curious and technical discussion as to what covenants were dependent and what were independent. But since in

It was said in one case that "the right to rescind a contract for nonperformance is a remedy as old as the law."

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover profits which plaintiff would have received from a contract with defendant which defendant was alleged to have wrongfully refused to carry out. Affirmed.

An opinion in this case was first handed down on October 31, 1892, and was delivered by BAILEY, Ch. J., in connection with which he made the following statement:

This was a suit in assumpsit, brought by Edward S. Richards, surviving partner of the firm of Richards, Maynard & Co., against the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Company, to recover damages for breaches of a contract, the material provisions of which will be stated presently. Prior to the execution of said contract, grain brought by western railroads to Chicago, and destined, either before or upon its arrival in that city, for transportation by rail to the east, was delivered by the western to the eastern railroads, and was by the latter weighed and transferred from western to eastern cars. At that time the transfer of such grain was accomplished by placing the loaded and empty cars side by side on parallel tracks, and by shoveling the grain from one car to the other by hand. The weighing was done on track scales, by first weighing the loaded car, and then weighing it after it was unloaded, the difference between such weights being the weight of the grain. This process was expensive, and the weights thus obtained, as the evidence tends to show, were, owing to a variety of causes, liable to be inaccurate. Richards, the plaintiff, was the inventor and patentee of a new process for weighing and transferring grain in bulk, which was claimed to be cheaper than the old method, and which furnished more accurate weights than could be had by the existing mode of weighing. By this process, the loaded cars of grain were run on to an elevated track in a transfer house, and empty cars were placed alongside of them on a lower track. The grain was then shoveled by steam shovels from the loaded cars into hoppers, where it was weighed, and then allowed to run by force of gravity into the empty cars below. Negotiations were thereupon entered into between Richards and the defendant company with a view to the adoption by the latter of this new mode of weighing and transferring grain, and these negotiations resulted in a written contract between the company, of the first part, and Richards, of the second part, bearing date January 2, 1884, which contract was afterwards assigned by Richards to the firm of Richards, Maynard & Co., consisting of Richards and John W. Maynard.

Said contract recited, by way of preamble, that one of its objects was to provide a cheaper method of transferring grain, mill feed, and seed from one car to another than the one employed by said company, and for that purpose to use the device of Richards, secured to him by letters patent, etc.; and that Richards intended to erect and build a grain transfer house on the land thereafter described, for those cases the question under discussion had reference to the proper form of pleading rather than to the right to rescind, and since the results of those decisions are fully shown by the cases directly discussing the right of rescission, such cases are omitted from this note, excepting where the question of rescission was directly discussed.

Dependent and independent covenants.

The question of dependent and independent covenants has been much discussed in reference to whether, in order to maintain an action for breach by the other party, plaintiff must allege that he has himself performed. Barruso v. Madan, 2 Johns. 145.

The result of this discussion is shown in decisions on the right to rescind, as will appear from the following cases:

The distinction is clearly settled between dependent and independent covenants or promises. In the first case the conveyance and payments are to be simultaneous acts, and there then must be an existing capacity in the one who is to convey to give a good title; in the other case, where the payments are to precede the conveyance, it is no excuse for nonpayment that there is not a present existing capacity to convey a good title, unless the one whose duty it is to pay, offers to do so on receiving a good title, and then it must be made to him or the contract may be rescinded. Robb v. Montgomery, 20 Johns. 15.

When concurrent acts are to be performed by the parties to a contract, the party seeking for damages for the nonperformance by the other party is required to aver only that he was ready and willing to perform on his part, and that defendant was requested to perform but refused or neglected to do so. Tinney v. Ashley, 15 Pick. 546, 25 Am. Dec. 620.

Where by the terms of a contract concurrent acts are to be performed, as a delivery of property by one party and a payment of the price by the other, if either party should refuse to perform on his part the other party will be at liberty to treat it as an abandonment of the contract and justify a rescission of it. Fletcher v. Cole, 23 Vt. 114.

When one party has departed from the terms of a special contract for the delivery of specific articles from each to the other, the other party may treat it as rescinded; and if by the terms of the contract concurrent acts are to be performed, as of the delivery of property by one person and the payment of price by the other, if either party should refuse to perform his part of the contract the other may treat the contract as abandoned and justify his rescission of it. Stahelin v. Sowle, 37 Mich. 124.

In Shirley v. Shirley, 7 Blackf. 452, the court holds that because the obligations of the contract were concurrent neither party could compel specific performance by the other until he had performed or offered to perform his part of the contract, and then adds, it follows that neither party had a right to rescind the contract without the consent of the other until on an offer to perform on his part the other party had refused.

In Iassink v. James, 107 Cal. 348, where the contract on the one side was to furnish grass and hay to feed cattle and on the other to furnish cattle to eat the hay and pay for what was used, suit was brought for refusal to furnish the cattle and pay for the hay, and defendant claimed that plaintiff had so failed to carry out his contract as to justify defendant in repudiating it and withdrawing from its provisions. The court says: "Of course such withdrawal could only be justified upon the principle that the covenants to be performed by the respective parties were entirely mutual and de-

the purpose of so handling, weighing, and transferring in bulk such grain, mill feed, and seed as might be delivered to him for that purpose by the company. The company then agreed in consideration of the nominal rental of $10 per year, and of the covenants in the contract to be kept and performed by Richards, to lease to him, for the term of ten years, certain land upon which to erect such transfer house and the necessary approaches thereto, and also agreed that as soon as such transfer house and approaches were constructed, it would build and maintain thereon and through such transfer house such track or tracks as might be necessary to transact the business contemplated by said agreement, and do all switching of loaded and empty cars to and from said transfer house at its own expense, and without cost to Richards, provided that the actual cost thereof should be taken into account in determining the fair amount to be paid Richards, as provided in the following covenant: "Third. Said first party further covenants and agrees that, in case there shall be any saving to it in switching, weighing, and transferring of products in this agreement referred to through the methods and devices adopted by said second party, over and above the actual cost of doing the same work under the ways and methods now in use by said first party, then, and in that event, it will pay to second party one half of said saving, the just and actual amount thereof to be ascertained and determined as provided in covenant 'first,' of 'Mutual Covenants,' said amounts, if found due, to be paid to said second party on or before the middle of each month for the month preceding."

pendent upon each other." But the court held that there was no need of discussing the question of dependence of the covenants because there was no such breach as justified the other in withdrawing.

If the covenants are mutually dependent one party cannot recover without averring performance or an offer to perform on his part. Kane v. Hood, 13 Pick. 281.

In Robson v. Bohn, 27 Minn. 333, where lumber was to be delivered by one to the other of the contracting parties, and the latter was to make certain payments during the time the contract continued, the court held that the covenants to pay and to deliver were dependent, and that a refusal to make a payment when it was due justified the other party in treating the contract as abandoned and suing for what he had delivered.

Where it was sought to justify the neglect to pay insurance premiums because of default on the part of the company, the court says failure of one party to a contract to perform some of its obligations when it consists of a number of independent provisions furnishes no excuse for nonperformance by the other party. It is only when the non-performance is a condition precedent, or where such party has wholly refused to perform or has wholly disabled himself from completing a substantial performance, that the other party is relieved from performance or a tender thereof. Boyardus v. New York L. Ins. Co. 101 N. Y. 335.

It will be noticed that the language and decision in each case must be limited to the class to which it belongs. For example, a decision that if the covenants are dependent one party cannot recover without averring performance or an offer to perform on his part, is applicable to a case where the rescinding party is sued for a breach and is

Richards, on his part, agreed at his own cost and expense to construct and maintain, for the full period of ten years, on said land, a transfer house and approaches, suitable and proper for carrying out the purpose in said contract expressed, and furnish and supply said house with hopper scales and every other device necessary to properly weigh and transfer said grain, etc. He also covenanted as follows: "Second. That he will receive, weigh, and transfer all products contemplated by this agreement which may be delivered to said transfer house by or under the direction of said first party with promptness and despatch, and within such time as to prevent any accumulation of cars or freight, whereby shippers might have just ground of complaint; and, if said second party shall fail to transfer as fast as required, the said first party may transfer by such other method as it deems proper, and said second party shall do all said work in transfer house at his own cost and expense, without cost to said first party; provided, that the actual cost of doing said work shall be taken into account in determining the saving, if any, between the Richards method of transferring grain and the methods in use by the first party at the date of this agreement, and also for the purpose of determining the just amount to be paid to said second party, as provided in covenant 'third' of first party; provided, also, that the cost of weighing such products shall not be considered in determining the actual cost of such transfer."

Said contract then contained various paragraphs denominated "Mutual Covenants," the first of which provided the mode for ascertain-protected because the other party is in no position to maintain a suit. On the other hand, if the rescinding party is suing for what he has delivered under the contract, or for a breach, his action is founded on a claim that he has been released from performance by the other party's breach. A course of reasoning such as ruled the other case would defeat this. Therefore it becomes impossible to decide such case on the principles governing the other class, but it becomes necessary to ascertain what affirmative rights the other party's default has given him. The latter class of cases is the stronger, but the distinction between the two classes is not always maintained, and the same authorities are frequently cited in both classes.

Promise for promise.

Cases in which a promise was made in consideration of a promise were not regarded as capable of rescission because of the other party's nonperformance.

In case of a promise in consideration of a promise performance by plaintiff need not be alleged to sustain the action. Bettisworth v. Campion, Yelv. 124.

In Gower v. Capper, Cro. Eliz. 543, the declaration alleged that the defendant was indebted to plaintiff by bill in £20, and defendant, in consideration that plaintiff assumed unto him to deliver him the said bill, assumed to procure two sufficient sureties to be bound for the payment of the money, and alleged that the bill was delivered, but the sureties found were worthless, and defendant pleaded that the bill was not delivered, but the court held the allegation as to delivery of the bill was mere surplusage, for the consideration was the promise to deliver.

Where defendant promises to do certain work "in ing and determining the cost of transferring grain, etc., by the new method, and the amount of money thereby saved. The only other provisions of the contract material to the present controversy are the 3d, 4th, and 6th of said "Mutual Covenants," which are as follows: "3d. And it is mutually covenanted and agreed that all shipments originating at points west of Chicago, and properly billed through to eastern points, and requiring transfer through said house, shall be classed 'through shipments,' and be transferred in the same manner as re-consigned property, and upon the same basis of cost to said first party; it being specially understood and agreed that under no circumstances is said first party to be charged for any weights upon any transfers made through this house, but nothing in this agreement contained shall be so construed as to prevent said second party from charging such fees as may be agreed upon between him and the owner of the property delivered for weights and transfer and for such other service as he may render in connection therewith, and from collecting his charges as provided in following mutual agreement. "4th. It is further mutually understood and agreed that said second party is to receive his compensation for his time, labor, and investments employed in building, operating, and maintaining said transfer house entirely from the weighing of property passing through it, and from the owners thereof, and not from said first party, except as provided in covenant 8 of said first party; and said first party shall not make use of the weights obtained from said second party in the conduct of its business for any other purpose than billing property to destination, but, upon the request of said second party, said first party will collect such weighing charges as he may show are due to him, in the same manner as other advanced charges are collected, and pay the amount so collected to said second party on or before the middle of each and every month. . . . 6. If at any time differences should arise between the said parties thereto as to its spirit, meaning, or execution, such differences shall be settled by a reference of all matters in dispute to three disinterested arbitrators, each of the parties hereto to select one, and the two so chosen to select a third, and the decision of any two of the court so formed shall be binding between the parties hereto, final, and without appeal."

The declaration, after setting forth said contract in hæc verba, alleges that on the 23d of January, 1884, the plaintiff assigned all his interest in said contract to the firm of Richards, Maynard & Co., and that said assignment was ratified and confirmed by the defendant; that said firm thereupon erected on the land described in the contract a grain transfer house and hopper scales, and all machinery pertaining thereto, the same being completed June 24, 1884, when said firm entered upon the business of transferring grain, etc., from car to car, and weighing the same, as provided for in the agreement; that said firm could not conveniently transfer mill feed through their transfer house, and that the right to have such transfer of mill feed and the weighing thereof was waived by the defendant; that said firm continued to transfer and weigh all such grain and seed as were presented to them by the defendant at their transfer house to be transferred and consideration of the promise made by defendant." He cannot claim that the payment of the first instalment of the contract price as arranged in the contract is a condition precedent, failure to perform which will entitle him to abandon performance of the contract. Campbell v. McLeod, 24 N. E. 68.

If there is a promise to transfer stock in consideration of the promise to pay for it, the transfer is not a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action on the promise to pay. Blackwell v. Nash, 18 Strange, 585.

Cases omitted.

Certain classes of cases, which might apparently be within the subject, will be omitted from this note because they form distinct classes by themselves and are governed by rules which would throw little or no light upon the questions here discussed. Of these are cases turning upon the construction of the particular contract, including those where the party against whom the rescission was claimed has been held to be not in default; cases where the contract itself provided for rescission, where rescission is not allowed because of the conduct of the party attempting it, and where performance has been expressly forbidden; also equitable actions for rescission as well as attempts to reclaim property for failure to pay and to return goods because they did not correspond with sample or warranty.

Attention is particularly called, however, to the fact that a party having otherwise a good right to rescind may have estopped himself or waived his right.

Thus, when an executory contract for the sale of chattels provides that title shall not pass until the agreed price is fully paid, which is payable in—instalments, and the vendor permits the vendee to retain possession and make other payments after the whole contract price is due, he cannot seize the property and terminate the contract for nonpayment until he has demanded payment of the vendee. O'Rourke v. Hadcock, 114 N. Y. 541.

II. Condition precedent.

a. How far is right to rescind controlled by question of condition precedent.

Closely allied with the doctrine of dependent and independent covenants was that of conditions precedent. And the courts seem to have reached the conclusion that to justify a rescission by one party for default of the other the duty of performance on his part must not only be dependent upon performance by the latter but the unperformed part of the latter's covenant must be so material that in case of its nonperformance the party seeking to rescind would receive practically no benefit from the contract.

Boone v. Eyre, 1 H. Bl. 273, note, was an action of covenant on a deed whereby a plantation together with a stock of negroes was conveyed by plaintiff in consideration of the payment of a certain amount in hand and an annuity for life. The breach assigned was the nonpayment of the annuity and there was a plea that the plaintiff did not have the title to the negroes and so was not entitled to convey. Lord Mansfield said: "The distinction is very clear. Where mutual covenants go to the whole of the consideration on both sides they are mutual conditions the one precedent to the other, but where they go only to a part, where the breach may be paid for in damages, there defendant has a remedy on the covenant and should not plead it as a condition precedent."

But the same result has in later times been weighed until June 16, 1886, and kept and performed the contract on their part, yet the defendant, although often requested so to do, has not kept and performed said contract on its part; that on June 16, 1886, the defendant abandoned said contract, and neglected and refused to perform it, and, without reasonable or just cause, refused to be bound thereby; that after the abandonment of said contract by the defendant, and its refusal to perform the same, to wit, in December, 1887, said Maynard died; that said firm and the plaintiff have always been ready and willing and have offered the defendant to continue in the service and employment of the defendant in weighing and transferring grain and seed as provided by said contract; that the weight so obtained by said firm in weighing and transferring grain and seed were of the value of $1.40 per car, and that the number of cars annually transferred on the track to the cars of the defendant company amounted to 18,000; that, to wit, 18,000 cars of grain and seed per annum will continue to be transferred on said track to the cars of the defendant company; that the saving to the defendant in the switching, weighing, and transfer of grain and seed by the plaintiff's method is $5,000 per annum; that the plaintiff's firm was obliged to and did lay out and expend in building and equipping their transfer house a large sum of money, and that said transfer house is valuable only for the purposes contemplated by said agreement, and that in consequence of the refusal of the defendant to be bound by the terms of said contract, said transfer house has become of no value, whereby the plaintiff has suffered damage in the sum of $25,000; that there is due to the plaintiff from the defendant, on account of such nonperformance of said contract by it, a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of $300,000, being the amount of damage to and amount due the plaintiff by reason of the breach of said contract, from the date the defendant wrongfully refused to perform said contract on its part. By an amendment to said count the plaintiff claimed special damages for loss of profits which said firm, or the plaintiff, as survivor, would have received from the various shippers of grain but for said breach of contract, and alleged that said firm, or the plaintiff, as its representative, had a contract with the receivers and shippers of grain and seed at Chicago, for the purchase by them of the weights of grain and seed which said firm, or the plaintiff, as survivor, obtained or would have obtained in transferring grain and seed from the cars of western railroads having their terminus at Chicago to the cars of the defendant company; that but for said breach of said contract, said firm, or the plaintiff, as survivor, would have received 70 cents per car from such receivers and shippers of grain and seed at Chicago for the weights of 15,000 cars of grain and seed per year for eight years,—the unexpired term of said contract.

The defendant pleaded non-assumpsit, and also a special plea, alleging, in substance, that at the July term, 1886, of the superior court of Cook county, the plaintiff and said Maynard exhibited their bill in chancery against the defendant in said court for the nonperformance of the same identical promises and undertaking, in the declaration mentioned; that at the March term, 1887, of said court the defendant reached by denying the right of rescission to one who retains a substantial benefit under the contract (see infra, III. c.) and the question of condition precedent is now of little importance further than is shown, infra, II. c.

In fact, in Bradford v. Williams, L. R. 7 Exch. 232, Martin, B., said: "I think the words 'condition precedent' unfortunate. The real question, apart from all technical expressions, is, What in each instance is the substance of the contract?"

Therefore, such cases as Pordage v. Cole, 1 Wm. Sand. 319, in which it was held that in case of independent covenants in a contract, the performance of one was not a condition precedent to the enforcement of the other, and hence that performance was not a necessary allegation in an action to enforce the other, and the cases cited by Sergeant William's note thereto, upon the question of what covenants are dependent and what independent have very little bearing on the question, and rather tend to confuse than to throw light upon it.

b. Charter party.

This question of condition precedent as bearing upon the right to rescind, has been more discussed in cases involving charter parties than elsewhere, and those cases are therefore collected in this place.

In Freeman v. Taylor, 8 Bing. 124, a ship owner undertook to take a cargo to the Cape and then proceed with all convenient speed to Bombay and there put on a cargo of cotton for England, and upon arrival at the Cape he took a cargo on his own account to Mauritius, because of which he arrived at Bombay six weeks late, whereupon the cargo of cotton was refused him. In a suit for the breach it was argued that "defendant's remedy for the alleged deviation was by cross action, and that," 30 L. R. A.

he was not at liberty at his own discretion to put an end to the contract between him and plaintiff. The engagement to sail from the Cape with all reasonable speed was not a condition precedent but an independent covenant, for a breach of which defendant might be entitled to sue; it did not go to the whole consideration of defendant's contract. Unless it went to the whole consideration it was not a condition precedent the neglect of which would entitle the defendant to determine the contract." But the court left it to the jury to determine whether the deviation was of such a nature and description as to deprive the freighter of the benefit of the contract into which he had entered with the instruction that if such was their opinion, defendant was excused from furnishing a cargo.

In MacAndrew v. Chapple, L. R. 1 C. P. 648, 13 Jur. N. S. 55, 14 L. T. N. S. 554, 14 Week. Rep. 591, where the freighter refused to load the vessel under the charter party because of an alleged deviation, the court says the case turns on the construction of the charter party and that a charter party may contain either a stipulation or a condition precedent, and the question whether any provision in the contract is one or the other is a matter of construction and depends on the judgment which the court may form of the intention of the parties.

Failure to proceed with a ship directly to the port where the cargo is to be taken on will not exonerate the shipper from performing his part of the contract and furnishing the cargo, unless it is shown that the delay has precluded him from making any use of the vessel. Cliphams v. Vertue, Dav. & M. 343, 5 Q. B. 265, 18 L. J. Q. B. 2, 8 Jur. 32.

In Ollive v. Booker, 1 Exch. 416, 17 L. J. Exch. 21, where a charter party stated that the vessel had been at sea three weeks, which was false, the court was decreed to be indebted to said complainants for such nonperformance of said promises and undertakings; that said cause was referred to a master in chancery for an accounting, to ascertain the amount of such indebtedness; that the master found that the defendant was indebted to said complainants in the sum of $9,686.68 damages; that the court confirmed such finding, and entered a decree ordering the defendant to pay the complainants that sum and costs; that while an appeal to the appellate court from said decree was pending, Maynard died; that said appeal, being prosecuted against the present plaintiff as survivor, was afterwards affirmed by the appellate court, and that thereupon the defendant paid and satisfied the same. To said special plea the plaintiff replied that the cause of action set out in the declaration was not for the nonperformance of the same promises and undertakings in said plea mentioned, and for which said decree was rendered, but for the nonperformance of other and different promises and undertakings from the defendant to the plaintiff. At the trial, which was had before the court and a jury, evidence was offered by the plaintiff tending to sustain the cause of action alleged in his declaration, and the jury thereupon returned their verdict finding the issues for the plaintiff, and assessing his damages at $75,000. For this sum and costs the court, after denying the defendant's motion for a new trial, gave judgment for the plaintiff. On appeal to the appellate court said judgment was affirmed (40 Ill. App. 560), and this appeal is from said judgment of affirmance.

held that it was a warranty and not a representation and that therefore it was a condition precedent, and being a condition precedent and not performed, the defendant was not bound to load the vessel. And this rule was followed in Oliver v. Fielden, 4 Exch. 133, 13 L. J. Exch. 353.

Stipulations in a charter party that the vessel shall sail with all convenient speed are not conditions precedent, unless by a breach of the same the object of the voyage is wholly frustrated. Tarra-bochia v. Hickie, 1 Hurlst. & N. 123, 26 L. J. Exch. 26.

Under a charter party providing that the vessel shall sail with all convenient speed, the failure to comply with the stipulation entitles the other party only to a cross action whenever the consequence of the failure has been only partially injurious and has left the main object of the contract still attainable. Dimech v. Corlett, 12 Moore, P. C. C. 199.

In Glabholm v. Hays, 2 Mann. & G. 266, 2 Scott, N. R. 471, in which defendant was sued for repudiating a charter party because the voyage was not begun on the day named, the whole case was made to turn upon whether that stipulation was a condition precedent or not, the court saying, whether a particular clause in a charter party should be held to be a condition upon the nonperformance of which by the one party the other is at liberty to abandon the contract and consider it at an end, or whether it amounts to an agreement only, the breach whereof is to be recompensed by an action for damages, must depend upon the intention of the parties, to be collected from the terms of the agreement and from the subject-matter to which it relates. And in that case the stipulation was held to be a condition precedent.

In Storer v. Gordon, 8 Maule & S. 303, where a ship owner was to take a cargo to a certain place 30 L. R. A.

After that opinion was filed a petition for rehearing was granted and the rehearing resulted in a departure from the rulings of the former opinion and that opinion is therefore omitted, the rehearing opinion being substituted for it.

Mr. John N. Jewett, for appellant:

To justify one party to a contract in suspending its execution and at the same time entitle him to sue for and recover as damages the future profits which might have been realized by its complete execution, the other party must have been guilty of a breach, such as in effect prevented, or absolutely put an end to, the further execution of the contract by the complaining party.

There are two classes of cases which may arise between parties to an executory contract. The first consists of those cases which justify one of the parties in rescinding the contract by reason of some failure or default of the other party. In all such cases, the party availing himself of the breach or default puts an end to the contract absolutely, and is entitled to recover only the value of the service rendered up to the time of the rescission. The second class consists of those cases where one of the parties commits what is denominated a total breach, preventing the other from executing the contract on his part. In such cases the party prevented from executing the contract on his part may sue for and recover as damages the profits he would have made if he had been permitted to execute the contract.

Masterton v. Brooklyn, 7 Hill, 61, 43 Am.

and there deliver it and take on another one for the return voyage. It was held that the delivery was not a condition precedent to the obligation to furnish a return cargo, but that the fact that the outward cargo was seized by the government did not give the freighter the right to refuse to furnish the return cargo.

In Davison v. Von Lingen, 113 U. S. 40, 28 L. ed. 885, it was held that a stipulation in a charter party as to the position of the vessel was a condition precedent. "It is a substantive part of the contract, and not a mere representation, and is not an independent agreement, serving only as a foundation for compensation in damages. A breach of it by one party justifies a repudiation of the contract by the other party, if it has not been partially executed in his favor."

A distinction has been made which may perhaps be valid where the stipulation was that the ship should sail by a specified date.

A stipulation in a charter party that the vessel shall sail from a certain port before a specified date is a condition precedent, and unless she does so the charterer cannot be compelled to load her. Crookewit v. Fletcher, 1 Hurlst. & N. 383.

And a distinction must be made between the above cases and those in which liability for freight is sought to be evaded, although all or most of the benefits of the voyage have been received.

In Havelock v. Geddes, 10 East, 555, and Cliphsham v. Vertue, 5 Q. B. 265, Dav. & M. 343, 13 L. J. Q. B. 2, 8 Jur. 32, the defendant did not seek to rescind or abandon the contract, but to refuse payment under a charter party after he had received the benefit of it, because the vessel was not made staunch as the charter party required, but the court held that after he had received the benefit of the contract he could not insist that making the vessel staunch was a condition precedent.

Dec. 88; United States v. Speed, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 77, 19 L. ed. 449; United States v. Behan, 110 U. S. 388, 28 L. ed. 168; Hinckley v. Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Co. 121 U. S. 164, 80 L. ed. 967.

The acts and omissions of the appellant, complained of, were the result of a disagreement between the parties in respect to the mere incidents of the contract, and did not touch, even, the substance of its provisions or of its execution.

Even if the matter involved in the disputes of the parties were of substance in the execution of the contract, and the refusal of the appellant to comply with the demands of the appellee could be treated as a breach justifying a rescission of the contract by the appellee, still the refusal was not so treated, nor was the refusal or any of the matters of disagreement acted upon by the appellee as a total breach on the part of the appellant, either promptly or within reasonable time.

The settled law of this state is against the verdict and judgment appealed from.

No mere money demand, although not responded to, growing out of a contract, can do more than lay the foundation for an action for the recovery of the money, or a rescission of the contract, unless the contract itself provides for further consequences.

Palm v. Ohio & M. R. Co., Christian County v. Overholt, and Selby v. Hutchinson, supra; Chapin v. Norton, 6 McLean, 500; Dobbins v. Higgins, 78 Ill. 440; Chicago v. Sexton, 115 Ill. 230.

A partial breach of a contract by one party, which may be compensated for in damages, does not justify an abandonment of execution by the other party.

Keenan v. Brown, 21 Vt. 86; Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 29 L. ed. 366.

Richards, Maynard & Company availed themselves of all the advantages of their contract for a long time after the acts complained of as breaches on the part of the railway company were known to them.

Prompt action is required in order to justify even an act of rescission. And what is reasonable time is a question of law to be determined by the court.

An agreement to arbitrate creates no binding obligation. It is revocable by either of the parties to it at any time before award actually made and published.

Where a charter party requires the owner of a vessel to go to a certain port and get a complete cargo and deliver it in London after a partial cargo has been delivered and accepted, the delivery of a complete cargo cannot be set up as a condition precedent to recovery of freight. Ritchie v. Atkinson, 10 East, 226.

In case of a condition precedent the plaintiff must have performed before he can maintain an action to enforce the liability of the other party. In Bornmann v. Tooke, 1 Campb. 377, the contract was a charter party by which the ship owner undertook to sail by the first wind direct to the point of destination, and the shipper refused to pay freight because he did not do so, but the court held that such covenant was not a condition precedent which would exonerate the shipper from paying freight after he had received the cargo, saying that his only remedy was on his covenant; and in a note it is stated that where mutual covenants go only to part of the consideration on both sides, and a breach may be paid in damages, defendant, having a remedy on his covenant, should not plead it as a condition precedent.

If under a charter party the freighter refuses to load as agreed in the contract, the owner of the vessel has a right to regard the contract as abandoned without liability for a breach. Bradford v. Williams, L. R. 7 Exch. 253.

c. Party excused by nonperformance of condition precedent.

Of course if the contract provides a condition precedent the failure to perform it will exonerate the other party.

A party cannot be held in damages for failure to perform a contract a condition precedent to the performance of which plaintiff has not performed. Goff v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co. 9 Wash. 383.

When the obligation of performance by one party presupposes the doing of some act by the other prior thereto, the neglect or refusal to perform such act not only dispenses with the obligation of performance by the other, but also entitles him to rescind, or, when rescission will not afford him an adequate remedy, to continue the work and recover such damages as the delinquency has occasioned against the defaulting party. Mausfeld v. New York C. & H. R. Co. 102 N. Y. 205.

A party seeking damages for breach of contract is not bound to prove performance on his part when the other party failed in something which was a necessary condition precedent to his own performance. Aller v. Pennell, 51 Iowa, 537.

If parties contract to exchange lands, each to exhibit to the other abstracts showing a good title by a day named, this is a condition precedent before either party can call upon the other to perform, and if either fails the other may regard the contract as at an end. Howe v. Hutcheon, 106 Ill. 501.

If a contract of sale requires the vendee to give security as a condition precedent, the vendor may rescind the contract upon his failure to perform in this respect. Harrison Mach. Works v. Miller, 23 Ill. App. 571.

If two persons agree with a third to furnish supplies to the latter as the same shall be required for discovering and locating lodes for the benefit of all, the latter may treat this as a condition precedent, and upon failure to furnish the supplies he may abandon the enterprise or proceed to discover and locate lodes in his own right without regard to the contract. Murley v. Ennis, 2 Colo. 300.

Where the contract provides that lumber should be delivered at a place to be designated by the other party, the designation of the place is a condition precedent to the delivery, and if there is a

The elemental conditions of the present case have been the subject of a prior adjudication conclusive upon the parties, and which bars the appellee from any recovery in this proceeding.

Mr. James I. Best, with Mr. Pliny B. Smith, also for appellant:

A refusal to arbitrate did not authorize plaintiffs to abandon their contract, and recover unearned profits as upon a total breach.

Tobey v. Bristol County, 3 Story, C. C. 800; King v. Howard, 27 Mo. 22.

A party who abandons his contract cannot maintain any action upon it.

Since the appellee alleged that Richards, Maynard & Company performed the contract until the 16th day of June, 1886, and were then ready and willing to proceed with its performance, but that the appellee refused to carry out the contract on its own part and abandoned its performance, he must prove such breach as alleged.

The appellant did not undertake to pay for the building, and the appellee cannot thus make it do it.

Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Jacksonville Depot Bldg. Co. 68 Ill. 808.

The mere failure to pay money, though it is conceded to be due, will not, as a rule, authorize a party to abandon his contract and bring an action for future profits.

Palm v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 18 Ill. 217.

Mr. William A. Gardner, for appellee: When there is a contract which is to be performed in the future, if one of the parties has said in effect to the other: "If you go on and perform your part of the contract I will not perform mine," that, in effect, amounts to saying, "I will not perform the contract." In that case the other party may say: "You have given me distinct notice that you will not perform the contract. I will not wait till you have broken it, but I will treat you as having put an end to the contract, and if necessary I will sue you for damages, but at all events I will not go on with the contract."

The breaches that occurred in the case at bar, as far as their effect is concerned, would be the same in principle as where a person "willfully places the property of another in a situation where it cannot be recovered, or its true refusal to designate the other party is absolved from all liability on the contract, although at the time he does not own lumber which could be tendered under it. Warner v. Wilson, 4 Cal. 310.

Where there is a mutual contract for the performance of successive acts, the refusal upon one side to perform will justify the other party in treating the contract as rescinded. Ward v. Kadel, 38 Ark. 174.

Where one party to a contract refuses to do something which is necessary to enable the other to perform his part of the contract, the latter may abandon the contract and recover his damages from the other, and is not liable for his own failure to perform. Chapin v. Norton, 6 McLean, 500.

The nonperformance by the vendor of a condition precedent gives the vendee the right to repudiate the whole contract,—as where the sale is of a certain quantity of iron to be shipped from Glasgow and the iron is actually shipped from Leith. Filley v. Pope, 115 U. S. 213, 29 L. ed. 272.

If a stipulation in a contract is a condition precedent, the obligee may repudiate the contract, if the obligor does not perform the condition. Lowber v. Bangs, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 723, 17 L. ed. 768.

In Bertini v. Gye, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 133, 45 L. J. Q. B. 209, 34 L. T. N. S. 246, 24 Week. Rep. 551, in which the director of an opera claimed the right to refuse to carry out the engagement with a singer because of the latter's neglect to comply with his contract to attend rehearsals six days before the opening of the season, the court says: "If parties sufficiently express an intention to make the literal fulfillment of a matter of apparently very little importance a condition precedent it will be one; or if they think the performance of some matter apparently of essential importance not really vital, and sufficiently express such intent, it will not be a condition precedent;" and the court decides that in that case the attendance of rehearsals did not go to the root of the matter, and was not a condition precedent a breach of which gave the other party a right to rescind.

d. Excuse for not performing condition precedent.

No excuse will exonerate one from the performance of a condition precedent unless it be a positive interference and actual hindrance by the other party, or some distinct and tangible fraud. Taylor v. Gallup, 8 Vt. 240.

But a person may maintain an action for breach of the contract, without performing a condition precedent, if he were prevented from performing it by a breach on the part of the other party. Jewell v. Blandford, 7 Dana, 472.

III. Right to rescind contract without liability for nonperformance.

a. Necessity of mutual consent.

On principle one party can no more rescind a contract than he can make it. But in practice if one party refuses to perform he is regarded as consenting to a rescission so that upon the other party's acting on such consent the contract is at an end.

Where one party is in default and the other not, the party not in default may in most cases, though not in all, treat the contract as rescinded, and act accordingly; but this is a mode of rescission by consent. Cromwell v. Wilkinson, 18 Ind. 365.

One party may, by neglecting or refusing to perform the contract on his part, place it in the power of the other party, where he is not also derelict, to avoid it or not at his pleasure. The breach of one party may in such case be treated by the other as an abandonment of the contract authorizing him, if he chooses to do so, to disaffirm it; and thus the assent of both parties to the contract is sufficiently manifested,—that of the one by his neglect or re-value ascertained, by mixing it with his own, or in any other manner will consequently be compelled to bear the inconvenience of the uncertainty or confusion which he has produced, even to the extent of surrendering the whole, if his share cannot be distinguished, or responding in damages at the highest value at which the property in question can be reasonably estimated."

Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 637, note.

Absolute refusal is to be considered in the same light as respects the remedy, as an absolute physical prevention by the defendants.

Hosmer v. Wilson, 7 Mich. 304, 74 Am. Dec. 716; Cort v. Ambergats R. Co. 17 Q. B. 127; Derby v. Johnson, 31 Vt. 21; Haines v. Tucker, 50 N. H. 311; Smith v. Lewis, 24 Conn. 624, 63 Am. Dec. 190; Clement & Hawkes Mfg. Co. v. Meserole, 107 Mass. 362; Collins v. Delaportie, 115 Mass. 162.

The true question is whether the acts and conduct of the party evince an intention no longer to be bound by the contract.

One of the parties to a contract cannot, by himself, rescind, but if his acts amounted to a rescission had he the power to rescind, can it be doubted that the other party would have a right to sue for damages if necessary?

Johnstone v. Milling, L. R. 16 Q. B. Div. 460; Dingley v. Oler, 117 U.S. 508, 29 L. ed. 984.

An absolute refusal to accept goods ordered, although the goods were not in readiness for delivery, should be considered in the same light, as respects the remedy, as an absolute physical prevention by defendants, and the plaintiff might bring his action in such a case before completing the goods ordered and tendering performance on his part.

Hosmer v. Wilson, Derby v. Johnson, Haines v. Tucker, Smith v. Lewis, Clement & Hawkes Mfg. Co. v. Meserole, and Collins v. Delaportie, supra.

Mr. A. M. Pence also for appellee.

Shope, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is insisted in this court that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict and judgment. The right and duty of this court to review the facts are placed upon two grounds: First, that under section 2, article 6, of the Constitution which provides: "The supreme court shall consist of seven judges, and shall have original jurisdiction in cases relating to the revenue, in mandamus and habeas corpus, and appellate jurisdiction in all other cases,"—the provision of section 90 of the practice act, restricting the powers of this court to the consideration of questions of law only, and prohibiting the assignment of errors calling in question the judgment of the appellate courts upon questions of fact, is unconstitutional and void. We have so frequently held the act valid that it would seem to be no longer an open question. But, if it was, the correctness of former holdings in this regard is clearly authorized by the provisions of section 11 of the same article of the Constitution. It is there provided that after the year 1874 inferior appellate courts, refuse to perform his part of the contract, and of the other by his suing, not for the breach, but the value of any act done or payment made by him under the contract, as if it had never existed. Bannister v. Read, 3 Ill. 62.

The refusal of one party to perform his contract amounts on his part to an abandonment of it. The other party thereupon has a choice of remedies. He may stand upon his contract, refusing assent to an adversary's attempt to rescind it, and sue for a breach or in a proper case for a specific performance, or he may assent to its abandonment and so effect a dissolution of the contract by the mutual and concurring assent of both parties: in that event he is simply restored to his original position, and can neither sue for a breach nor compel a specific performance, because the contract itself has been dissolved. Graves v. White, 37 N. Y. 463.

Where, after a note had been given for goods which were delivered to the maker, the seller forcibly retook possession of them, whereupon the maker of the note refused to pay it on the ground of failure of consideration, the court said: There is no total failure of consideration here, "unless the contract has been dissolved. It could be dissolved by mutual consent only. The retaking possession is a mere act of trespass which would give a right of action, but it did not give the maker of the note a right to treat it as a rescission or as a dissolution of the contract." Stephens v. Wilkinson, 2 Barn. & Ad. 320.

It is an established rule of law that where one of the contracting parties absolutely refuses to perform, such a refusal will be regarded as a consent on his part to a rescission of the contract, and the other contracting party may, if he chooses so to do, rescind the contract, and if he has done anything under it he may immediately sue for compensation on a quantum meruit. Shaffner v. Killian, 7 Ill. App. 620.

Where the question is whether one party is set free by the action of the other, the real matter for consideration is whether the acts or conduct of the one do or do not amount to an intimation of an intention to abandon and altogether refuse performance of the contract. Freeth v. Burr, L. R. 9 C. P. 208, 43 L. J. C. P. 91, 29 L. T. N. S. 773, 22 Week. Rep. 370.

More nonperformance is not rescission.

A rescission of a contract does not follow as a consequence of a nonperformance by either party. Duncan v. Jeter, 5 Ala. 604, 39 Am. Dec. 342; Stone v. Grover, 1 Ala. 239.

Renunciation must be acted on.

In Avery v. Bowden, 5 El. & Bl. 714, where the performance of the contract was prevented by the breaking out of war before the expiration of the time for performance, the plaintiff relied upon a renunciation before that, but the court held that such renunciation could not give a cause of action while the plaintiff was still insisting upon the performance of the contract. This case was affirmed in 5 El. & Bl. 938. And a similar ruling was made in Reid v. Hoskins, 5 El. & Bl. 720.

b. Contract may be rescinded.

When a contract is executory on both sides, upon nonperformance by one party the other may declare it rescinded. School Dist. v. Hayne, 46 Wis. 511.

The failure of one of the parties to fulfil the agreement authorizes the other party to refuse to perform without liability for a breach. Carney v. Newberry, 24 Ill. 203; Graham v. Holloway, 44 Ill. 385.

of uniform organization and jurisdiction, may be created by the legislature, to which such appeals and writs of error as the general assembly shall provide may be prosecuted, "and from which appeals and writs of error shall lie to the supreme court in all criminal cases, in cases in which a franchise or freehold or the validity of a statute is involved, and in such other cases as may be provided by law." Under this provision the legislature was authorized to vest such courts with appellate jurisdiction in all such cases as, in the legislative discretion, were deemed proper. In four classes of cases—that is, criminal cases, and those involving a franchise or freehold or the validity of a statute—the legislature is prohibited from making the determination of such appellate courts final. In such cases appeals and writs of error must be allowed to the supreme court. In all other cases in which such courts are given jurisdiction by statute it is left, by the Constitution, discretionary with the legislature to make the judgments of those courts final, or to provide for further appeal or writ of error, as in the legislative discretion shall be deemed proper. It necessarily follows that, since the creation and organization of the appellate courts, the jurisdiction of this court to review the final judgments of those courts, except in the four classes of cases enumerated in the Constitution, is subject to the restrictions created by the legislature; and it follows that we are precluded from the consideration of any assignment of error questioning the determination of the appellate court upon questions of fact.

At the close of plaintiff's evidence in chief, the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury to return a verdict in its favor, upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to maintain the cause of action set forth in the declaration, which was overruled. The motion was in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence, and, if defendant desired to avail itself thereof, it should have abided by it. Instead of doing this, it introduced evidence in its behalf, and submitted the cause to the jury without renewing its motion, thereby waiving the error, if error there was, in the decision of the court. Joliet, A. & N. R. Co. v. Velie, 140 Ill. 59.

The defendant, however, by its instructions 1, 2, and 8, refused by the court, sought to raise the same question. By these instructions the court was asked to instruct the jury: first, the evidence was not sufficient to sustain a verdict for plaintiff; second, there was a variance between the proof and cause of action stated in the declaration; and, third, that the evidence did not show an abandonment of the contract by the defendant, and the verdict should therefore be for the defendant. Instructions taking the case from the jury should only be given where the evidence, with all the legitimate and natural inferences to be drawn therefrom, is wholly insufficient, if credited, to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff. Simmons v. Chicago & T. R. Co. 110 Ill. 346; Purdy v. Hall, 134 Ill. 298; Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Laack, 143 Ill. 242, 18 L. R. A. 215, and cases cited. Where there is evidence tending to sustain the issues in behalf of the plaintiff, the weight to be given thereto must be submitted to the jury; and, when their finding of fact

If a man contracts to pay a certain sum of money in consideration that another has contracted to do certain things on his part, and it should turn out, before anything is done under it, that the latter is incapable of doing what he engaged to do, the contract is at an end. Chanter v. Leese, & Mees. & W. 205, 1 Horn & H. 224.

Where a contract provided that one party should bore a well and the other should furnish supplies, and the latter refused to furnish the supplies, whereupon the former abandoned the contract, the court held that he was justified in doing so and no recovery could be had against him therefor, but that, since according to his contract he was not to be paid until the well was completed, he could not recover any pay for what he had done. Barrett v. Austin (Cal.) 31 Pac. Rep. 2.

Where there was a violation of an agreement to extend the time for selling property under a decree of court which was made in consideration of the payment of additional interest, the court says that, "as a rule, if one of the parties violates his agreement, the other is thereby released;" and in that case it was held that the additional interest could not be recovered. Etheredge v. Barkley, 25 Fla. 314.

If one engaged to teach a school is assigned to a room on a certain floor, which it is afterwards found cannot be given her, and for that reason she neglects to present herself for employment, the school board is at liberty to treat the contract as at an end, and she can recover no damages for the breach. Illinois Female College v. Perry, 8 Ill. App. 138.

In case of a conditional contract, upon failure by one of the parties to perform the other may retract. Dodge v. Greeley, 31 Me. 343.

Where one party to a contract refuses to be bound, the other party may avail himself of the refusal and rescind the contract. Allen v. Webb, 24 N. H. 273.

When one party refuses to perform, the other may rescind. Weeks v. Robie, 42 N. H. 316.

The refusal of one who has engaged a special train to take it upon the company's refusal to guarantee that he will reach his destination at a certain time will exonerate the company from the performance of its obligation, and it cannot be sued for breach of its contract. *Wilcox v. Although insolvency on the part of the purchaser may give the seller a right to refuse to deliver any more goods under the contract, yet, if such refusal is made without due cause, the purchaser may then rescind and refuse to take any more of the goods without being liable for damages. Re Phoenix Bessemer Steel Co. L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 108.

Where defendant agreed to take a sublease from plaintiff and to purchase the furniture left by plaintiff upon the premises, the court held that he was not bound to fulfil his agreement where plaintiff left rent in arrear for which the furniture was liable to be distrained. Partridge v. Souerby, 3 Bos. & P. 172.

has been approved by the trial and appellate courts, no question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict can be raised in this court. It will be proper, therefore, to so far examine the evidence as to enable us to determine whether there was evidence tending to support the plaintiff's cause of action as alleged in his declaration. In the discussion which will follow, it will become apparent that we are of opinion that there was evidence tending to sustain plaintiff's cause of action, as alleged, and that, therefore, said instructions were properly refused. Whether the evidence, when considered together, is sufficient to maintain the plaintiff's case, is a question which does not fall within our province to determine.

The principal question to be determined in this case arises upon the second and third instructions given at the instance of the plaintiff, as follows: "(2) If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant, by its acts and conduct, showed an intention not to be bound by said contract, then said Richards Maynard & Co. had the right to treat said contract as abandoned by said defendant, and to bring suit for the recovery of damages at any time thereafter, unless you believe from the evidence that the defendant company receded from such intention not to be bound, prior to the time when said plaintiff chose to treat said contract as abandoned by the defendant. An intention can only be known by acts, conduct, or declaration. Your inquiry in this connection is: First. Did defendant, by act and conduct, violate the substantial terms of the contract, and commit breaches in substantial provisions thereof? Second. Did such acts and conduct, if you believe from the evidence they existed, warrant the conclusion that they would be continued, and that it was the intention of the defendant to continue such acts and conduct? (3) If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant railway refused to, and did not, live up to its said contract, in its substantial provisions, and refused to perform it according to its terms, and abandoned the same without the fault of Richards, Maynard & Co., and that defendant prevented Richards, Maynard & Co. from performing the substantial provisions of said contract according to its terms, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover; and it is not necessary that Richards, Maynard & Co. should have been prevented from performing said contract by physical force, in order to give them the right to treat said contract as abandoned by the defendant railway, and to recover damages from said defendant company in this suit. If the jury believe from the evidence that said defendant railway refused to, and did not, live up to its said contract, and refused to perform it according to its terms, and if you believe from the evidence that defendant defeated the substantial object of the contract, or rendered it unattainable by proper performance on the part of the firm of Richards, Maynard & Co., and that defendant prevented Richards, Maynard & Co. from performing the said contract according to its terms, as above suggested, then the jury may find for the plaintiff, and assess the damages at such a sum as they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff has suffered by reason of such breach." Party in default cannot sue.

The same result is reached by the decisions which hold that a party in default cannot enforce the contract. If he cannot enforce the contract, of course the other party is given all the advantage which he could have derived from a simple rescission. The question of the right of a defaulting party to enforce the contract is not within the scope of this note, but a few of the cases are cited here by way of illustration.

In an action for the contract price against one who claims to have rescinded the contract, the plaintiff must show that he performed substantially on his part. Robinson v. Brooks, 40 Fed. Rep. 525.

In an action by a master for breach of articles of apprenticeship because the apprentice had run away, it appearing that the master had abandoned the trade which he had covenanted to teach, the court held that the duty to teach was a condition precedent and that the plaintiff could not maintain an action without showing that he had performed or was ready to do so. *Ellen v. proposition, more or less directly, the court gave to the jury, at the instance of the defendant, its 7th, 12th, 16th, and 17th instructions, as follows: "(7) You are instructed that, if the defendant committed breaches of the contract, still, if, from the evidence, you believe that such breaches did not defeat the substantial object of the contract, or render it unattainable by proper performance on the part of the firm of Richards, Maynard & Co., then the plaintiff cannot recover, and your verdict must be for the defendant." "(12) The jury are instructed, as a matter of law, that a mere failure or refusal of the defendant to pay to plaintiff, or the firm of Richards, Maynard & Co., any sum of money demanded by him or them, and claimed to be on account of services previously rendered by said firm under the contract in question, cannot be construed or treated as an abandonment of the said contract by the defendant, entitling the plaintiff or his said firm to maintain the present action, which is solely for the recovery of such profits as might have accrued to the plaintiff or his firm, if, on their part, said contract had been fully executed, continuously, for the period limited by said contract." "(16) The jury are further instructed, as a matter of law, that, in order to entitle the plaintiff to recover in this case, it is necessary for him to establish by a preponderance of evidence that he and the firm of Richards, Maynard & Co. were, by the acts of the defendant, prevented from the performance of said contract on their part, or that the execution of the said contract on their part was interrupted by, and as the legitimate consequence of, the acts of the defendant in disregard of its obligations under said contract. (17) The failure of the defendant to pay, when demanded, any moneys due and owing to plaintiff under the contract, was not such an act or omission, in itself, on the part of defendant, as to prevent the plaintiff completing the contract."

Upon an examination of the evidence for the purpose of determining the propriety of the instructions, it will be found that it tends to prove that shortly after the plaintiff's firm had, in pursuance of the contract, constructed and equipped their transfer house, and commenced the weighing and transfer of grain therein, controversies arose between the parties as to the proper construction of the contract, the rights of the plaintiff, and the duties and obligations of the defendant, thereunder. It was claimed by the defendant that it was not required by the contract to deliver to the plaintiff's firm, to be by them weighed and transferred, all of the grain received by the defendant from western railroads for transportation to the east over its lines, but that it had the option to deliver, to be thus weighed and transferred, only such grain as it chose to deliver, and had the right to divert from plaintiff's transfer house, and was at liberty to transfer and weigh, all or such part of the grain received by it from western railroads as it thought proper, by other modes; and, acting on that interpretation of the contract, it did in fact withhold large amounts of grain from the transfer house, and had the same transferred by other methods, thereby depriving the plaintiff's

Effect of providing penalty.

The mere fact that a penalty is provided for a breach of the contract will not prevent a party from rescinding because of breach by the other, on the ground that he could go on and perform his part and then recover the penalty. Wilson v. Rootz, 119 Ill. 379.

To rescind a contract for failure to pay the purchase money there must be a return of whatever has been received, so as to place the other party in statu quo. Gay v. Alter, 102 U. S. 79, 25 L. ed. 48.

In case of a rescission for mere failure to pay the purchase money, the other party must be put in statu quo by a return of what he has paid under the contract. Frink v. Thomas, 20 Or. 265, 12 L. R. A. 239.

A contract cannot be rescinded by one of the parties for the default of the other, unless both of them can be put in the same state as before the contract. It must be rescinded in toto. And if the party rescinding has received property of any value, however inconsiderable, under the contract, he must restore it to the other party. Coolidge v. Brigham, 1 Met. 547.

In case of failure to deliver what was bought, before the contract can be rescinded the buyer must return what he received, so as to place the seller in statu quo. Conner v. Henderson, 15 Mass. 313, 5 Am. Dec. 103.

There is no right to maintain an action for money had and received after a receipt of part of the consideration which cannot be returned, although the other party refuses to go on with the contract and deliver the remainder of the property. Peters v. Gooch, 4 Blackf. 515.

A contract cannot be rescinded without mutual consent when circumstances have been so altered by part execution that the parties cannot be put in statu quo. Bellows v. Cheek, 20 Ark. 488.

In order to justify a rescission both parties must be put in statu quo, as, where the agreement was firm of a considerable portion of the business to which they were entitled by the terms of the contract. And also that soon after the transfer house was open, and during all the time it was in operation, the defendant claimed the right under the contract, and adopted and persisted in the practice, of using the weights obtained from the plaintiff's firm for other purposes than that of billing the property weighed to its destination,—that is to say, by giving away such weights to the western railroads over which the property had been brought to Chicago,—thus placing it out of the power of plaintiff's firm to make sales of such weights to western railroads and others, and thereby depriving the firm of practically the only source of profit secured to them by the contract. It will also appear that the evidence tends to show that other differences arose as to the amount to be paid by the defendant on account of the expense of transferring through the transfer house, and as to the basis upon which the cost thereof should be computed, etc. The construction placed upon this contract in respect of the matters of difference before mentioned, by this court, in Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Richards, 126 Ill. 448, relieves us of the necessity of again construing it. We there held that both the giving away of weights to the western railroads, and the refusal of appellant company to deliver to plaintiffs' firm, for weighing and transfer, all grain received by it for transportation from western railroads, were violations of its contract. It was there found that the market value of the weights was 70 cents per car, and that the appellant had given away to western railroads the weights of 12,857 cars transferred and weighed by plaintiffs, in violation of the contract. It was also found that many other cars had been transferred and weighed by other methods than through the transfer house of plaintiffs; that 1,267 of such cars were transferred on track by appellant in January, February, and March, 1885, alone, in violation of the contract. That bill was filed on June 5, 1886, and asked, among other things, a reformation of the contract. The court, by its final decree, refused to reform the contract, but held it to be valid and binding between the parties, in the form in which it was executed. There can be no question that on June 5, 1886, and prior thereto, the evidence tended to show that the defendant was then guilty of breaches of the contract, as it was then held to be subsisting and binding between the parties. Aside from the large amount of business diverted by appellant from the transfer house of the plaintiffs, which it was bound to furnish them under the contract, as there construed, of the 24,700 car loads of grain and seed which appellant delivered to and permitted to be weighed and transferred through the transfer house, the weights of 12,857 cars, or 50 per cent of the entire business done, was given away by the defendant, in violation of its covenants.

We need not pursue this branch of the case farther. But to these may be added other breaches of the contract by the defendant, which the evidence tends to show, namely, its refusal to pay the transfer charges or expenses, and its refusal to be bound by the

to make repairs and execute a lease in consideration of the payment of the rent, the tenant cannot, after taking and holding possession for ten days, rescind for failure to make the repairs, since his possession prevents his placing the other party in statu quo. Hunt v. Silk, 5 East, 449, 2 Smith, 15.

Party cannot rescind while retaining benefit.

As part of the rule requiring the placing of the other party in statu quo, it is held that a party cannot rescind and at the same time retain a benefit under the contract. This rule is just and will equitably settle most cases to which the rule as to condition precedent has been applied. Lord Mansfield's rule in Boone v. Byrne, 1 H. Bl. 273, note, that if the covenant goes to the whole consideration it is a condition precedent, but if it goes only to part of the consideration it is not, is difficult to understand and apply, while practically the same result is obtained by the simple rule that one cannot rescind and also retain a benefit. Therefore the rule as to condition precedent has not been generally applied in modern cases, while the other rule has been.

A person cannot rescind a contract and at the same time retain the consideration, in whole or in part, which he has received under it. Jennings v. Gage, 13 Ill. 610, 56 Am. Dec. 478.

If a party has received a substantial part of the consideration he cannot rescind. Carter v. Seagrill, L. R. 10 Q. B. 564, 38 L. T. N. S. 604.

A party who has had some benefit from the contract cannot, as against one who has contributed labor under it for a year or more, rescind it for the latter's breach, but the remedy is an action for damages for nonfulfilment. Rogers v. Garland, 8 Mackey, 24.

It is in general true that a party who has derived 30 L. R. A.

some benefit from the partial performance of a contract cannot rescind it entirely and resort to an action for money had and received for money which he may have paid upon it; and the reason is that by rescinding after such partial benefit to one party both parties cannot be placed in the same situation in which they stood before the contract. But if the other party is placed in the same situation which he occupied before the contract was made, then the dissatisfied one may rescind the special contract and sue for what he paid out under it. Barber v. Lyon, 8 Blackf. 215.

One who has undertaken to deliver a portion of the ore taken from a mine to another, who is to construct a level to drain the mine, is not absolved from his covenant by the fact that the level is permitted to get out of repair, if he is not at all prejudiced thereby, the level remaining sufficient for all practical purposes. Crawford v. Witherbee, 77 Wis. 419, 9 L. R. A. 661.

Payment cannot be avoided while the property is retained. Gale v. Nixon, 6 Cow. 445.

Where one person was to furnish wool, attend to sales, and pay over a portion of the advance money to the other, who was to manufacture cloth from the wool, the court held that after the contract had been partly executed the conversion of a part of the cloth by the manufacturer to his own use would not give the other party a right to repudiate the contract and refuse to pay over the required portion of the advance payments, since the other party could not be put in statu quo. Hammond v. Buckmaster, 22 Vt. 375.

One who has conveyed property to his surety to be disposed of in satisfaction of the surety's liability cannot, after the surety has been engaged in the work for several weeks, rescind the contract so as to revert title in himself, at least not without stipulations of the contract providing for a submission to arbitration of all differences between the parties in respect of the spirit, meaning, or execution of the contract. It admits of no argument that the principal consideration upon which plaintiff's firm undertook to build, equip, and operate their transfer house was the privilege given them of weighing and transferring all grain and seed delivered by western roads to the defendant for transportation eastward over its lines, and the right secured to them to control the weights of the grain thus transferred, and make sale of them to whomsoever might desire to purchase. It was clearly contemplated that the sale of such weights should be the source of profit to plaintiffs, and, as the result shows, was practically their only source of profit from the business. During the time the transfer house was in operation, there is no complaint that they did not keep and perform their agreements. By the wrongful act of the defendant in giving away the weights, more than one half of the legitimate profits of the business actually done was taken from them, and by the wrongful diversion of business they were deprived of large profits to which they were entitled under their contract. By the wrongful act of the defendant, they were deprived of a very large proportion of the substantial consideration upon which the contract was entered into by plaintiffs.

The evidence tends to show that the defendant, after the 5th of June, 1886,—the date of filing the bill in the case referred to,—manifested and declared its intention to persist in the future in the same course of conduct, and to insist upon the same construction of the contract. May 13, 1886, the attorney to whom the matter had been referred by the defendant, in reply to a note inclosing an itemized statement of account, refused to allow, under the contract, for weights given away by defendant, and expressly said, "under the contract, the company is not bound to deliver grain to Richards, except at its option." On June 9, 1886, the defendant's western division superintendent wrote to plaintiffs, acknowledging receipt of statement of May, 1886, of cost of grain and seed transferred, and disallowing the account, but restating the same in accordance with the interpretation of the contract previously insisted upon by the defendant. On June 11, 1886, plaintiffs' firm replied, noting the refusal contained in the letter of June 9, restating the balance due, and notifying the defendant that unless the same was paid by 12 o'clock M., June 16, plaintiffs would be compelled to suspend operations, etc. On the same day the attorney of the company, to whom the matter had been referred, wrote the plaintiffs' firm that the company could not change the position taken in the letter of the superintendent and the letter of May 13, 1886, before mentioned. It thus appears that as late as June 11 the company was insisting that under the contract it was not bound to deliver grain to the transfer house of plaintiffs' firm, except as it chose to do so; and was likewise denying its liability under the contract for the weights it had given away, and for transfer charges, etc. No change occurring in the attitude of the parties, plaintiffs' firm closed their house on June 16, and notified the defendant accordingly. As early as September 11, 1886, placing the surety in statu quo. Allen v. Edgerton, 3 Vt. 442.

Although the lessor of a slave takes him out of the possession of the lessee before the lease has expired, the lessee cannot refuse to pay for him if he regains possession of him in trover and enjoys the benefit of the contract to the end of the term. Odum v. Bryan, 8 Jones, L. 211.

If the contract is executed in part, a failure by one party to continue to perform will not give the other party the right to rescind, but the remedy is an action on the contract to recover damages for the nonperformance. Stevens v. Cushing, 1 N. H. 17, 8 Am. Dec. 27.

A party who has required payment of sums of money which by a rescission of the contract will be rendered useless to the contracting party cannot rescind such contract for mere nonperformance of some condition thereof. Swobe v. New Omaha, Thomson-Houston Electric Light Co. 39 Neb. 586.

One accepting services under a special contract cannot refuse to pay for them, although the terms of the contract are not wholly carried out. Bee Printing Co. v. Hiehorn, 4 Allen, 68.

Upon refusal to deliver part of the articles brought for a gross sum, the purchaser cannot, while retaining what was delivered, rescind the contract and recover back any of the money paid, but his action is for breach of his special contract. Miner v. Bradley, 22 Pick. 459.

In Ellen v. Topp, 6 Exch. 440, 20 L. J. Exch. 241, 15 Jur. 451, the court adopts the rule that, where a person has received part of the consideration for which he entered into an agreement it would be unjust, because he had not received the whole, that he should therefore be permitted to enjoy that part without either paying or doing anything for it. Therefore the law obliges him to perform the agreement on his part, and leaves him to his remedy to recover any damages he may have sustained in not receiving the whole consideration.

In case of a covenant by the owner of a vessel to go to fishing grounds and procure as full a cargo of oil, etc., as possible, and deliver it to defendant in consideration that defendant would give him a certain portion of the proceeds, after the latter has received a partial cargo he cannot set up full performance of the owner's covenant as a condition precedent to his right to recover anything on the contract. Stavers v. Curling, 3 Bing. N. C. 355, 3 Scott, 740, 2 Hodges, 237.

But, although it is laid down as a general rule that the neglect or refusal of one party to fulfil a contract will not entitle the other to rescind it, unless they can be placed in statu quo, yet the rule to this extent is understood to be applicable only to such entire rescission of the contract ab initio as shall revert in each party the rights he possessed antecedently by the contract. Even then it may be doubted whether the rule is without exceptions. Tyson v. Doe, 15 Vt. 571.

So the fact that a party has received part of the consideration for his contract will not prevent his rescinding and recovering back what he paid, if the other party makes default in the material matter which furnished the real ground for entering into the contract; as, where a person paid money for stock of a corporation in consideration that he should be made a director and superintendent and be paid a salary; the mere fact that he is made a director will not prevent his rescinding and recovering back the money paid for the stock, if the corporation refuses to make him superintendent and the plaintiffs' firm addressed a communication to the president of the defendant company, asking for an arbitration of the differences between them, under the contract, and naming a person to represent the plaintiffs' firm, and again, on March 29, 1886, made a like demand, and named an arbitrator to act for and on behalf of the plaintiffs' firm. The defendant company declined to submit the matters in difference to arbitration. The correspondence before referred to, as well as other facts shown, may be fairly said to show a fixed determination on the part of the defendant company, after June 5, 1886, to persist in and continue the same breaches of its contract in the future of which it had theretofore been guilty,—that is, to persistently pursue a course of conduct which would deprive plaintiffs' firm of much the larger portion, if not all, of the substantial benefits of the contract. If it might, at its option and will, give away one half of the weights of cars actually transferred, as it claimed the right to do, it might give them all away. If it was optional with the defendant to deliver for weighing and transfer only such cars of grain received by it from western roads for transportation east over its lines as it might choose, and divert the business from the transfer house at will, the contract ceased to be operative and binding on the defendant. Such construction, in effect, was a repudiation of that part of the contract to be kept and performed by the defendant, and was a denial of the right of the plaintiffs to have and demand the substantial benefits of the contract as it existed between the parties.

That the breaches of the contract which the evidence tends to establish were such as would justify a rescission thereof by Richards, Maynard & Co. and enable them to recover upon quantum meruit or quantum valebant, so far as they had actually performed, does not admit of question. The relief sought is not upon that principle. The law is familiar that upon rescission of the contract the recovery is confined to the value of the services, etc., rendered, and that damages for the breach, for the loss of expenditures or of profits, would not be allowable. United States v. Behan, 110 U. S. 338, 28 L. ed. 168. It is well settled that where one party repudiates the contract, and refuses longer to be bound by it, the injured party has an election to pursue either of three remedies: He may treat the contract as rescinded, and recover upon quantum meruit so far as he has performed: or he may keep the contract alive for the benefit of both parties, being at all times himself ready and able to perform, and, at the end of the time specified in the contract for performance, sue and recover under the contract; or he may treat the repudiation as putting an end to the contract for all purposes of performance, and sue for the profits he would have realized if he had not been prevented from performing. In the latter case the contract would be continued in force for that purpose. Where, however, the injured party elects to keep the contract in force for the purpose of recovering future profits, treating the contract as repudiated by the other party, in order to such recovery the plaintiff must allege and prove performance upon his part, or a legal excuse pay him a salary. Seymour v. Detroit Copper & B. Rolling Mills, 56 Mich. 117.

And where a defendant has refused to perform an essential part of an entire contract the plaintiff may treat the contract as rescinded, notwithstanding a partial performance by defendant, if he can be placed in as good a situation as before. Luey v. Bundy, 9 N. H. 298, 32 Am. Dec. 350.

There is a class of cases of which Dula v. Cowles, 2 Jones, L. 454, and White v. Brown, Id. 408, are examples, in which one who has undertaken to perform an entire contract after finishing part of it abandons it, and the courts have not permitted him to recover for what he has done, in which there is an appearance of giving the other party the right to retain what he has received without paying for it; but in these cases there is really no question of rescission on the part of the defendant. He in fact only remains in a passive position and is given the advantage because the party in default is not permitted to maintain an action.

d. Partial performance.

Closely allied to the cases set out in the last subdivision, and yet for the most part decided on a different ground, are those which have been partially performed and in which rescission is denied for that reason.

It is not every partial failure or refusal to comply with the terms of a contract by one party which will entitle the other party to abandon the contract at once. In order to justify an abandonment of it and of the proper remedy growing out of it, the failure of the opposite party must be a total one,—the object of the contract must have been defeated or rendered unattainable by his misconduct or default. For partial derelictions and nonperformance in matters not necessarily of first importance to the accomplishment of the object of the contract the party injured must seek his remedy upon the stipulations of the contract itself. Selby v. Hutchinson, 9 Ill. 319; Bloomington Electric Light Co. v. Radbourn, 56 Ill. App. 165.

The contract cannot be put an end to if the refusal to perform is but partial for which there may be compensation in damages. Desha v. Robinson, 17 Ark. 228; Gatlin v. Wilcox, 26 Ark. 309.

A party cannot rescind if the failure of the other party be but partial, leaving a distinct part as a subsisting and executed consideration, and leaving also the other party his action for damages for the part not performed. Generally no contract can be rescinded by one of the parties, unless both can be restored to the condition in which they were when the contract was made; if, therefore, one of the parties has derived an advantage from a partial performance he cannot hold this and consider the contract rescinded because of the nonperformance of the residue, but must do all the contract obliges him to do and seek his remedy in damages. Burge v. Cedar Rapids & M. R. R. Co. 32 Iowa, 101.

If the failure of one party to the contract be but partial, leaving a distinct part as a subsisting and executed consideration, and leaving also the other party his action for damages for the part not performed, such failure will not warrant the party having the right to complain in refusing afterwards to proceed with the performance of the agreement, unless a failure to complete performance on the part of one party shall have been made a condition for the subsequent performance of the obligations resting on the party entitled to receive the benefit of the precedent performance. Ebling v. Bauer, 17 N. Y. Week. Dig. 467.

for nonperformance. As said by Lord Coleridge in Frost v. Burr, L. R. 9 C. P. 208: "In cases of this sort, where the question is whether the one party is set free by the action of the other, the real matter for consideration is whether the acts or conduct of the one do or do not amount to an intimation of an intention to abandon and altogether refuse performance of the contract." His lordship then adds: "I say this in order to explain the ground upon which I think the decision in these cases must rest. There has been some conflict among them. But I think it may be taken that the fair result of them is as I have stated, viz., that the true question is whether the acts and conduct of the party evince an intention no longer to be bound by the contract."

It is insisted by appellant that, to authorize one party to treat the contract as renounced and abandoned by the other, the breach must have been such, in effect, as to prevent performance by the injured party, or render the further execution of the contract by him impossible. It appears to be the theory of counsel for appellant that, in order to entitle the plaintiff to recover future profits under the contract, the breach by the defendant must have been of a condition precedent to be performed on its part, and which rendered the contract incapable of execution by the other, or some act or conduct on the part of the defendant amounting to a physical obstruction or prevention of performance by the plaintiff. This contention does not commend itself either upon considerations of good conscience or convenience, and it will be found not to be sustained by the weight of authority. It would seem to be inequitable, and promotive of no good purpose, to require a party to continue in the performance of a contract, notwithstanding the refusal of the other party to be longer bound by it. The effect in many cases must be great loss to the plaintiff, without any corresponding benefit to the defendant. Or if it be ultimately held that the plaintiff is entitled to recover his expenditures, and for his labor in performing, the amount to be paid by the defendant will be greatly enhanced, while the plaintiff would, of necessity, take the hazard of increased loss in the event of the defendant's insolvency. It would seem to be reasonable and just, upon the repudiation of the contract by one party, that the other be held justified in ceasing performance, stopping expenditure, and thus curtailing the damages which the other party would be ultimately liable to pay, and to permit recovery once for all of the damages that the injured party will sustain by the non-performance of the other party; the locus penitentis being kept open until the injured party elects to treat the contract as abandoned by the other, and brings suit as for nonperformance. While the decision should not be made to rest upon grounds of convenience to the parties, however just and equitable, (which, in view of the decided cases, need not be done), yet the defendant should not be heard to complain, if, after acts and declarations evincing a clear determination to be no longer bound by or to perform the contract on his part, the other party treats it as

In Phillips v. Bruce, Anthon, N. P. 59, in which the contract was for the sale of fish which defendant refused to pay for because not of the quality bought, the court says: "The defendants could only have rescinded the contract in the event of a total departure from it on the part of the plaintiff."

A contract for the purchase of forty-five lots in different parts of the city is not dissolved by failure of title to part of them which are not essential to the enjoyment of the others. Stoddart v. Smith, 8 Binn. 265.

Where the contract was to take by boat two loads of wood from one place to another, and in case a full load could not be taken out of the creek upon the banks of which the wood was piled, the owner was to complete the load at a certain wharf, the court held that the owner's refusal to complete the first load did not absolve the boatman from going back after the second, but that his remedy was by action for breach of the contract. The court says: "The owner's engagement did not go to the whole of the consideration or matter to be done by the boatman; he could transport the principal portion of the wood if the owner failed to perform on his side." Keenan v. Brown, 21 Vt. 38.

In Filleul v. Armstrong, 7 Ad. & El. 557, W. W. & D. 616, 2 Nev. & P. 406, 1 Jur. 821, in which one who had undertaken to teach French in defendant's school did not return immediately at the close of a vacation, because of which the employer assumed the right to rescind the contract, it is stated that it is not shown that the business of the school was interfered with by the absence, and that, even as between master and servant, the facts did not entitle the defendant to put an end to the contract. No material misconduct is shown nor any failure "amounting to a dissolution of the engagement."

The rule that where there is only a partial failure of performance by one party, for which there may be a compensation in damages, the contract cannot be rescinded by the other, was applied to a case where one of the parties agreed, in consideration that the other should pay certain of his debts, to repay him a certain amount each quarter, with the further agreement that of the sum paid a small part should be applied in a certain way; and it was held that payment cannot be refused because from one payment the application was not made as agreed. Franklin v. Miller, 4 Ad. & El. 599.

In Brandt v. Lawrence, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 344, 46 L. J. Q. B. 237, 24 Week Rep. 749, where there was a contract for oats to be shipped by steamer or steamers within a certain time, the court held that the purchaser was bound to accept all that was shipped in time, although a part of the entire amount was late.

But if the part of the contract that has failed to be so essential to the residue that it cannot be reasonably supposed the purchaser would have made the contract without it, the contract is dissolved in toto. Graver v. Scott, 80 Pa. 88.

IV. Party seeking to rescind must not be in default.

The party who claims to rescind a contract must show that he has done all that he is required to do in order to entitle himself to a performance of it by the other party. Webb v. Stone, 24 N. H. 238.

As a general thing a contract cannot be rescinded by a party to it unless he is in a position to demand specific performance. Hale v. Cravener, 128 Ill. 409.

A person in default cannot complain of the other party's default. Stewart v. Many, 7 Ill. App. 508.

If a vendee wishes by a rescission to put an end to the contract he must himself be active to perform, or at least offer to perform, the contract on abandoned by him. As said in Frost v. Knight, L. R. 7 Exch. 111: "It is obvious that such a course must lead to the convenience of both parties, and, though we should be unwilling to found our opinion upon ground of convenience alone, yet the latter tends strongly to support the view that such an action ought to be admitted and upheld. By acting upon such notice of the intention of the promisor, and taking timely measures, the promisee may in many cases avert, or at all events materially lessen, the injurious effects which would otherwise flow from the nonfulfilment of the contract." See also Hoemer v. Wilson, 7 Mich. 804, 74 Am. Dec. 716, cases infra. The right of the plaintiff to have kept his transfer house in operation, and to have been ready at all times to perform on his part, and, under the construction of the contract given in Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Richards, supra, to have recovered from time to time his damages for breaches thereof, or, at the end of the time, sued to recover damages for all breaches, is not questioned in this proceeding. The plaintiff, however, in good conscience, while seeking to recover what he is entitled to under the contract, should do that which would be of least injury to the defendant. And if the defendant had repudiated the contract, so as to deprive the plaintiff of the substantial benefits arising from performance, it ought not to complain that a course was pursued least prejudicial to it.

The question here presented has not been directly involved in any of the cases heretofore considered by the court. In the cases of

Fox v. Kitton, 19 Ill. 519; McPherson v. Walker, 40 Ill. 871; Chamber of Commerce of Chicago v. Solitt, 43 Ill. 528; Follanabes v. Adams, 86 Ill. 14; and Kadish v. Young, 108 Ill. 170; 43 Am. Rep. 548,—the questions involved were determined upon principles analogous, in some respects, to those which must control in this case. In Kadish v. Young, supra, a contract was made for the future delivery of grain. On the day succeeding the making of the contract the purchasers gave notice to the seller that they would not be bound by it, and the question was whether such notice created a breach of the contract, and imposed on the seller the obligation to resell the barley on the market, or make a forward contract for the purchase of other grain of like amount and time of delivery, within reasonable time after the notice, and, if he sold, to credit the purchaser with the amount of the sale, or give him the benefit of such forward contract; or whether, notwithstanding the notice, the seller had the legal right to wait until the day of delivery under the contract, and then resell and charge the purchaser with the difference. And it was held that the seller was not bound to act upon the notice, but was entitled, notwithstanding, to tender, etc., on the day for delivery fixed by the contract. In the opinion, by the late Mr Justice Scholfield, the authorities were reviewed, and the cases of Cort v. Ambergate, N. B. & E. Junction R. Co. 6 Eng. L. & Eq. 230; Hochster v. De Latour, 20 Eng. L. & Eq. 157; Frost v. Knight, supra; Roper v. Johnson, L. R. 8 C. P. 167, 4 Moak, Eng. Rep. 397,—and other English and American

One in default cannot rescind for the default of the other party. Grat v. Self, 109 N. Y. 368; Ellis v. Hoskins, 14 Johns. 368; Hatton v. Johnson, 88 Pa. 219.

One who has contracted to procure for another in possession of land the patent title cannot rescind and recover possession of the land when he has never been in a position to perform on his part, while the other party has always been ready and willing to perform when he could get what he bargained for. Johnson v. Pollock, 58 Ill. 181.

A person first in default cannot declare the contract at an end by reason of nonperformance by the other party. Myers v. Gross, 59 Ill. 436.

A person who by his own default has prevented compliance by the other party cannot take advantage of the other's default and put an end to the contract. People v. Holden, 82 Ill. 98.

The breach of a contract will not warrant the rescission thereof by a party by whose fault it was caused. Burris v. Shrewsbury Park, Land & Imp. Co. 55 Mo. App. 381.

A party in default cannot terminate the contract. Wright v. Reusens, 128 N. Y. 298.

The party who wishes to take advantage of the default of the other party must not have been in default himself at the time. Grandy v. McCleese, 3 Jones, L. 142, 64 Am. Dec. 574.

One who claims to rescind a contract for the non-performance of the other party must have been ready and offered to perform on his own part. Seymour v. Bennet, 14 Mass. 268.

The mere fact that the seller takes the property out of the possession of the purchaser, and resells it because of the purchaser's default, will not authorize the purchaser to consider the contract rescinded so as to recover back any deposit of the price or to resist paying any balance that may be due. Page v. Cowasjee Eduljee, L. R. 1 C. P. 127, 19 Jur. N. S. 381, 14 L. T. N. S. 178.

A contract for the purchase or exchange of lands may be rescinded, and the purchase money paid in advance may be recovered back, on the failure of one party to perform, even though the other party could not have performed. In an action to rescind and recover back payments, it is enough to show a breach by the party who has received the money. But not so when the action is to enforce the contract or recover damages; however positively a vendee may have refused to perform his contract, and however insufficiently the reason assigned for his refusal, he cannot be subjected to damages without showing that he would have received what he contracted for had he performed. Bigler v. Morgan, 77 N. Y. 813.

It is no defense to a party sued for breach of contract to transport a specified number of articles, with which he did not offer to comply, that the plaintiff did not have so large a number as specified ready for transportation. Taylor v. Steamboat Robert Campbell, 20 Mo. 254.

V. Right of party rescinding to recover for what he has done.

General rules.

Every breach of a special contract by one party does not authorize the other to treat it as rescinded. But there are some breaches that do amount to an abandonment of it. There is not, perhaps, any precise rule which, when applied to the breach of a contract, certainly settles the question whether it is thereby abandoned or not, but if the act of one party be such as necessarily to prevent the other from performing on his part according to the terms of the agreement, the contract may be considered cases, are commented upon, approved, and are held not to be in conflict with Leigh v. Paterson, 8 Taunt. 540; Phillipotts v. Evans, 5 Mees. & W. 475; Ripley v. McClure, 4 Exch. 344,—and other cases in which it is held that a party to a contract to be performed in the future cannot create a breach by merely giving notice that he will not perform. It will be found, upon examination of Kadish v. Young, that the learned writer clearly recognized the doctrine that the party receiving the notice might have acted upon it, and accepted and treated the contract as broken. In Fox v. Kitton, supra, the question was whether, when a party agrees to do an act at a future time, and, before the time for performance arrives, declares he will not keep his contract, but repudiates it, the other party may act on such declaration, and treat the contract as at an end. And on the authority of Phillipotts v. Evans, and Hochster v. De Latour, it was held that he might do so. It will be found, also, in McPherson v. Walker and Chamber of Commerce of Chicago v. Sollitt, that Cort v. Ambergate, N. B. & E. Junction R. Co., Hochster v. De Latour, and other English and American cases holding the same doctrine, are cited with approval, and relied upon as sustaining the decision in those cases.

Before proceeding to an examination of the cases referred to, it is proper to notice other Illinois cases supposed to have some bearing upon the question under consideration. Selby v. Hutchinson, 9 Ill. 319, was a case of rescission merely. It was there said: "In order to justify an abandonment of the contract, and of the proper remedy growing out of it, the failure of the opposite party must be a total one,—the object of the contract must have been defeated, or rendered unattainable, by" the misconduct or default of the other party. In the subsequent case of Leopold v. Salkley, 89 Ill. 412, 31 Am. Rep. 93, also a case of rescission, the language of Selby v. Hutchinson is commented upon, and it is said that case "is not understood as laying down the rule that, to justify an abandonment of a contract, the opposite party must have failed to discharge every obligation imposed on him, but simply that matters which do not go to the substance of the contract, and the failure to perform which would not render the performance of the rest a thing different in substance from what was contracted for, do not authorize an abandonment of the contract; for when the failure to perform the contract is in respect to matters which would render the performance of the rest a thing different in substance from what was contracted for, so far as we are advised, the authorities all agree the party not in default may abandon the contract." It may be true that there are cases where the party would be justified in rescinding the contract, thereby putting an end to it for all purposes, where he would not be justified in treating it as renounced by the other party, which we are not called upon to decide. Yet it will be found that, under the rule as stated in these cases, as explained in the later case, the party will be entitled to recover future profits. The court, in these cases, was called upon simply to determine whether the facts there presented warranted rescission, and laid down as rescinded by the other. His remedy in such case is on the common counts. Wright v. Haskell, 45 Me. 490; Dubois v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 4 Wend. 285.

A refusal or neglect by one party to perform his part of a contract justifies the other in treating it as rescinded and authorizes him to sue in general indebitatus assumpsit. Miller v. Thompson, 22 Ark. 258.

A party may recover on the general counts for the partial performance of an executory contract when the other party refuses to comply with his contract. Draper v. Randolph, 4 Harr. (Del.) 454.

In Planché v. Colburn, 8 Bing. 14, 1 Moore & S. 51, 5 Car. & P. 58, it does not appear that the plaintiff expressly rescinded or abandoned the contract, except from the fact that he sued on a quantum meruit after the abandonment of the contract by the other party, but the court upheld his right to sue without tendering performance after abandonment by the other party.

The form of action, whether on the contract or upon the common counts, treating the contract as rescinded, may have an important effect upon the measure of damages. Clark v. New York, 4 N. Y. 343. But the court in that case said the question will not be gone into in this case.

If the contract has been partially executed, the plaintiff having received some substantial benefit therefrom, and if upon a verdict in his favor the parties cannot be put in statu quo, the count for money had and received is not in general maintainable. American L. Ins. Co. v. McAden, 109 Pa. 399.

There is a class of cases which allows a party to sue in general assumpsit for the part performance of a special contract, and absolves him from a further execution of it, because the other party has violated the contract or refused further to act under it. These cases do not always proceed upon the notion of a strict and absolute rescission of the contract, since they often permit the partial execution of it to stand pro tanto. Tyson v. Doe, 15 Vt. 571.

Recovery of money paid.

When one party to a contract under seal refuses without right to perform his part, the other party may elect, either to sue on the contract to recover damages for the breach, or to rescind the contract and sue in assumpsit to recover back money paid under the contract for which he received no substantial benefit. American L. Ins. Co. v. McAden, 109 Pa. 399.

Under a contract requiring vendors to deliver oil in certain quantities on the platform of a railroad company, in case they were not ready to deliver at the times required the purchaser could refuse to accept a delivery afterwards, and recover back the money paid under a contract. Cleveland v. Sterrett, 70 Pa. 204.

If one who has contracted to sell property conveys it to a third person, it excuses the other contracting party from the necessity of making a tender of the purchase price and demanding a deed before bringing action to recover what he had paid. Richards v. Allen, 17 Me. 299.

If a party who has contracted to sell goods or chattels and received a portion of the purchase money refuses to perform, the vendee may either sue him upon the contract for damages or elect to treat it as rescinded and recover the sum advanced. Lawrence v. Taylor, 5 Hill, 114.

If the alleged breach be not such as to amount to a rescission by the defaulting party, and the seller takes advantage of it and disposes of the subject of the contract without any demand or offer to proceed on his part and without notice to the other the rule applicable to such facts, without, as a matter of course, intimating a distinction between the case there being considered and cases like that under consideration here. In the case of Palm v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 18 Ill. 217, the question presented to the court was whether the failure to pay the consideration for the work agreed to be done, according to the terms of the contract, was such an act as would authorize the other party to treat the contract as renounced, and bring suit for future profits. And the court held that it was not. The court says: "In this case we have a contract for the manufacture and delivery of sixteen engines, each to be paid for on delivery, without any expression or intimation that the parties expected or intended that any extraordinary consequences were to follow if the money was not paid when due. All that the contract provides is that so much in money and so much in bonds shall become due upon the delivery of each engine. By its terms it simply gives the party a cause of action for that amount. . . . The contract provides for no other penalty or liability, and the law imposes no other, except, perhaps, that this violation of the contract by the defendant in failing to make the payment may justify the plaintiffs in treating the contract as rescinded." Or they could go on and complete the contract, and, at the end, recover the amount due thereunder. There was in that case no refusal to receive locomotives under the contract, nor were plaintiffs forbidden to complete it, nor was it in any way put out of their power to do so. Very many of the cases before referred to have been decided since the Palm Case, which, it must be remarked, cites no authority sustaining the view of that case contended for by appellant in this case. The learned judge who wrote in the Palm Case says: "I have examined all the authorities referred to by counsel, and have made diligent search myself, but have found no case where the plaintiff has been allowed to recover for losses sustained by not being permitted to complete the contract, unless he has been prevented from going on with his work by the positive affirmative act of the other party, or where the other party has neglected to do some act without which the plaintiff could not, in the nature of things, go on with his contract. . . ." After giving instances of conditions precedent, the learned judge holds, as before said, that the failure to pay would not authorize the plaintiff to treat the contract as abandoned by the defendant, unless payment in a specified time and manner was by the contract made a condition precedent to performance by the plaintiff. The case of Christian County v. Overholt, 18 Ill. 223, is similar in its facts to the Palm Case, and is decided upon the same principle. In that case it is said: "The plaintiffs could only recover for prospective profits where they have been prevented from going on, either by some affirmative act of the defendant, as by being ordered to desist from further work, or by the omission to perform some condition precedent to the further prosecution, as to furnish or do something necessary to its further progress." The breach there alleged was a failure to pay an instalment as it fell due under the contract, and the case was disposed of upon the authority of the party, he may be treated as wrongfully rescinding the contract on his part; and the law will then give the other party a right of action to recover back what has been paid in part performance. Monroe v. Reynolds, 47 Barb. 574.

Money paid in advance on a special contract may, in case of the other party's refusal to perform, be recovered back in an action for money had and received. Wheeler v. Board, 12 Johns. 333; Raymond v. Beardsall, 12 Johns. 574, 7 Am. Dec. 317.

If the vendor refuses to receive any more of the purchase money, and regains possession of the property, which he refuses to convey, the purchaser may regard the contract as rescinded and maintain an action to recover back the purchase money which he has paid. Gillet v. Maynard, 5 Johns. 85, 4 Am. Dec. 329.

One who has paid money in consideration of a covenant which the other party refuses to perform may disaffirm the contract and bring assumpsit to recover back the money which he has paid under the contract. Weaver v. Bentley, 1 Cal. 47.

If one having received money in payment of his undertaking to perform an act refuses to perform it, the other party may treat such refusal as a rescission of the contract and recover back the price he has paid. King v. Hutchins, 23 N. H. 561.

An absolute refusal by a party to a contract under seal at the time when the other party is not in default, to be bound by the contract, gives the latter the right to treat the contract as rescinded, and sue to recover back the money paid by him under the contract. Ballou v. Billings, 136 Mass. 307.

One to whom the owner of a vessel has bargained and sold, but not conveyed, a part of it, under an agreement that he shall be employed as its master and pay the balance out of his wages, may rescind the contract and recover back the money paid upon the owner's wrongfully discharging him from his employment and taking possession of the vessel. Moore v. Curry, 112 Mass. 13.

Passage money paid in advance may be recovered back in case the voyage is broken up by a peril of the sea and the owner of the ship neglects to send the passenger to his destination. Brown v. Harris, 2 Gray. 350.

Where money is paid on an executory contract to deliver goods or transfer stock or the like in the future, and the contracting party fails to perform, it is in the election of the other party to treat the contract as rescinded and recover back the money, or to affirm the contract and recover damages for the nonperformance. And if the contract falls in part, if it is a precise and definite part capable of being ascertained by computation, a corresponding part of the purchase money may be recovered back, although the contract is in form entire. Hill v. Rewee, 11 Met. 263.

If there has been a rescission the parties stand to each other as though no contract had been made, and either may recover from the other advancements made. Cromwell v. Wilkinson, 1 Ind. 365.

If stock brokers refuse to complete their contract to carry stock for a customer, he can recover back money which he has paid on the contract. Brewster v. Van Liew, 20 Ill. App. 43.

If the circumstances are such that by rescinding the contract the rights of neither party are injured; if one of the contracting parties will not fulfil his part of the contract the other may rescind the contract and maintain his action for money had and received to recover back what he has paid on the faith of it. Bellows v. Cheek, 30 Ark. 433.

In Ehrensperger v. Anderson, 3 Exch. 153, 18 I. J.

Palm Case. Stress is laid by counsel upon the words, "prevented from going on." It is apparent from the language of the court, especially in the Overholt Case, that physical prevention was not contemplated, for the illustration given shows that at least an order to desist from the work would be a prevention, within the meaning of the term as used. While, in those cases, there was no failure to perform a condition precedent, or a legal prevention from going on with the work under the contract, which would authorize the plaintiffs to treat the contract as repudiated by the other party, and sue for prospective damages, and the court so held, still the cases clearly recognize that where there is a failure to perform a precedent condition, or there is a legal prevention of performance, by one party, the other may treat the contract as abandoned by him, and bring suit for future profits or prospective damages. The same language—i. e., that the party suing must be "prevented" from performance—has been used in numerous cases, but, wherever the attention of the court has been directly called to the sense in which the word has been used, it has been held not to mean that there must be physical prevention, but that any acts, conduct, or declarations of the party evincing a clear intention to repudiate the contract, and to treat it as no longer binding, are a legal prevention of performance by the other party. Thus, in Hosmer v. Wilson, supra, it was held that an absolute refusal of the defendant to accept the manufactured article when it should be completed was to be considered in the same light, as respects the plaintiff's remedy, as an absolute physical prevention by the defendant,—citing, in support, Cort v. Ambergate, N. B. & E. Junction R. Co. supra; Derby v. Johnson, 21 Vt. 21; Clark v. Marsiglia, 1 Denio, 317, 43 Am. Dec. 670; Hochster v. De Latour, supra.

In Cort v. Ambergate, N. B. & E. Junction R. Co. supra, the plaintiffs contracted to supply the defendants with 3,900 tons of iron chairs to be used in railway construction. They manufactured and delivered various quantities of chairs from May, 1847, until December, 1849, when the defendants informed plaintiffs that they did not want any more, and not to send any more, leaving 2,118 tons undelivered. Whereupon, plaintiffs brought suit to recover damages, including loss of profits. It was objected that, to entitle the plaintiffs to recover, they should have proved that the chairs had been made and had been tendered in the manner provided by the contract, or at least before the bringing of the suit, etc. In delivering the opinion of the court, Lord Campbell, Ch. J., said: "We are of opinion that the jury were fully justified, from the evidence, in finding that the plaintiffs were ready and willing to perform the contract although they never made and tendered the residue of the chairs. In common sense the meaning of . . . 'readiness and willingness' must be that the noncompletion of the contract was not the fault of the plaintiffs, and that they were disposed and able to complete it, if it had not been renounced by the defendants. What more can reasonably be required by the par-

Exch. 132, in which the question was as to the right to maintain an action for money had and received, the court says by way of argument that if a man puts money into the hands of another to purchase goods it can only be where defendant, who has received the money, has altogether refused to perform the contract or his part,—not merely delayed, but altogether refused,—so as to entitle the plaintiff to be put in the same situation as if he had altogether rescinded the contract, that the plaintiff can have a right to rescind the contract and bring an action for money had and received.

Where, upon the purchase of plows, their value is allowed to the seller in a settlement of accounts between him and the purchaser, if he refuses to deliver them the purchaser may treat the contract as rescinded, and recover back the price he has allowed for them. Danforth v. Dewey, 3 N. H. 79.

A distinction as to the right of plaintiff to recover back advance payments seems to be made between those cases in which the defendant rescinds for plaintiff's mere default, and those in which the contract fails because of plaintiff's absolute refusal to go on with it. In the latter case, the court in Ketchum v. Everton, 13 Johns. 365, 7 Am. Dec. 384, says: "It may be asserted with confidence that a party who has advanced money or done an act in part performance of an agreement, and stops short and refuses to proceed to the ultimate conclusion of the agreement, the other party being ready and willing to proceed and fulfil all his stipulations according to the contract, has never been suffered to recover for what he has thus advanced or done. The plaintiffs are seeking to recover the money advanced on the contract, every part of which defendant has performed, as far as he could, by his own acts, when they have voluntarily and causlessly refused to proceed, and thus have themselves rescinded the contract. It would be an alarming doctrine to hold that the plaintiffs might violate the contract and, because they chose to do so, make their own infraction of the agreement the basis of an action for money had and received."

Right to recover for services rendered.

In the note to Cutter v. Powell, 3 Smith, Lead. Cas. 85, it is said the next exception to the rule that no action of indebitatus assumpsit will lie while the special contract remains unperformed is to be found in a class of cases which establish the proposition that when one party has absolutely refused to perform the other party may rescind the contract and sue for what he has already done under it upon a quantum meruit.

Under a contract to clear a certain piece of land, if the owner takes away without just cause the oxen with which the work is to be done, and so puts it out of the plaintiff's power to proceed with the contract, plaintiff can recover for the labor he has performed. Blood v. Enos, 12 Vt. 623, 36 Am. Dec. 383.

If after a partial performance by one party, the other denies the existence of the contract, the former may consider the contract as at an end and recover for what he has done. Moorhead v. Fry, 24 Pa. 37.

In Merrill v. Ithaca & O. R. Co. 16 Wend. 566, 30 Am. Dec. 130, where contractors for building a railroad were hindered in the performance of the work by the owners of the road, the court said ties for whom the goods are to be manufactured?" And after showing that if, after having accepted a part, the defendants resolved not to accept the balance, the effect of compelling the plaintiffs to proceed with the manufacture and tender of them would be the enhancement of the damages the defendants would be required to pay, his lordship proceeds: "Upon the last issue, was there not evidence that the defendants refused to accept the residue of the chairs? If they had said: 'Make no more for us, for we will have nothing to do with them,'—was not that refusing to accept or receive them according to the contract? But the learned counsel for the defendants laid peculiar stress upon the words (of the plea): 'Nor did they prevent or discharge the plaintiffs from supplying the residue of the chairs, and from the further execution of the contract.' We consider the material part of the allegation which the last plea traverses to be that the defendants refused to receive the residue of the chairs. But, assuming that the whole must be proved, we think there is evidence to show that the defendants did prevent and discharge the plaintiffs from supplying the residue of the chairs, and from the further execution of the contract. It is contended that 'prevent,' here, must mean obstruction by physical force; and, in answer to a question from the court, we were told it would not be a preventing of delivery of goods if the purchaser were to write, in a letter to the person who ought to supply them, 'Should you come to my house to deliver them, I will blow your brains out.' But may I not reasonably say that I was prevented from completing a contract by being desired not to complete it? Are there no means of preventing an act from being done, except by physical force or brute violence?" After reviewing and commenting upon cases cited, it is then held that the plaintiffs were entitled to a verdict "on pleas traversing allegations that they were ready and willing to perform the contract, that the defendants refused to accept the residue of the goods, and prevented and discharged the plaintiffs from manufacturing and delivering them."

Without further quotation from cases, it seems clear, both upon principle and by authority, that where one party to an executory contract refuses to treat it as subsisting and binding upon him, or by his act and conduct shows that he has renounced it and no longer considers himself bound by it, there is, in legal effect, a prevention of performance by the other party. And it can make no difference whether the contract has been partially performed, or the time for performance has not yet arrived; nor is it important whether the renunciation be by declaration of the party that he will be no longer bound, or by acts and conduct which clearly evince that that determination has been reached and is being acted upon. It would seem clear, on principle, that a mere declaration of the party of an intention not to be bound, or acts and conduct in repudiation of the contract, will not, of themselves, amount to a breach, so as to create an effectual they might have stopped and sued for a breach of covenant, but that, since they went on at largely increased expenses, they were not bound by the terms of their contract, but were entitled to recover what the work was worth.

If a contract to work a farm until the decease of the owner in consideration of a deed of the farm at that time is broken by the owner selling the farm, the other party may treat the contract as rescinded and sue for the value of his services. Canada v. Canada, 6 Cush. 15.

If the failure of one prevents performance by the other the latter may abandon and bring assumpsit for what he has done. Wilson v. Bauman, 80 Ill. 494.

Although one party is not guilty of such a failure to perform as prevents the other party from performing, the latter may abandon the contract and sue in assumpsit for what he has done under it. Webster v. Enfield, 10 Ill. 298.

If one who has contracted to dig and stone a well, after having partially completed it, is prevented from further work by the action of the other party in filling up the hole, he may abandon the contract and sue for the work which he has done. Connelly v. Devos, 87 Conn. 570.

In Festing v. Hunt, 6 Manitoba L. Rep. 381, the statement in the note to Cutter v. Powell, 28 Smith, Lead. Cas. 35, is quoted with approval that, "it is an invariably true proposition that wherever one of the parties to a special contract not under seal, has in an unqualified manner refused to perform his side of the contract, . . . the other party has thereupon a right to elect to rescind it, and may in doing so immediately sue on a quantum meruit for any portion thereof which he had done under it previously to the rescission."

If, in consideration of services to be rendered, a person agrees to give 240 acres of land, and while the services are being performed he states that he will only give 100 acres, the other party may repudiate the contract and sue upon a quantum meruit for work and labor. Festing v. Hunt, supra.

Where an agent employed for an agreed commission to sell land finds a purchaser, after which the seller refuses to convey to him, the agent may abandon the contract and resort to an action founded on the special promise which the law would infer from such a state of facts, for his compensation. Prickett v. Badger, 1 C. B. N. S. 298, 28 L. J. C. P. 33, 3 Jur. N. S. 66.

There is one case which appears to be at variance with the rule followed in the preceding cases. In it the ruling was that, "under a contract to do the county printing at certain rates the printer cannot, upon the county's refusing to furnish all the printing to him, repudiate the contract and recover for what he has done upon a quantum meruit. But his remedy is to recover at contract rates and to sue for the damages caused by the breach of the contract." Quigley v. Sumner County Comrs. 24 Kan. 233.

But that ruling is placed more upon the ground that the county was not guilty of a breach of contract than on a denial to recover on a quantum meruit in case of a breach.

Recovery of value of property delivered.

If property has been delivered or money paid under an executory contract which the other party refuses to perform either wholly or in an essential part, the injured party may either sue for a breach of the contract or treat it as rescinded and sue for the value of the property delivered. Drew v. Claggett, 30 N. H. 431; Brown v. Mahurin, Id. 161; Pierce v. Duncan, 22 N. H. 18; Fuller v. Little, 7 N. H. 535; Randlet v. Herren, 30 N. H. 102.

Upon the sale of property for notes which were renunciation of the contract; for one party cannot, by any act or declaration, destroy the binding force and efficacy of the contract. Kadish v. Young, supra. As said by Bowen, L. J., in Johnstone v. Milling, L. R. 16 Q. B. Div. 460: "Its real operation appears to be to give the promisee the right of electing either to treat the declaration as brutum fulmen, and holding fast to the contract to wait till the time for its performance has arrived, or to act upon it, and treat it as a final assertion by the promisor that he is no longer bound by the contract, and a wrongful renunciation of the contractual relation into which he has entered. . . . If he does so elect, it becomes a breach of contract, and he can recover upon it as such." Upon the election to treat the renunciation, whether by declaration or by acts and conduct, as a breach of the contract, the rights of the parties are to be regarded as then culminating, and the contractual relation ceases to exist, except for the purpose of maintaining the action for the recovery of damages.

These views are amply sustained by numerous decided cases. In Hochster v. De Latour, 20 Eng. L. & Eq. 157, the plaintiff contracted to enter into the service of the defendant, as a courier, and in such capacity attend him in travels about the continent of Europe, the service to begin on June 1, and continue for at least three months, at fixed monthly wages. But before the 1st of June, although the plaintiff was ready and willing to perform, the defendant renounced the contract, and signified his determination to the plaintiff no longer to be bound by it; and the plaintiff, before the time for performance had arrived, brought assumpsit to recover his damages for the breach. It is there said that "it is surely much more rational, and more for the benefit of both parties, that after the renunciation of the agreement by the defendant the plaintiff should be at liberty to consider himself absolved from any future performance of it, retaining his right to sue for any damage he has suffered from the breach of it. . . . The man who wrongfully renounces a contract into which he has deliberately entered cannot justly complain if he is immediately sued for a compensation in damages by the man whom he has injured; and it seems reasonable to allow an option to the injured party either to sue immediately, or to wait till the time when the act was to be done, still holding it as prospectively binding for the exercise of the option, which may be advantageous to the innocent party, and cannot be prejudicial to the wrongdoer." And it was then held that, after the defendant had signified his determination not to be bound by the contract, the plaintiff was entitled to bring his action immediately, and was not obliged to wait until after the day for the performance to begin had arrived. In Frost v. Knight, supra, the defendant had promised to marry the plaintiff upon the death of his father. While his father was still living, he repudiated the engagement, and announced his intention not to fulfil his promise. The plaintiff, without waiting for the death of the father, at once to be indorsed by the purchaser, the seller, after having delivered a part of the property, may rescind the contract and recover the value of the property delivered upon the purchaser's refusing to indorse the notes. Hayden v. Reynolds, 54 Iowa, 157.

If one who has performed a part of his contract is prevented from completing it by the failure of the other party, he may abandon it and recover for what he has done. Hoagland v. Moore, 2 Blackf. 167.

In that case it appears that certain hogs and corn were to be sold for a certain amount cash and notes, and after some were delivered and a demand was made for the cash, it was refused and the court held that the seller was justified in considering the special contract at an end and that he might recover the value of what he had delivered under it.

If articles are delivered in satisfaction of a debt, and the creditor afterwards recovers judgment for the whole debt, the debtor may treat the contract as rescinded and recover the value of the articles delivered. Snow v. Prescott, 12 N. H. 535, overruling Tilton v. Gordon, 1 N. H. 83.

Under a contract for lumber for a raft, if after a part has been delivered the purchaser declines any more, the seller is excused from further delivery and may recover for what he has delivered. Stewart v. Short, 130 Pa. 385.

V L. Right to abandon performance and recover for breach.

a. Performance excused.

In Skinner v. Tinker, 34 Barb. 333, in which the action was for refusal to enter into a partnership, where it appeared that plaintiff was notified that defendant would not enter into the agreement, whereupon he did not go to the stipulated place, but began his action for damages, the court said performance by plaintiff was unnecessary because defendant had given notice of his determination not to complete the partnership. The plaintiff was then entitled to damages, if any were sustained, up to that time, but not to prospective damages.

If a contract is wrongfully terminated by one party, the other is entitled to recover for a breach thereof without showing that he continued to be ready and willing to perform his part after such termination; as, where plaintiff was to make boxes for defendant out of material to be furnished by the latter, and before the time limited by the contract expired defendant refused to furnish any more material and said there was no more work, plaintiff to recover for breach need not show that he continued ready to perform on his part. Bond v. Carpenter, 15 R. I. 440.

The refusal by one party will dispense with a tender by the other. Grandy v. Small, 5 Jones, L. 51; Abrams v. Suttles, Busbee, L. 99; Shaw v. Grandy, 5 Jones, L. 57.

Where the contract was for the production of an opera the court held that the writer was entitled to a judgment for the amount fixed by the contract in lieu of royalties in case the opera was not produced by a given time, although he did not tender the complete score, where before his default the defendant had announced positively that he would not produce the opera. Thorne v. French, 4 Misc. 426.

Where the contract obligated plaintiff to deliver to defendant 400,000 bricks, and when a cargo containing part of them was delivered defendant refused without adequate cause to receive them, the court held that the plaintiff was not required to tender the whole 400,000 in order to put defendant in default, but that he was entitled to treat the contract as broken and bring the action immediately. Canda v. Wick, 100 N. Y. 127.

Under a contract to purchase malt at the rate of brought her action to recover damage for the breach. And the court there says: "The promisee, if he pleases, may treat the notice of intention as inoperative, and await the time when the contract is to be executed, and then hold the other party responsible for all the consequences of nonperformance. But in that case he keeps the contract alive for the benefit of the other party as well as his own; he remains subject to all his own obligations and liabilities under it, and enables the other party, not only to complete the contract, if so advised, notwithstanding his previous repudiation of it, but also to take advantage of any supervening circumstance which would justify him in declining to complete it. On the other hand, the promisee may, if he thinks proper, treat the repudiation of the other party as a wrongful putting an end to the contract, and may at once bring his action as on a breach of it; and in such action he will be entitled to such damages as would have arisen from the non-performance of the contract at the appointed time, subject, however, to abatement in respect of any circumstances which may have afforded him the means of mitigating his loss." The case of Freeth v. Burr, supra, already quoted from, is an instructive case, and fully sustains Hochster v. De Latour, and other cases of like tenor before cited. It is there said that the test of whether there is a renunciation or not is "whether the acts and conduct of the party evince an intention no longer to be bound by the contract." In Mercy Steel & Iron Co. v. Naylor, L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 648, Jessel, M. R., reaffirms and approves the doctrine of Freeth v. Burr, and holds that the question of whether there has been a renunciation of the contract by the defendant is a question of fact, to be determined by the consideration of the nature of the breach, and the circumstances under which it occurred. The case, however, went off upon the holding that the circumstances were not sufficient to evince a determination on the part of the defendant to put an end to the contract, and to be no longer bound by it. The decision was affirmed by the House of Lords on appeal, Lord Selbourne there saying: "You must look at the actual circumstances of the case, in order to see whether the one party to the contract is relieved from its future performance by the conduct of the other. You must examine what that conduct is, so as to see whether it amounts to a renunciation,—to an absolute refusal to perform the contract,—such as would amount to a rescission if he had the power to rescind, and whether the other party may accept it as a reason for not performing his part; and I think that nothing more is necessary, in the present case, than to look at the conduct of the parties, and see whether anything of that kind has taken place here." Mercy Steel & Iron Co. v. Naylor, 9 App. Cas. 438. See also Roper v. Johnson, L. R. 8 C. P. 167; Es parte Stapleton, L. R. 10 Ch. Div. 586; Planché v. Colburn, 8 Bing. 14; Danube & B. S. Railway & Kusterje Harbour Co. v. Xenos, 13 C. B. N. S. 825.

The principle seems to have found general recognition by the courts of this country, a few only of which need be noticed. In Mas-

1,000 bushels per month, if the purchaser after accepting some of the deliveries absolutely refuses to accept any more, the sellers are not required to set apart the necessary quantity each month to entitle themselves to maintain an action for the damages caused by the breach. Haines v. Tucker, 50 N. H. 308.

If one of the parties to a contract absents himself from the place of performance under such circumstances that it is evident he does not intend to complete his agreement, the other party may sue for a breach without completing all preparations for the performance on his part, if he was at the time ready and willing to perform. Smith v. Lewis, 24 Conn. 624, 63 Am. Dec. 180, 26 Conn. 110.

Upon refusal of the defendant to accept articles to be manufactured for it by plaintiff, plaintiff need not complete the manufacture and tender them before suing for the damages. Hinckley v. Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Co. 121 U. S. 264, 30 L. ed. 967.

In Jones v. Barkley, 2 Dougl. 689, where the contract was to assign certain bank stock, plaintiff pleaded that he was ready and willing to execute and deliver a general release and tendered a draft, but defendant absolutely discharged him from executing it. Defendant pleaded that the assignment was not executed, and the court said: "The party must show that he is ready; but if the other stops him on the ground of an intention not to perform on his part, it is not necessary for the first to go further and do a negatory act."

If one of the parties to the contract seeks to recover without having performed his obligation, he must show that he was ready and willing to perform, and that defendant had notice of it, notwithstanding which defendant refused to carry out his part of the agreement. Doogood v. Rose, 9 C. B. 132, 30 L. R. A.

The vendee must tender the unpaid purchase money as a general thing, whether he wishes to rescind or enforce the agreement. Irvin v. Bleakley, 67 Pa. 24.

If the covenants are independent plaintiff need not allege performance on his part in order to recover for defendant's breach; but in case plaintiff's covenants were all to be performed prior to the performance by defendant, he must allege performance in order to recover. Gallup v. Burnell, Brayton (Vt.) 191.

b. Recovery for breach.

There are cases, of which Rawson v. Johnson, 1 East, 203, is an example, in which the question has been discussed as to the duty of averring performance or readiness to perform in order to maintain an action for breach by the other party. Such cases can throw no light upon the question here under discussion because the court was not considering the right of rescission or abandonment and not having such question in mind of course its ruling could not be made authority upon the question.

Where a party to a mining lease disables himself from performing his covenants the owner of the land may treat the contract as rescinded and claim damages for the entire breach. Keek v. Heber, 1 Pa. Adv. R. 671.

There are numerous cases in which the party performing on his part may terminate the contract as to the future and still hold the delinquent party for its performance up to the time of its termination. Hurst v. Trow Printing & R. Co. 2 Misc. 381. Refusal to accept goods sold is a breach which gives an action for damages. Cahen v. Platt, 69 N. Y. 848, 25 Am. Rep. 206.

Where, during the process of constructing an enterton v. Brooklyn, 7 Hill, 61, 42 Am. Dec. 88, the plaintiffs undertook and partially performed their contract with defendants to furnish material, etc., for the construction of the city hall. By order of the defendants, the work was indefinitely suspended, and the plaintiffs brought suit to recover damages, including future profits. The principle announced in the English cases before noted is approved. Beardsley, J., there said: "The party who is ready to perform is entitled to full indemnity for the loss of his contract. He should not be made to suffer by the delinquency of the other party, but ought to recover precisely what he would have made by performance. This is as sound in morals as it is in law. . . . The plaintiffs were not bound to wait till the period had elapsed for the complete performance of the agreement, nor to make successive offers of performance, in order to recover all their damages. They might regard the contract as broken up, so far as to absolve them from making further efforts to perform, and give them a right to recover full damages as for a total breach." The case of Hoemer v. Wilson has been already cited. In Derby v. Johnson, supra, after holding that, by the order of the defendants to discontinue the work, the plaintiffs were prevented from further performance, it is said: "The plaintiffs might, in addition, in another form of action, have recovered their damages for being prevented from completing the whole work. In making these claims the plaintiffs would be acting upon the contract as still subsisting and binding, and they might well do so, for it doubtless continued binding on the defendants." In Hinckley v. Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Co. 121 U. S. 264, 30 L. ed. 967, the defendant agreed to purchase from the plaintiff steel rails, to be drilled as the defendant might direct. The defendant refused to give the directions, and at his instance the rolling of the rails was postponed until after the time of delivery, when the defendant refused to accept any rails under the contract. It was there said: "The defendant contends that the plaintiff should have manufactured the rails and tendered them to the defendant, and, upon his refusal to accept and pay for them, should have sold them in the market at Chicago, and held the defendant responsible for the difference between what they would have brought on such sale and the contract price. But we think no such rule is applicable to this case. This was a contract for the manufacture of an article, and not for the sale of an existing article. By reason of the facts found as to the conduct and action of the defendant, the plaintiff was excused from actually manufacturing the rails and the rule of damages applicable to the case of the refusal of a purchaser to take an existing article is not applicable to a case like the present." In Haines v. Trucker, 50 N. H. 307, the defendants agreed to purchase of the plaintiffs 5,000 bushels of malt, and to receive and pay for the same at the rate of 1,000 bushels per month. Although plaintiffs were prepared to deliver the 1,000 bushels per month, the defendants called for and received less than 1,000 bushels during the first three months. The plaintiffs informed define which has been ordered, the order is countermanded, the manufacturer may treat the countermand as a breach of the contract, stop work on the engine, and bring an immediate action for damages caused to him by defendant's breach. Hoemer v. Wilson, 7 Mich. 304, 74 Am. Dec. 718.

Under a contract to furnish oats to the government, the court says: "This testimony clearly shows that the government rejected oats for its own convenience, and that the claimant was not in fault for nondelivery. The refusal of the government to receive merchantable oats within the life of the contract when offered . . . at different times and in such quantities that they might have been disposed of conveniently if there had been any disposition to do so, will excuse the claimant from any obligation under the contract on his part. . . . The claimant was ready but could not perform because the government would not permit him; he was not bound under continuing obligation to, and any reasonable offer and improper refusal put an end to the contract." Gibbon v. United States, 2 Ct. Cl. 421.

A case which has some bearing on this question, although the discussion did not turn directly on the right to rescind or abandon, is Cort v. Ambergate, N. B. & E. J. R. Co. 17 Q. B. 127, 20 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 460, 6 Eng. L. & Eq. 230, 15 Jur. 877. In that case plaintiff had contracted to manufacture some chairs for defendant. Before they were all completed defendant notified plaintiff not to make any more as defendant would not accept them if they were tendered. Plaintiff then brought suit for breach of the contract without completing the chairs, but alleging its readiness and willingness to complete them. The contention was that there could be no readiness or willingness unless they were actually completed and tendered. The court held that where there is an executory contract for the manufacture and supply of goods from time to time to be paid for after delivery, if the purchaser having accepted and paid for a portion of the goods contracted for gives notice to the vendor not to manufacture any more as he has no occasion for them and will not accept or pay for them, the vendor having been desirous and able to complete the contract may, without manufacturing or tendering the rest of the goods, maintain an action against the purchaser for breach of the contract.

Under an agreement to give certain property in consideration of the cultivation of certain other property for a certain time, if the one making the agreement gives written notice that he will not be bound by the agreement while the other party is not in default, and thereupon the other surrenders possession of the property, a suit may be immediately brought for the breach without waiting for the time to arrive when the performance was to be consummated. Remy v. Olds, 88 Cal. 537.

A distinction must here be made between a rescission and an abandonment of the contract. It is held that in case the contract is rescinded no action can be maintained on it. But the injured party may abandon performance on his part and recover his damages so that the contract is the same as rescinded so far as his obligation is concerned, and at the same time his remedy is preserved.

A party cannot rescind a contract and then insist on damages for failure by the other party to perform. Hubbardston Lumber Co. v. Bates, 31 Mich. 158.

In United States v. Behan, 110 U. S. 338, 28 L. ed. 163, the court, in discussing the question of measure of damages in case of a breach of contract by the other party, assumes that there is a right to rescind on the part of the injured party, saying:

defendants that they were prepared to furnish the malt according to the terms of the contract, and requested them to receive the same at the rate of 1,000 bushels per month, which the defendants refused to do. The undelivered malt not utilized by plaintiffs themselves was sold on the market, and plaintiffs brought assumpsit against the defendants to recover damages for a breach of the contract. And it was there held, following Cort v. Ambergate, N. B. & E. Junction R. Co., supra, and other cases, that the conduct of the defendants amounted to an unqualified renunciation of the contract, and that after such renunciation it was no longer necessary that the plaintiffs should hold themselves in readiness to perform, or to go to the trouble and expense of offering what had already been refused. In Smith v. Lewis, 24 Conn. 624, 63 Am. Dec. 180, the doctrine as announced in Cort v. Ambergate N. B. & E. Junction R. Co., was approved and followed, and again reaffirmed in the same case. 26 Conn. 110. In these cases the holding was that, under a contract containing mutual and dependent covenants, a refusal on the part of the defendant to perform obviated the necessity of performance, or tender of performance, on the part of the plaintiff, after such refusal. See also, United States v. Behan, supra; Crabtree v. Messersmith, 19 Iowa, 179; Holloway v. Griffith, 32 Iowa, 409, 7 Am. Rep. 208; Dugan v. Anderson, 36 Md. 567, 11 Am. Rep. 509; Burtis v. Thompson, 42 N. Y. 246, 1 Am. Rep. 516; Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 362, 19 Am. Rep. 285; Smoot's Case, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 86, 21 L. ed. 107; Dingley v.

Oler, 117 U. S. 508, 29 L. ed. 988; Mountjoy v. Metzger (Pa.) 12 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 442.

It follows that, upon principle and authority, we are of opinion that instructions 2 and 3, when considered together, as they must be, announced the law to the jury correctly. The objection that the jury were thereby left to determine what were the "substantial provisions of the contract" is, in view of the course of the trial and facts proved, obviated by the instructions 7, 12, 13, 16, and 17, given for appellant. By the 7th, as will be observed, the jury were told that, if the defendant committed breaches still, if they did not defeat the substantial objects of the contract, or render it unattainable by proper performance on the part of Richards, Maynard & Co., then the plaintiff could not recover. By the 12th they were told that the mere failure or refusal of the defendant to pay the plaintiff or his firm any sum of money demanded and claimed to be due on account of services rendered under the contract could not be construed as an abandonment of the contract by the defendant, such as would entitle the plaintiff or his firm to maintain the present action. By the 16th the jury were told, as a matter of law, that, to entitle the plaintiff to recover in this case, it was necessary for him to establish, by a preponderance of the evidence, that he and Richards, Maynard & Co. were, by the acts of the defendant, prevented from performance of said contract on their part, etc. By the 17th they are again told that a failure to pay money due and owing to the plaintiff under the contract was not such an act or omission, in itself, on the

"When a party injured by the stoppage of a contract elects to rescind it, then, it is true, he cannot recover any damages for a breach of it, either for outlay or for loss of profits; he recovers the value of his services actually performed as upon a quantum meruit." Further it is said: "It is to be observed that when it is said in some of the books, that where one party puts an end to the contract the other cannot sue on the contract, but must sue for the work actually done under it, as upon a quantum meruit, this only means that he cannot sue the party in fault upon the stipulations contained in the contract, for he himself has been prevented from performing his own part of the contract upon which the stipulations depend. But surely, the wilful and wrongful putting an end to a contract, and preventing the other party from carrying it out, is itself a breach of the contract for which an action will lie for the recovery of all damage which the injured party has sustained. The distinction between those claims under a contract which result from a performance of it on the part of the claimant, and those claims under it which result from being prevented by the other party from performing it, has not always been attended to. The party who voluntarily and wrongfully puts an end to a contract and prevents the other party from performing it, is estopped from denying that the injured party has not been damaged."

c. Lost profits as damages.

There may be cases where the action of one party to a contract will be such as to constitute a defense to the other party, when sued, for a failure to perform, and yet not sufficient to authorize the latter to abandon the contract himself, and as plaintiff to entitle him to receive profits which he would have made if it had been fully performed. 30 L. R. A.

Armstrong v. St. Paul & P. Coal & I. Co. 45 Minn. 113, 118.

If corn is to be delivered in quantities from time to time within forty-five days, and a quantity to be delivered is not taken, the seller need not bring all the corn to the point of delivery, but may abandon the contract and sue for the loss of profits. Hughes v. United States, 4 Ct. Cl. 64.

Where plaintiff contracted to paint ten houses and defendant only furnished four, and then plaintiff sued for the value of the work put upon the four, the court said: If the contract was terminated against the will of the plaintiff he could have sued for a breach thereof, and recovered as damages the profits he would have made if allowed to complete the work; or he could at his election have waived the contract, treated it as rescinded, and brought an action on the common count for work and labor generally, and recovered whatever the work done was actually worth. As he has treated the contract as rescinded, and brought this action for work and labor generally, he could recover what such work was actually worth, provided the contract was entire. If, on the other hand, it was separable, or divisible, for the houses finished, he would be entitled to the contract price, and for those not finished damages to the amount of the profits he would have made if allowed to complete them. Dibol v. Minott, 9 Iowa, 403.

If one who has contracted to get out logs is prevented by the fault of the other party from completing his contract, he is entitled to recover the contract price for the logs actually delivered and profits on what he was prevented from delivering, as well as the extra expense to which he was put by defendant's default. Salvo v. Duncan, 40 Wis. 151; Wood v. Schettler, 23 Wis. 501.

One who has contracted to haul logs out of the part of the defendant, as would prevent the plaintiff from completing the contract. And by the 13th instruction given on behalf of the defendant the jury were told that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiffs' firm closed their transfer house for the reasons stated in their letter of June 11, 1886, to Mr. Amsden, namely, for refusal to pay their claim of $2,592.95, and their account for the month of May, 1886, "and for no other reason," then the plaintiff could not recover, and the verdict must be for defendant. So, by the 11th instruction given on behalf of defendant, the jury were told that, in determining whether the damages arising from any breach of the contract by the defendant can be ascertained and compensated for, they were not to take into consideration any refusal of the defendant to submit any differences between it and Richards, Maynard & Co. to arbitration; that the refusal to submit matters in dispute to arbitration was not such a breach of the terms of the contract as to warrant a recovery for such breach. It seems clear, therefore, under the facts proved, that the question submitted to the jury was whether the acts and conduct of the defendant showed a fixed determination to be no longer bound by the substantial provisions of the contract upon its part. As already seen, the consideration moving to Richards, Maynard & Co. for entering into the contract was the stipulation, on defendant's behalf, to deliver, to be weighed and transferred through their house, all grain received by it from western roads, to be transported east over its lines, that it could control; and that practically the only benefit to be derived by Richards, Maynard & Co. from the contract was by the sale of weights of grain thus transferred. The evidence tended to show that the railroad company had repudiated its liability to perform this part of its contract, and its duty, under the contract, to use the weights derived from the plaintiffs' firm only in billing the grain to destination, but gave the same away, so as to deprive plaintiffs' firm of the profits it would derive by the sale of such weights.

From what has preceded, no extended discussion will be necessary of the point made, that there was a variance between the special count of the declaration and proof. It was alleged "that on the 16th day of June, 1886, the defendant abandoned the contract on its part, neglected and refused to perform the same, and refused, without any reasonable or just cause, to be bound by the same," etc. As already shown, the effect of the position taken by, and the conduct of, appellant, was a denial of its obligation to perform the substantial parts of the contract on its part.

In connection with this point, it will be proper to notice the contention that in the suit brought June 5, 1886, before referred to, the plaintiff recovered damages for all the breaches of the contract up to the bringing of that suit, and that therefore such breaches, being merged in the judgment in that cause, could not subsequently be made the occasion, by Richards, Maynard & Co., for treating the contract as abandoned by appellant. In bringing that suit the plaintiff undoubtedly timber is justified in abandoning the contract and suing for loss of profits if the owner does not comply with his contract to furnish a road until the season has so far advanced that the contract cannot be completed during it. Corbett v. Anderson, 85 Wis. 218.

If a boarder leaves his boarding house in violation of the terms of his contract, the landlord need not make a subsequent tender of performance, but may treat the contract as abandoned, and sue for loss of profits occasioned by the breach. Crane v. Powell, 46 N. Y. R. 668.

If one who has undertaken to manufacture machines absolutely refuses to continue with his contract the other party is absolved from the duty of giving further notice of readiness to deliver, but may recover pay for the machines not taken. Robinson v. Frank, 107 N. Y. 655.

A party who has contracted to furnish marble for a building, but who is prevented from furnishing it by the refusal of the other party to complete his contract, may recover the profits which he lost by the latter's refusal. Masterton v. Brooklyn, 7 Hill, 61, 42 Am. Dec. 38.

In Wolcott v. Mount, 36 N. J. L. 263, 13 Am. Rep. 438, the court says in argument that if an executory contract is put an end to by the refusal of the one party to complete it, for such breach the other party may recover such profits as would have accrued to him as the direct and immediate result of the performance of the contract.

Repeated defaults on the part of the owner of property to make payments to one who has contracted to do work on it will authorize the latter to abandon the work and recover the profits he would have made had he been permitted to finish it. Grand Rapids & B. C. R. Co. v. Van Dusen, 29 Mich. 431.

Upon the absolute refusal of the purchaser to take any more of the goods to be furnished, the seller may treat the contract as broken and sue for the damages he has then sustained, but he cannot hold the purchaser for the price of the goods unless he keeps himself ready to deliver them according to the terms of the contract. Collins v. Delaporte, 115 Mass. 162.

One who has contracted to take down the trusses and spars of a building may abandon the work and sue for lost profits if the owner by reason of changes in the building makes it unsafe to work there, so that the contract cannot be fulfilled. Lynch v. Seilers, 41 La. Ann. 375, 5 L. R. A. 682.

The distinction appears to be this, that in order to justify a recovery of lost profits the conduct of the defaulting party must have been such as to amount to a prevention of further performance.

Failure to pay an instalment of the contract price when it is due will give a right to sue for what has been done, but will not give a right to abandon the contract and sue for a loss of profits. Loss of profits can only be sued for in case the default of the other party operates as a denial of the right to proceed and complete the work contracted for. Moore v. Taylor, 42 Hun. 45.

If payments by a city to its contractor are stopped because the funds applicable to work are exhausted, the contractor cannot suspend work and recover lost profits, although he might sue for what was then due. Drhew v. Altoona, 121 Pa. 401.

In Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Richards, 40 Ill. App. 580, the appellate court said: "We have no doubt that the conduct which will justify a party in abandoning a contract and entitle him to recover, not only for the work he has done, but for the profits he can prove he would have made had the contract gone on, must be such as in effect prevents treated the contract as subsisting, and had not then elected to treat it as abandoned by the defendant, and to sue for prospective damages. The suit was brought, and recovery had for actual breaches to the time of bringing it. We are not required to determine the question thus presented. If it should be conceded that the plaintiff's claim in bringing that action is inconsistent with his right to show such breaches in this proceeding, it could not affect the result. Subsequently to the bringing of that action, as already shown, the railroad company refused to recede from its previous position, both in respect of its obligation under the contract to deliver cars to Richards, Maynard & Co., and to observe its contract in respect of the use to be made of the weights. And the evidence tends to show that at the time Richards, Maynard & Co. closed their transfer house, appellant was denying its liability under the contract, and evinced a clear intention not to be bound by its provisions.

It is urged, however, that there was here only a partial breach, arising from a difference in the construction of the contract, and that there was at no time a repudiation or renunciation of the contract by appellant,—that it was at all times desirous of keeping it in force, and performing it. These are, as a matter of course, questions of fact, which are conclusively settled by the judgment of the appellate court. But in view of the instructions asked and refused, which sought to take the case from the jury, it may be remarked that the evidence tended to show a repudiation by the railway company of the substantial provisions of the contract, which formed the consideration for the execution of it by plaintiffs' firm. It was not enough, to show that there was no repudiation of the contract obligation by the appellant, to prove that appellant was furnishing some cars to be transferred through plaintiffs' transfer house, whereby plaintiff was partially receiving the benefits he claimed under the contract. The correspondence between the parties before and after the 5th of June, 1886, shows that appellant was not delivering cars of grain to be transferred through the transfer house because it recognized any obligation on its part to do so, but claimed, and acted on such claim, that it was only bound to deliver such cars as it saw proper. In other words, it refused to be bound by the provision of the contract requiring it to deliver cars to plaintiffs' firm. Under the construction of the contract upon which it had acted, and was proposing to continue to act, it was under no obligation to deliver any cars to be transferred by plaintiffs' firm, thus absolutely repudiating its contract liability to do so. True, it had not altogether ceased to deliver some cars to be thus transferred, but they were not delivered because of any contract liability to do it, but at their convenience and option. Its persistence in this course of conduct had been shown by its repeated refusal to submit the matters in dispute to arbitration under the contract. The president of the company wrote, in reply to the demand of plaintiffs' firm for arbitration, "I have to say that this company having at all times faithfully performed its obligations the performance of the contract; the acts for which the abandonment is made must be such as indicate an intention not to fulfil, and such as affect the very substance of the contract; moreover we think it should appear that such acts are deliberately done, and are not the result of something inadvertently overlooked."

Under a contract to construct sixteen locomotives to be paid for as delivered, the court held that the failure to pay for one when it was delivered did not authorize the abandonment of the contract and a suit for the loss of profits on the entire contract. The judge delivering the opinion says: "I have found no case where the plaintiff has been allowed to recover for the losses sustained by not being permitted to complete the contract, unless he has been prevented from going on with his work by the positive affirmative act of the other party, but where the other party has neglected to do some act without which the plaintiff could not in the nature of things go on with his contract, as where he refused to furnish a place whereon to erect a building or to furnish material which by the contract was to be put in the work and which was to be provided by him,—in such case the act to be done is clearly a condition precedent and indispensable to enable the other party to go on. Where the act which defendant was bound to do is by the terms of the contract made a condition precedent to the performance, either in the nature of things or evidently in the contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was entered into, then the failure to do the act has of itself prevented the other party from performing as much as if he had been forbidden to perform." Palm v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 18 Ill. 217. And the reasoning of that case was followed in Christian County v. Overholt, Id. 222.

VII. What will warrant rescission.

General rules.

Not every breach of a special contract authorizes the other party to treat it as rescinded. Dubois v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 4 Wend. 285.

If a person who has undertaken to perform a piece of work does an act which shows conclusively that he does not intend to perform his undertaking, the law will authorize the other party to put an end to the contract, and in case he exercises his option the defense to any action brought upon the contract will be full. Drake v. Gorce, 22 Ala. 409.

The right of rescission depends, not on whether the conduct of one party was inconsistent with the contract, but whether the conduct of one party to the contract was really inconsistent with an intention to be bound any longer by the contract. Midland R. Co. v. Ontario Rolling Mills, 10 Ont. App. 677.

A positive and absolute refusal—a deliberate repudiation of the stipulations of the contract—gives to the other party as an alternative remedy the right to assent to such an abandonment and treat the contract as dissolved. Graves v. White, 87 N. Y. 463.

A party may have a right to rescind, although he could not enforce the contract. Thus, if at the time for performance he goes to the place and makes a tender for the express purpose of putting the other party in default and not in good faith, although this will not give him a right to enforce the contract yet it will permit him to treat it as rescinded. Lewis v. White, 16 Ohio St. 444.

A party may rescind a contract for the refusal to execute a substantial part of it. Sumner v. Parker, 36 N. H. 449.

under said contract, I do not consider there are any matters calling for arbitration," and declining the request for arbitration. While it is undoubtedly true that refusal to arbitrate would not, under the provisions of this contract, justify the plaintiff in treating the contract as renounced by appellant company, yet such refusal, and the correspondence in respect of the matter, tend to show the persistency with which appellant refused to be bound by the contract.

It is also objected that the court erred in the admission of testimony: First, that appellee was permitted to prove the cost of the transfer house, etc. It is a sufficient answer to say that it does not appear the evidence was objected to. It is, however, said that the court erred in refusing to give the 5th instruction for appellant, which was, in effect, that no recovery could be had for the cost or value of the transfer house and its equipments in this action. This instruction might with propriety have been given, but its refusal was not error. At the beginning of the hearing before the jury, counsel for the plaintiff stated that he did not attempt to show the breaches for the purpose of recovering for them, but proved them for the purpose of showing simply a breach of the contract, which entitled the plaintiff to abandon the further performance of it, and sue for damages for loss of future profits, when the following colloquy occurred: Mr. Jewett (for defendant): "In other words, there is nothing but the claim for future profits in this case." Mr. Pence (for plaintiff): "That is all there is in this case." Later, and at the close of plaintiff's testimony, the plaintiff sought to show what the transfer house was worth, "standing there useless for the purpose for which it had been erected," to which an objection by the defendant was sustained. This all took place in the presence of the jury, and would leave no question in the mind of any intelligent person as to the damages sought and allowed to be recovered. It seems clear that the jury could not have understood that they were to take anything into consideration other than the profits to be derived from the transfer of grain under the contract, and they were in effect so told by the 4th instruction given at the instance of plaintiff.

On the trial of the cause, certain letters written, one by Mr. Blodgett and one by Mr. Clark, commendatory of plaintiffs' method of transferring grain, etc., were offered and read in evidence over the objection of defendant. That these letters were incompetent scarcely admits of question, and it is difficult to perceive upon what principle they were admitted. That the error was a harmless one is equally apparent. It was not controverted that the "Richards method," so called, accomplished the purpose, nor was there any pretense that it was a failure, so that the plaintiffs did not perform their contract.

Other points are made in argument, which, in view of the length of this opinion, seemingly made necessary by the very ingenious and able argument of the learned counsel, it must suffice to say, have been carefully considered, and are not deemed of such gravity as to warrant further discussion. Finding no prejudicial error in this record, the judgment of the appellate court will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

Second rehearing denied October 26, 1894.

It is not only an absolute refusal in words to perform the contract, but also any claim manifested by words or acts of an intention not to perform it according to its terms that will authorize the other party to treat it as a repudiation and bring his action. Armstrong v. St. Paul & P. Coal & I. Co. 48 Minn. 118, 119.

In Lines v. Rees (1837), in the note to Cutter v. Powell, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 35, where one who had contracted to build a house called on the other to pay for what had been done and the other said that "he would not—perhaps never," it was contended that the buyer was entitled to treat this as a rescission of the special contract and recover on the quantum meruit; and the court admitted that this would be so had the refusal been absolute and unqualified, but that the refusal to pay must be considered with reference to the demand, which was made too soon.

Under a contract to execute a bond and mortgage on property to a certain amount in consideration of a conveyance of it, the refusal to accept a deed and give the mortgage on the ground of a modification of the contract the terms of which had not been complied with does not of itself give a right to rescind the contract, but before it can be done an absolute demand must be made on the obligor and opportunity given him to comply with the demand after notice,—that a failure to do so will be treated as a rescission. Davison v. Associates of Jersey Co. 71 N. Y. 333.

A refusal to make a certain payment under the contract because of a dispute as to whether or not it was due will not authorize the other party to rescind. Winchester v. Newton, 2 Allen, 492.

There is a class of cases which hold that when the breach by a party to the contract is attended merely with loss that can be compensated in damages, it will not authorize an abandonment by the other party, but that he may bring his action for the particular breach. Geary v. Bangs, 37 Ill. App. 301.

In Smoot's Case, 32 U. S. 15 Wall. 38, 21 L. ed. 107, the court held that the mere adoption of new rules for the inspection of horses to be furnished was not sufficient to warrant a refusal to comply with the contract to furnish them, and the court cites with approval the rule that to put an end to the contract there must be an absolute refusal by one party, which must be treated as such by the party to whom the promise was made.

Where, after an agreement was entered into with the government to furnish horses to it, it promulgated rules for their inspection which the court held to be no breach of the contract, there was no right to rescind. United States v. Wormer, 30 U. S. 13 Wall. 26, 20 L. ed. 530.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Withers v. Reynolds, 2 Barn. & Ad. 882; State v. Davis, 53 N. J. L. 144; Spicer v. Cooper, 1 Q. B. 424.

In this class of cases the fundamental question is, whether the failure of one party to deliver or to pay for one instalment discharges the other from his duty to accept or pay for later instalments.

Any breach may give the injured party a cause of action for damages, but every breach does not justify rescission.

It is clear that one party cannot be considered as discharged from his duty to perform without the express or implied consent of the other. And if such consent is implied from a breach, it must be by reason of the fact that

Where one contracts to sell real estate to which at the time he has no title, but lets the purchaser into possession, he cannot forfeit the contract for non-payment while he is not in a position to perform his part so as to enable him to oust the purchaser from possession. Getty v. Peters, 32 Mich. 651, 10 L. R. A. 465.

If a person sells an article to which he has no title the purchaser may rescind and recover back what he paid for it. Wilkinson v. Ferree, 24 Pa. 190; Reynolds v. Harris, 9 Cal. 388.

It was at first held in England that if a vendee does not take away the goods upon request, although he has paid earnest money, the agreement is dissolved and the vendor is at liberty to sell them to another person. Lankfort v. Tiler, 1 Saik. 113.

But in a later visu prius case it was held that the neglect of the purchaser to take away the goods purchased after receiving notice from the seller to do so does not entitle the latter to annul the contract and resell the goods. Greaves v. Ashlin, 3 Campb. 426.

The American cases seem to have followed the earlier English case.

Where the contract fixes a time within which the property bought is to be paid for and taken away, if it is not taken away within such time the vendor may rescind the contract and refuse to deliver. Kitchen v. Stokes, 9 W. N. C. 48.

If the buyer of chattels agrees to take them out of possession of the seller by a specified time, and does not do so, the seller may treat the contract as the performance in question was conditioned upon the performance of that term of the contract which has been broken.

A breach which, in itself, may be regarded as an invitation to an abandonment of the contract, or a consent to a discharge of the other party from his obligations under it, must be one going to the essence of the contract, and not merely to some part of it, so that it may appear that the performance insisted upon was conditioned upon the performance which has failed.

Where a covenant goes only to part of the consideration on both sides, and a breach of such covenant may be paid for in damages, it is an independent covenant, and an action may be maintained for a breach of the covenant on the part of the defendant, without averring performance in the declaration.

Portage v. Cole, 1 Wm. Saund. 819.

The inquiry is: Is the value to the injured party of the residue of the contract, if performed, dependent upon the performance of that part which has been broken?

If not, clearly such performance of the residue, plus damages for the particular breach, gives the injured party the equivalent of full performance.

A failure to make one delivery or one payment is not a breach which goes to the essence of the contract, and, consequently, is not such a breach as may be considered an invitation to the injured party to abandon the entire engagement or to treat himself as discharged from all its obligations. Damages are a sufficient compensation.

rescinded. Warren v. Buckminster, 24 N. H. 336.

If the purchaser of goods which by the terms of the contract are to be delivered and paid for at a specified time does not tender the price and take the goods within the time agreed upon, the vendor may request him to take and pay for them, and in case of a refusal he may abandon and rescind the contract and dispose of the goods as if no contract had been made. McEachron v. Randles, 34 Barb. 301.

Miscellaneous cases.

Under a contract to superintend servants for a share of the crop, if the overseer takes hands from the work during crop time without the consent and contrary to the remonstrance of the defendant, it will be such a violation of the contract as will authorize defendant to abandon the contract and sue for the injury he has sustained. Martin v. Chapman, 6 Port. (Ala.) 344.

Under a contract to carry mail and to be liable for any mismail, frequent omissions on the part of the carrier give the employer the right to annul the contract and resume performance himself. Davis v. Wade, 4 Ala. 208.

If the assignee of a bill of lading refuses to receive the cargo except upon conditions which he has no right to make, the assignee may rescind the assignment and sell to a third person. The Schooner Treasurer, 1 Sprague, 473.

Under a contract to deliver railroad ties at a certain place into cars to be furnished by the other party a failure to furnish the cars will not exonerate the other party from delivering the ties convenient to the place of shipment so that they can be loaded. Council Bluffs Iron Works v. Cuppey, 41 Iowa, 104.

Upon the failure of a broker to remit to his principal the money which he received for a consignment of property, the principal is not bound to make any further consignment to him. Curtis v. Gibney, 59 Md. 131.

In case of a contract to furnish materials for the manufacture of iron, the refusal or neglect to furnish the materials will warrant the manufacturer in refusing to go on with his contract as to iron to be manufactured from the materials not furnished, but will not authorize him to stop work on materials previously furnished. And a mere neglect for a short time will not have that effect, but it must be a refusal or continued delay after a reasonable requisition for such length of time as to warrant the inference that there was no intention to furnish them. Proprietors of Mill Dam Foundry Co. v. Hovey, 21 Pick. 417.

Refusing to pay the amount due on one contract unless the seller will give security for the performance of other contracts of sale will justify the seller in treating the contract as abandoned and himself as released from making any further deliveries. Stephenson v. Cady, 117 Mass. 6.

In Reynolds v. Reynolds, 48 Hun, 142, there was a contract for the working of a farm on shares, and the owner by his language and manner justified the laborer in removing from the premises. The owner sought to establish his title to the crop and asked the court to charge that, even if plaintiff was justified in removing from the farm his redress, if any, would be for damages for breach of the contract. The court held that the request was properly refused for the reason that plaintiff by his action justified defendant in treating the contract as broken on the part of plaintiff and he could refuse a further performance on his part and abandon the premises without abandoning the contract. Since the contract remained in force as far as the defendant was concerned, he could maintain an action thereon by reason of plaintiff's breach of the same. But he did not thereby lose his title to the crop.

In Hulle v. Heighman, 2 East, 145, 4 Esp. 75, which was indebitatus assumpsit for wages earned by a seaman, who alleged that he had been wrongfully sent on shore at a foreign port, it was contended that the wrongful act of discharge put an end to the special contract and gave a right of action in general assumpsit, but the court held that the wrongful act did not rescind the special contract, and that until the contract was rescinded by defendant the plaintiff could not recover on the general counts, and that the action was on the special contract for the wrongful act of the defendant.

Under a contract by a traveling salesman to have a certain assistant, the employers may terminate the contract upon his failure to retain such assistant. Hochstadter Bros. v. Sam, 83 Tex. 464.

One who advances money to an insurance corporation under a contract by which it is to accept risks and use the money to pay the premiums may treat the contract as rescinded and recover the money advanced, upon the company's selling its business and announcing that it is going out of business, although it reserves in the contract of sale the right to issue insurance to all existing contracts. Seipel v. International L. Ins. & T. Co. 84 Pa. 47.

S. 398. Messrs. Collins & Corbin for defendant.

Dixon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On March 28, 1893, C. & E. Gerli, Fratelli & Co. entered into a contract to sell and deliver in New York to the Poldebard Silk Manufacturing Company thirty bales of extra Piva new silk, deliverable, ten bales July 20th to 25th, ten bales August 15th, and ten bales September 1st to 10th, each instalment to be paid for sixty days after delivery, at $5.90 per pound. In consequence of the lateness of the new crop, it was impossible for the sellers to make delivery of the first ten bales within the time specified, and on July 27 the buyer extended the time for such delivery until August 1. On that date, the impossibility still continuing, the buyer notified the sellers that it canceled the contract because of the default, and would decline to receive any of the merchandise ordered. On August 15 the new crop of silk had not yet arrived in New York, but it arrived before September 10. Under these circumstances, one of the members of the selling firm assigned the firm's rights in the contract to Paul Gerli, the plaintiff, and thereupon he brought this suit against the buyer to recover damages arising from the refusal to accept Neglecting to give a singer of an opera company equal advertisement with another singer in the same company, according to the contract, and billing the other singer on nights on which the contractee is to perform, so that the former receives commendations of the press for the performance, is a breach of contract which justifies the contractee in leaving the company and seeking employment elsewhere. Pratt v. Montegriffo, 25 Abb. N. C. 384.

The omission to ship a cargo of commodities at the time when the contract calls for it will give the other party the right to rescind. Welsh v. Gossler, 69 N. Y. 540; Hill v. Blake, 97 N. Y. 216.

Where, upon the purchase of lands, notes are given which the vendor undertakes to turn over to a railroad company in payment of stock, so that in turn they will be used by the railroad company to pay a debt it owes to the vendee, the breach of the collateral agreement to turn the notes over to the railroad company will be a ground for rescinding the principal contract by putting or offering to put the parties in statu quo. McNair v. Cooper, 4 Ala. 661.

VIII. Application of above rules to various kinds of contracts.

a. Vendor and purchaser.

Vendor's right to rescind.

If the purchaser of property, who agrees to cultivate the land and pay the taxes and purchase the instalments of August 15 and September 1 to 10. At the trial the justice denied the right to damages for the instalment of August 15, and directed a recovery of the damages as to the instalment of September 1 to 10. On exceptions taken at the trial, each party has assigned error. The errors assigned by the purchaser will first be considered.

1. That the claim for damages was assignable, so as to authorize the assignee to sue thereon in his own name, is clear on the words of the supplement to the practice act, approved March 4, 1890 (Pub. Laws 1890, p. 24). It was "a chose in action arising on contract." Such a chose in action belonging to a partnership may be transferred by a single member of the firm. Story, Partn. § 101.

2. The contract was fully proved within the statute of frauds. Evidence introduced on behalf of the defendant showed that its general manager had written and signed a memorandum of the order given for the goods, in which were stated all the terms of the proposed contract, and that thereupon the agent of the sellers had sent to the buyer a written acceptance of the order, duly signed. Such proof was sufficient. Browne, Stat. Fr. § 846.

3. The other exception pressed by the defendant below is that the trial justice denied the right of the buyer to rescind the contract on the nondelivery of the first instalment of silk. The general rule on this subject was thus laid down by this court in Blackburn v. Reilly, 47 N. J. L. 290, 54 Am. Rep. 159: "In contracts for sale of goods, to be executed by a series of deliveries and payments, defaults of either party with reference to one or more of the stipulated acts will not ordinarily discharge the other party from his obligation, unless the conduct of the party in default be such as to evince an intention to abandon the contract or a de-money, abandons the property and fails to pay the taxes and purchase money, the vendor may rescind the contract and thereby defeat a suit for specific performance upon tendering back a fair proportion of the money already paid. Dukes v. Baugh, 91 Ga. 38.

The refusal of a vendee to accept and pay for the land when the title is tendered according to the contract will give the vendor the right to declare the contract rescinded and terminated. Lane v. Lesser, 135 Ill. 507.

A vendor of land may treat the contract as rescinded where the vendee refuses to pay the first instalment of purchase money after notice that in case he does not do so the contract will be rescinded, and an offer to return the money advanced on the execution of the contract. Anderson v. Haskell, 45 Iowa, 45.

If a purchaser is let into possession of real estate under an agreement that he shall pay the purchase price at stated intervals, in case he neglects to pay the vendor may treat the contract as rescinded, and maintain a writ of entry or trespass against the purchaser. Williams v. Noeux, 43 N. H. 388.

If a purchaser enters into possession of real estate and then refuses to pay the purchase price, trespass will lie against him. Clough v. Hosford, 6 N. H. 231.

Where payment is to be made when the property is delivered, failure to make the payment will authorize the vendor to rescind. Meeker v. Johnson, 5 Wash. 718.

Under an executory contract for the sale of real estate, upon a total failure of performance on the part of the vendee the vendor has a right to either sue for the purchase money and foreclose his mortgage, or he may rescind the contract and recover the land. Where there has been part performance by the vendee, he will be entitled to reasonable notice of the vendor's intention to rescind. If the vendee has actually abandoned the contract, or has so acted as to create the reasonable belief on the part of the vendor that he has abandoned it, the vendor may rescind without notice of his intention, notwithstanding the part performance by the vendee. Kennedy v. Embry, 72 Tex. 300; Lanier v. Foust, 81 Tex. 186; Graham v. West (Tex.) 26 S. W. Rep. 920; Hood v. People's Bldg. & S. Assn. (Tex.) 27 S. W. Rep. 1046; Thompson v. Westbrook, 56 Tex. 255; Ransom v. Brown, 68 Tex. 158; Hamblen v. Folts, 70 Tex. 132; Nass v. Chadwick, Id. 157.

In Texas, where a vendor retains in the deed an express lien for the purchase money, the superior title remains in the vendor, and he may rescind and 30 L. R. A.

reconvey upon the grantee's abandonment of the contract. Dunlap v. Green, 60 Fed. Rep. 242.

But in Huffman v. Mulkey, 78 Tex. 556, the court says: "These cases push the application of the rules growing out of the holding that such contracts are executory in character to the utmost verge of propriety or reason; and the writer doubts the correctness of the holding even in such cases that rescission can, in any case in which a deed has passed, be made otherwise than by a writing or some decree of the proper tribunal."

If the vendee is in possession, and time is not of the essence of the contract, the vendor cannot arbitrarily rescind the contract. Lochhausen v. Laughter, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 291.

Where time is not of the essence of the contract, the mere failure to pay will not authorize a repudiation of the contract so as to authorize a suit for the recovery of the land. Gregg v. English, 38 Tex. 139.

But it has been held that a vendor cannot rescind if the title has passed out of him, but must seek the aid of the court for that purpose. McCardle v. Kennedy, 32 Ga. 198; Martindale v. Smith, 1 Q. B. 395, 1 Gale & D. 1, 5 Jur. 362.

So, under a contract for the sale of a certain number of bushels of corn, if after a part is delivered the purchaser becomes insolvent and refuses to accept the balance, the seller may rescind the contract and refuse to deliver the remainder, but as to that delivered the title has passed and he cannot recover as against the attaching creditors of the purchaser. Thompson v. Conover, 32 N. J. L. 466.

If the title has passed, the seller cannot rescind. McClure v. Williams, 5 Sneed, 718.

Right of vendee.

In Bank of Columbia v. Hagner, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 455, 7 L. ed. 219, which was an action by a vendor to recover the purchase money, the court said: "If the seller is not ready and able to perform his part of the agreement on the day fixed for performance, the purchaser may elect to consider the contract at an end."

If the vendor of real estate is not able to make out a good title on the day fixed, the vendee may repudiate the contract and recover back his deposit money. Cornish v. Rowley, 1 Wheat. Selwyn, 155; Wilde v. Fort, 4 Taunt. 334; Glenn v. Roessler, 38 Hun, 74.

If the vendor of land is confessedly unable to make title at the time named in the articles of agreement for delivery of the deed, no tender of the purchase money then due is necessary to ensign no longer to be bound by its terms." In the case cited this rule was enforced against the buyer. In Trotter v. Heckscher, 40 N. J. Eq. 612, this court, and in Otis v. Adams, 56 N. J. L. 88, the supreme court, enforced it against the seller. That the conduct of the vendors in the present case did not evince an intention to abandon the contract, or not to be bound by its terms, appears beyond dispute. They failed to deliver the July instalment because it was impossible to do so, offered to deliver other silk which they considered equally valuable, expressed their willingness to come to an equitable arrangement for their default, and, on the first intimation of a purpose on the part of the vendee to rescind the contract, they protested against the right of rescission, and insisted that they should be permitted to make the subsequent deliveries. They showed a design the very opposite of repudiation. Nor do we find anything in this contract or the circumstances of the parties from which it can reasonably be inferred that the parties intended the delivery of each instalment of silk to be a condition precedent to the continuing obligation of the contract. So far as appears, the usefulness to the buyer of any instalment did not at all depend upon the prompt delivery of prior instalments, and full indemnity for every default could be secured by action based thereon. So that, under the rule before declared, it would seem that the attempt to rescind was illegal. The defendant, however, insists that the rule is not applicable to the present case, because the seller's fault consisted in failing to do the first thing required to be done in performance of the contract; and Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 29 L. ed. 866, is cited as an authority for this distinction. On principle, I do not see that, for such a purpose, the first act to be done stands upon a different footing from subsequent acts. A default in that does able the vendee to rescind the contract and maintain covenant for the breach. Kerst v. Ginder, 1 Pittsb. 314.

A vendee of land may tender the purchase money according to his contract, and demand title, and if the vendor refuses to make title the vendee may abandon the possession and then rescind the contract if the day stipulated for making the title has arrived. Reid v. Davis, 4 Ala. 89; Clemens v. Loggins, 1 Ala. 622, 2 Ala. 514.

An admission by the vendor that he has no title will furnish ground for abandoning possession and rescinding the contract on the part of the vendee. Gillespie v. Battle, 15 Ala. 236.

If a purchaser has paid any part of the purchase money, and the seller refuses to complete his part of the contract, the purchaser may disaffirm the contract and bring an action for money had and received to his use. Lyon v. Annable, 4 Conn. 350.

Refusal by the seller of property to have a deed made right upon being informed that it is incorrect is equivalent to an abandonment on his part, and gives the other party the right to rescind and recover back the money paid, or to complete and recover damages from the other party for its breach. Nothé v. Nomer, 54 Conn. 528.

In case of a sale of property, where the vendor makes default because of inability to give a good title the vendee may elect to rescind and recover the advancements made without tendering the balance of the purchase money and demanding a deed, for the reason that a demand will be a useless act which the law does not require. Wilhelm v. Fimple, 31 Iowa, 131, 7 Am. Rep. 117.

An intending purchaser of real estate is entitled to rescind the contract if a merchantable title is not furnished at the time agreed upon. Williams v. Daly, 38 Ill. App. 464.

In Morange v. Morris, 84 Barb. 815, and Zorn v. McParland, 8 Misc. 128, it was decided that if the vendor could not give a good title at the time agreed on the vendee had a right to refuse to take the property and to rescind the contract. In the former case the court says: "Performance on the part of the plaintiff was not necessary if the defendant was not able to perform; except in case plaintiff sought . . . to recover damages without rescinding the contract."

Where the covenants in a contract for the sale of real estate are mutually dependent, and the vendee has advanced money on the contract, but at the time for performance it appears that the vendor has not a good title, the vendee may rescind the contract and recover back his deposit. Morange v. Morris, 8 Keyes, 50.

The mere fact that after the purchaser, who has paid down a part of the purchase money, refuses to complete the purchase the seller disposes of the property to a third person, will not give the purchaser the right to treat the contract as rescinded so as to enable him to recover the amount of his deposit. Ashbrook v. Hite, 9 Ohio St. 357, 75 Am. Dec. 468.

If a vendor, after the contract is signed, but before the day of delivery, materially diminishes the value of the property, the vendee may rescind the contract. Erie v. Vincent, 8 Watts, 510.

While the vendee has the money in his possession to discharge encumbrances on the property, he cannot make those encumbrances a ground for rescission. Irvin v. Bleakley, 67 Pa. 24.

The vendor's not performing at the time agreed upon gives the vendee a right to rescind. Stickter v. Guildin, 30 Pa. 114.

But the mere intention on the part of the vendor to abandon the contract of sale, although accompanied by a suit against the vendee for rent, will not justify the vendee in treating the contract as abandoned. Donaldson v. Waters, 30 Ala. 182.

And it has been held that where there is no obstacle in the way of performing a contract to convey land, the vendee cannot rescind the contract because of the vendor's neglect to tender the deed, and sue for the money he has paid. Fuller v. Hubbard, 6 Cow. 12, 16 Am. Dec. 423.

Statu quo.

A vendee of land cannot rescind the sale if by reason of his own acts he cannot put the vendor in statu quo. Casswell v. Black River Cotton & W. Mfg. Co. 14 Johns. 468.

If a contract for the sale of real estate has been so far executed by letting one party into possession and giving him the benefit under it that the other cannot be placed in statu quo, neither party can rescind the contract. Ray v. Oliver, 20 Vt. 118, 49 Am. Dec. 764.

Upon rescission of a sale of real estate upon which a considerable portion of the purchase price has been paid, which has not been repaid in the use of the property, the vendor upon a rescission should account for the amount he has received, with interest. Evans v. Bentley (Tex.) 29 S. W. Rep. 457.

In a case where an attempt was made to rescind a sale of real estate, the court says it is necessary to keep in view the obvious difference between such contracts and those for sale of personal property, which are to be executed by deliveries in parcels extending through a period of time. In such cases it often happens that the portions delivered are not make it more certain than do other defaults that the party aggrieved cannot get exactly what he contracted for; for that default, as well as for others, he may be compensated by suit; and by that default, as readily as by others, he may obtain an unconscionable advantage, if he is entitled to rescind or retain the bargain as self-interest may dictate. As evidence of repudiation or abandonment, nonperformance of the first thing required to be done may be more persuasive than if the promisor had partially carried out his contract, but, as a basis on which a right of rescission is to be supported, it cannot, merely because it is first in order of time, have any greater importance than later defaults. In Norrington v. Wright, ubi supra, the plaintiff had contracted to ship from Europe to the defendant in Philadelphia 1,000 tons of rails in each of the months February, March, April, May, and June; in February he had shipped 400 tons, which the defendant had received and paid for, not knowing that less than the required quantity had been shipped; in March the plaintiff had shipped 885 tons; and the defendant, on learning of these deficiencies, declared the contract terminated. The court held that he was justified in doing so. I am not sure that I perceive definitely the principle on which this decision was rested. But the case seems now to be cited for the following paragraph in the opinion of the court: "The seller is bound to deliver the quantity stipulated, and has no right . . . to compel the buyer to accept a less quantity; . . . and when the goods are to be shipped in certain proportions monthly, the seller's failure to ship the required quantity in the first month gives the buyer the same right to rescind the whole contract, that he would have had if it had been agreed that all the goods should be delivered at once." I cannot but think that there is here some confusion of thought. If a contract of soon consumed or disposed of, and cannot be restored. And hence many cases of this kind have occurred where for causes accruing during the progress of execution one party has been permitted to rescind the contract without any restoration of what has been delivered or received under it. By common law one of the parties could no more rescind the contract without the other's express or implied assent than he alone could have made it. While it is true in the first class of cases that if one party refuses to proceed such refusal is tantamount to an assent to a dissolution, and will authorize the other party to rescind it arbitrarily when the refusal has operated as a prevention of the other party, yet that a mere refusal has always this effect and without regard to the condition in which the parties are to be left, the court says, "I am by no means prepared to admit;" if, however, the rule could be received with universal application it should appear that the refusal was in no way qualified, but absolute. It should substantially amount to an avowed determination of the party not to abide by the contract. Fry v. Oliver, 20 Vt. 118, 40 Am. Dec. 764.

A refusal to pay an instalment upon a building contract when it becomes due, in accordance with the terms of the agreement, is a breach which indicates that one who is guilty of it does not intend to be bound by the contract, and therefore the other party may rescind it and recover for what work he has done. Geary v. Bangs, 37 Ill. App. 301; Preble v. Bottom, 27 Vt. 249; Strack v. Hurd, 41 N. Y. S. R. 77; Smith v. Cora, 3 Misc. 545; Thomas v. Stewart, 122 N. Y. 580.

If a contract calls for monthly payments the contractor may, upon refusal of the other party to make the payment, abandon further performance of the contract, so as to save all his legal rights in the agreement. Pigeon v. United States, 27 Ct. Cl. 167.

But in case of a construction contract in which the work is to be paid for by instalments, mere failure to pay one of the instalments when it becomes due will not authorize the other party to abandon the work and bring an action for all the benefit he would have received had he fully performed. Cox v. McLaughlin, 52 Cal. 590.

Persons who have contracted to perform certain work in consideration of monthly payments may refuse to complete the work and sue for what they have done, if the payments are refused, by reason of which they are not able to go on with the work. Dobbins v. Higgins, 78 Ill. 440.

If a party who has undertaken to construct a building is prevented from completing it by the failure of the other party to make his payments as provided in the contract, he may recover the value of the labor expended in preparing material for the structure. Shulte v. Hennessy, 40 Iowa, 352.

Upon repeated refusals to pay instalments the contractor may quit the work and recover the value of his services. Bean v. Miller, 69 Mo. 384.

Where work is done under a contract providing for payment by instalments at stated periods, and the payments are not so made, the contractor may quit the work and then recover of the defaulting party for the amount done at the contract rates. Mugan v. Regan, 48 Mo. App. 461.

One contracting to do work for a corporation may abandon the work if the corporation has not money to make the payments as required by the contract, without losing his right to be paid for the work done. Cunningham v. Massena Springs & Ft. C. R. Co. 63 Hun, 439.

Contractors for building a canal upon which payments are to be made monthly are justified in abandoning the work if the owner of the canal is unable to make the payments when due, and may file a lien for the value of the work done. South Fork Canal Co. v. Gordon, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 561, 18 L. ed. 804.

Where the owner of property directs the contractor to leave the work, the latter may do so and elect to treat the contract as still subsisting and recover for work performed at contract prices and damages for the discontinuance, or to treat it as rescinded and recover on a quantum meruit for the value of the work which he has done. Derby v. Johnson, 21 Vt. 17.

Under a contract to pay a certain amount of money upon the completion of each 100 feet of tunnel, upon failure to make a payment the contractor is entitled to stop the work and recover for what he has done. Bennett v. Shaugbnessy (Utah) 22 Pac. Rep. 156.

In case of a material variance between the plans on which a bid for work was made and those furnished for the work, the contractor may abandon the work and sue for the value of what he has done. Williams v. Boehan, 23 Jones & S. 319.

If performance of a contract is prevented by the failure of the owner to supply material according to his contract, the contractor may recover on a quantum meruit for what he has done. Cargain v. Everett, 42 N. Y. S. R. 618.

sale requires the delivery of all the goods at once, and the seller tenders only part at the time specified, certainly the buyer may refuse to accept the part; but it is scarcely accurate to say his refusal is based upon a rescission of the contract. He has simply refused to do what he never agreed to do. But if the goods are to be delivered in instalments at different times, and the seller tenders one instalment on the day specified, then, if the buyer refuses to accept it, plainly his refusal must rest upon a different foundation. He had agreed to accept such a tender, and his refusal can be justified only on the idea that he has become released from that agreement. That is to say, with reference to the point we are now considering, it must appear that his agreement to accept the instalment tendered was dependent on the due performance by the seller of another promise, which he had failed to perform. We are thus brought to the real question in all bargains of this nature, whether, on the proper construction of the contract, the performance of any particular stipulation by one party is a condition precedent to the continuance of obligation upon the other party; and logically this must be the question as well with regard to the first stipulation as the subsequent ones. On this question this court adopted the general rule that when the seller has agreed to deliver the goods sold in instalments, and the buyer has agreed to pay the price in instalments which are proportioned to and payable on the delivery of each instalment of goods, then default by either party with reference to any one instalment will not ordinarily entitle the other party to abrogate the contract. We were led to the adoption of this rule because it seemed to be supported by the greater strength of judicial authority, and to be most likely to promote justice. We see no sufficient reason for abandoning it. The rule governs the case in hand, and maintains the

When the completion of a piece of work is arrested by the omission of the party for whom the work is done, the contractor has an election to treat the contract as rescinded and recover on a quantum meruit the value of his labor, or he may sue for the work completed at the stipulated price, and for the loss in profits or otherwise sustained by the interruptions. Jones v. Judd, 4 N. Y. 414.

If a contractor is prevented from completing his work by the unwarranted defaults of the other party, he may either sue upon the contract and claim damages for a breach of it, or treat it as abandoned and sue for the reasonable value of his work. McCullough v. Baker, 47 Mo. 401.

Where a person has contracted to do the carpenter work on a brick building, and the building falls before his work is completed, he may abandon the contract and sue for the value of his services, if the owner of the building requires him to gratuitously replace what was destroyed. Schwartz v. Saunders, 46 Ill. 18.

A mill-wright who contracts to construct a saw-mill for a person who undertakes to furnish the machinery may treat the contract as rescinded and recover the value of work done in case the owner of the property refuses to furnish the machinery according to his contract. Butts v. Huntley, 2 Ill. 412.

In case of a prevention by the owner of property of the completion thereon of work by a contractor, the latter may recover for the profits he would have made had he been allowed to complete. But mere refusal of a payment when it is due is not a prevention, but a mere breach, and, although for it the contractor may treat the contract as rescinded and sue for what he has done, yet he cannot abandon the contract and recover the lost profits. Cox v. McLaughlin, 54 Cal. 606.

In Phillips & C. Constr. Co. v. Seymour, 91 U. S. 646, 23 L. ed. 341, which was an action of covenant on the contract, it appeared that plaintiffs were to do work for defendant and were to be paid for it in instalments as it was completed. After a portion had been done defendant failed to make payment and the plaintiffs then stopped work and sued for what was already done. The court held that defendant having defaulted on a payment due, plaintiffs were not required to go on at the hazard of further loss, but could recover for what they had done. If a builder has done a large and valuable part of the work, but has failed to complete within the time limited by the covenant, the other party has the option, when that time arrives, of abandoning the contract for such failure, or of permitting 80 L. R. A.

the party in default to go on. If he abandons the contract and notifies the other party, the failing contractor cannot sue on the covenant and recover, because he cannot make or prove the necessary allegations of performance on his own part. But if the other party says to him: "I prefer you should finish the work," or should impliedly say so by standing by and permitting it to be done, then he so far waives absolute performance as to consent to be liable on the covenant for the contract price of the work when completed.

A person who contracts to lay a floor with boards to be furnished by another may leave the job on the latter's neglect or refusal to furnish them, and recover for what he has done. Hill v. Hovey, 26 Vt. 169.

If the owner of a building, who is to furnish material for its improvement, delivers the material to the contractor upon such conditions as to amount to a refusal to deliver, the latter may abandon the contract and sue for the value of the work which he has performed. Greene v. Haley, 5 R. I. 230.

Right of owner.

If one party who has contracted to erect a building for a certain price fails to comply with his obligations, the owner may rescind the contract, finish the building, and hold the contractor liable for the extra amount which it cost him. Wardens of Ch. of St. Louis v. Kirwan, 9 La. Ann. 31; Allen v. Wills, 4 La. Ann. 97.

A contract for the construction of a railroad may be annulled by the company if the contractors fail to perform their contract obligations until they are clearly in default. Titus v. Cairo & F. R. Co. 46 N. J. L. 393.

If a contractor refuses to go on with his work two courses are open to the other party, either to act upon the refusal, accept the abandonment, and refuse any further performance on his part, holding the other party liable for damages caused by the breach, or to refuse to accept the abandonment, and hold the other party to the performance of the contract. Scofield v. McGregor, 63 N. Y. 638.

If one who has contracted to construct a building refuses to go on with the work, the owner may regard the contract as rescinded and let the work to another without waiting for the time to elapse which had been allowed for the completion of the building. Thompson v. Laing, 8 Bosw. 482.

If a contractor for a piece of work fails to perform the work in a workmanlike manner, the owner may discharge him and terminate the contract. Feinberg v. Weiher, 46 N. Y. S. R. 390.

right of the plaintiff to recover damages for the defendant's refusal to accept the third instalment of silk. Therefore, as against the defendant, the judgment is not erroneous.

The plaintiff below assigns error upon the exclusion of his claim for damages because of the refusal to accept the instalment deliverable August 15. In this there was no substantial error. Conceding that the defendant's repudiation of the whole contract before August 15 absolved the sellers from the duty of tendering an instalment on that date, and gave them an immediate right of action against the defendant for a breach of contract, nevertheless, when it appeared, as it did on the trial, that by no possibility could the sellers have made tender of the silk due August 15, because the silk did not arrive in New York until a later day, it became evident that as to that instalment the sellers suffered no loss by the breach.

There are other assignments of error in the record, but, as counsel did not notice them in argument, we assume that they are all involved in the matters above decided, or are waived.

The judgment should be affirmed.

In March, 1893, Gerli contracted to sell and deliver to the Poideboard Silk Company thirty bales of new silk; ten bales to be delivered between July 20 and 25, ten bales August 15, and ten bales between September 1 and 10, 1893. Gerli could not deliver the first instalment, and so informed the silk company, nor was Gerli able to deliver the second instalment. After the failure to deliver the first instalment, the silk company gave notice to Gerli that it rescinded the contract, and would refuse to accept the future deliveries. c. Insurance contracts.

There is no intention of going into the subject of insurance here, since such contracts form a class by themselves; but attention is called to the following decisions as bearing upon the subject of the note.

If an insurer has violated its contract and voluntarily disabled itself from performance, the insured is excused from further performance or offer to perform on his part, and may recover such damages as he can show he has sustained. People v. Empire Mut. L. Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 105.

If an insurance company wrongfully refuses to receive premiums due on a policy the assured may treat the policy as at an end and may recover back all the premiums paid under it. McKee v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 23 Mo. 333, 75 Am. Dec. 129.

If an insurance company wrongfully refuses to receive a premium when it becomes due, the insured may elect to treat the contract as at an end and recover the just value of the policy. Day v. Connecticut Genersl L. Ins. Co. 45 Conn. 496, 29 Am. Rep. 698.

d. Continuing contracts.

There is a class of contracts, of which GERLI V. POIDEBOARD SILK MFG. CO. is an example, which 30 L. R. A.

are usually denominated continuing contracts. They are usually contracts for the purchase and sale of chattels which are to be delivered in instalments so that the deliveries and payments shall extend over a considerable period of time. There is much conflict of opinion upon the question whether a breach as to delivery or payment for one instalment will justify the other party in rescinding or abandoning the contract. The attempt to decide this class of cases by the rules applicable to other contracts has not been very successful, and has met with some dissent.

In Hoare v. Rennie, 5 Hurlst. & N. 19, 29 L. J. Exch. 73, Pollock, C. B., says the principle of Boone v. Eyre, 1 H. Bl. 273, note, applies to the partial breach of a single contract, but surely not to a breach of a continuing contract, as the supply of goods from day to day or week to week, where, during the contract, one party becomes wholly incapable of performing his part.

In Mersey Steel & I. Co. v. Naylor, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 442, aff'g L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 645, 51 L. J. Q. B. 584, 47 L. T. N. S. 869, 81 Week. Rep. 83, where there was a contract to deliver a quantity of steel, a certain amount each month, payments to be made within three days after each delivery, the court says: "You must look at the actual circumstances of the case, in order to see whether the one party to the contract is relieved from the future performance by the conduct of the other." It is then said that "the payments according to the contract were not conditions precedent to future deliveries, but that, notwithstanding that the parties might have so conducted themselves as to release each other from the contract, and that one party might have so conducted himself as to leave it at the option of the other party to relieve himself from a future performance of the contract." And the court held that the failure to pay in that case because of a mistake as to there being a right to pay as the seller was a corporation under process of winding up was not such a breach as entitled the seller to repudiate the contract and recover for what it had done under it.

Jonassohn v. Young, 4 Best & S. 230, 32 L. J. Q. B. 385, 11 Week. Rep. 922, illustrates a distinction which has been sought to be established by the English cases. In it the contract was that plaintiff should furnish to defendant certain coal of a quality equal to sample by a boat to be sent by defendant. The action was for breach of contract in failing to accept the coal, and the declaration averred that defendant had absolutely refused to accept any more coal whereby he had exonerated and discharged plain-ber, Gerll brought this suit, and recovered damages in the trial court. The only question in the case is whether, under these circumstances, the purchaser had a right to rescind the contract.

Where goods are sold to be delivered at a specified time, the purchaser is not bound to accept them at a subsequent time. 2 Benjamin, Sales, p. 892; 2 Chitty, Cont. p. 443; Behn v. Burness, 8 Best & S. 757; Boves v. Shand, L. R. 2 App. Cas. 455; Lowber v. Bangs, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 723, 17 L. ed. 768; Davison v. Von Lingon, 118 U. S. 40, 28 L. ed. 885. In Clark v. Wright, 5 Phila. 439, Hare, J., said that the buyer was not responsible unless tender was made at the time and place specified; that no case, he believed, could be found where an executory contract for the sale of chattels has been taken out of the strict rule of the common law by equity, on an equitable principle. In Jones v. United States, 96 U. S. 24, 24 L.

tiff from any further performance thereof on his part. Defendant pleaded that plaintiff first broke the contract in that on one occasion he did not send coal equal to the sample, and on another occasion he detained the boat an unreasonable time; but the court said that in neither plea does the matter alleged go to the root of the consideration, and the judgment was given for plaintiff on the pleas, although by a mistake in the report in 4 Best & Smith it is stated that judgment was for defendant.

The contract itself may be such as to settle its own interpretation.

Thus, if in a continuing contract the payments are to be by paper, which under the contract must become due before all the goods are delivered, the delivery of the instalments as they become due will not be a condition precedent to the further performance of the contract. Maryland Fertilizing & Mfg. Co. v. Lorentz, 44 Md. 218.

So the refusal of performance may be such as to show that it is intended as a breach of the entire contract, in which event the aggrieved party is held to be entitled to act accordingly.

Thus, an absolute refusal to deliver more oil under a continuing contract will authorize the purchaser to refrain from making further tenders of price, and give him a right to sue for breach of the contract. Forsyth v. North American Oil Co. 53 Pa. 168.

So, in case of a sale of a crop of peaches to be delivered from day to day and paid for at the end of each week, the seller may treat the contract as rescinded upon the refusal of a single payment. Reybold v. Voorhees, 30 Pa. 116.

So, in a case where a certain amount was to be paid for the transmission of news over a telegraph line, where the company refused to furnish statements of the amount collected or to pay over the excess collected, the court held that a single omission, if made on a ground that would apply to future omissions, is a breach that absolves the other party from the duty of considering the contract as continuing and of performing or continuing performance thereafter. Goodsell v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 26 Jones & S. 28.

So, under a continuing contract for the delivery of iron the purchaser will not be bound to acknowledge the continued existence of the contract after such repeated failures to make deliveries required by the contract as to defeat its objects. Bollman v. Burt, 61 Md. 418.

So, a seller of goods to be delivered and paid for in instalments may, upon receiving notice from the buyer that he will accept no more, treat the 30 L. R. A.

ed. 644, Mr. Justice Clifford pronounces this rule to be a rigid one, so that the vendee is not constrained to accept goods unless delivered or tendered at the time agreed upon. If, therefore, the contract had been to deliver the thirty bales at one time, the right of the buyer to rescind on failure of the vendor to deliver on the day named would be so clear that it would not be debatable. In what respect does the case under discussion differ in principle? It is an entire contract for the delivery of thirty bales, although to be in instalments. It cannot, even plausibly, be contended that the contract is severable or divisible. The bargain was a unit, embracing all of the thirty bales, and not three separate, independent contracts for ten bales each. It cannot be seriously asserted that the contract was for anything other than thirty bales, or that there was any implied term in it that the vendee would accept damages as a substitute for such deliveries as contract as rescinded and sue for those already delivered. Bartholomew v. Markwick, 15 C. B. N. S. 711, 33 L. J. C. P. 145, 10 Jur. N. S. 616, 9 L. T. N. S. 651, 12 Week. Rep. 314.

So, if, in a continuing contract for the sale of goods the purchaser does not pay for one instalment under such circumstances as to give the seller reasonable ground for believing that he will be unable or does not intend to go on with the contract, the seller is justified in repudiating it. Bloomer v. Bernstein, L. R. 9 C. P. 588, 43 L. J. C. P. 375, 31 L. T. N. S. 306.

So, where defendant agrees to deliver straw upon plaintiff's premises, to be paid for when delivered at so much per load, if the purchaser refuses to pay when the loads are delivered, but insists on the right to keep a load in advance, the seller may refuse to deliver more straw and resist an action brought against him for breach of his contract. Withers v. Reynolds, 2 Barn. & Ad. 882.

Where a contract provided for the manufacture of a certain quantity of lumber each month by one party and the acceptance of and payment for it by the other, and the latter during the time of performance notified the former that he would receive no more, the court held that the seller was entitled to treat the contract as wholly broken by the buyer and sue to recover, firstly, the contract price of lumber actually delivered and received under the contract; and secondly, upon the breach to recover the entire damages resulting from the breach on the part of the buyer in putting an end to and refusing to receive any more lumber under the contract. The court says: "There was not merely a neglect of payment, but they (plaintiffs) were notified by defendants that they should treat the contract as at an end and would receive no more lumber under it. Defendants thereby prevented plaintiffs from fulfilling their contract. The plaintiffs after this, even if they would be justified in so doing, could not be required as a condition precedent to obtaining adequate relief for the breach to go on manufacturing lumber at the risk of finding no market for it or of being unable to collect from the defendants the amount that might become due under the contract. There was a total breach of an entire contract and the plaintiffs were entitled to sue upon the breach immediately to recover the entire damages resulting from it without waiting for the time for full performance to elapse. Hale v. Trout, 35 Cal. 242.

As to the right to go on and complete after notice to desist, see note to Davis v. Bronson (N. D.) 16 L. R. A. 655.

But on the direct question as to the right to re were not made by the vendor, and still be under obligation to receive such deliveries as the vendor elected to make. Damages are adjudged for breach of contract; they are not given as part performance of the contract. It is true that the failure to make the first delivery left in the purchaser the option to insist upon delivery of the subsequent instalments, which option he would exercise only in case the market value of the goods did not depreciate; and in that respect he would have the advantage of the other party to the contract. The same result would follow if the thirty bales were to have been delivered in bulk; for in that case, also, the vendee would not elect to rescind, but would insist upon the execution of the engagement, if there was a rise in the market price. The advantage in position which in such case the buyer occupies arises from the fact that he has performed, or is ready to perform, on his part, while the other party is in default; and such advantage therefore has a just basis. No case has been brought to the attention of the court where the vendee has been held to the execution of the contract where he announced his election to rescind after the seller failed or refused to make the first delivery. Hoare v. Rennie, 5 Hurlst. & N. 19, is precisely in point, recognizing the right of rescission in a case as that before us. This case was criticised in Simpson v. Crippin, L. R. 8 Q. B. 17, but in Honck v. Muller, L. R. 7 Q. B. Div. 92, Lord Justice Bramhall says that Hoare v. Rennie has never been overruled; that in Simpson v. Crippin the court evidently did not understand it. He approved of the decision in Simpson v. Crippin, and distinguishes Hoare v. Rennie by the fact that in the former case there had been part performance of the contract, and it could not, therefore, be undone. Lord Bramhall further pertinently remarks that "it has never yet been held that a man rescind for a breach in respect to one instalment, there seems to be a hopeless conflict. One line of decisions holds that a breach which only extends to a single instalment is not ground for rescission.

In case of a continuing contract of sale, which does not make payment a condition precedent to the continuing obligation to sell and deliver, default of payment will not release the other party, unless the conduct of the defaulting party evinces an intention on his part to abandon the contract and no longer to be bound thereby. Otis v. Adams, 56 N. J. L. 38.

In case of a continuing contract default by one party in making particular payments or deliveries will not release the other party from his duty to make the other deliveries or payments stipulated in the contract, unless the conduct of the party in default be such as to evince an intention to abandon the contract or a design no longer to be bound by its terms. Blackburn v. Bently, 47 N. J. L. 290, 54 Am. Rep. 159; Trotter v. Heckscher, 40 N. J. Eq. 656; Lehigh Line & I. Co. v. Trotter, 43 N. J. Eq. 198; Trotter v. Heckscher, 42 N. J. Eq. 258.

In Simpson v. Crippin, L. R. 8 Q. B. 14, 42 L. J. Q. B. 23, 27 L. T. N. S. 546, 21 Week. Rep. 141, where the contract was to take away about 500 tons of coal each month, and the first month wagons were sent for only 158 tons, whereupon the seller refused to deliver any more under the contract, the court says: "No sufficient reason has been urged why damages will not be a compensation for the breach by the plaintiffs, and why the defendant should be at liberty to annul the contract." But the defendant, having relied on Hoare v. Rennie, 5 Hurlst. & N. 19, 29 L. J. Exch. 73, it was said: "It is difficult to understand on what principle that case was decided. If the principle was that wherever the plaintiff has broken his contract first, he cannot sue for a subsequent breach by the defendant, the decision would be opposed to the authority of many other cases."

To what cases the court had reference when making that remark is not apparent. It would seem from the authorities collected in this note that they were not cases upon the subject of rescission, and if not they could hardly be regarded as authority for the decision of the case then before them.

One who has undertaken to act as agent for the sale of coal is not justified in rescinding his agreement because of one failure to furnish merchantable coal according to the contract. In order to justify such action the failures must be of such frequency as to make it unjust to require a continuance of the agreement. Cannon Coal Co. v. Taggart, 1 Colo. App. 60.

If the payment for an instalment when delivered is not made expressly or impliedly a condition precedent to future delivery, the mere omission to make it will not authorize the other party to abandon the contract. Tucker v. Billing, 3 Utah, 82.

If the contract is to deliver all the coal which the other party shall need in his business for a certain time, payments to be made for the coal delivered in one month on the 10th of the next month, mere failure to pay according to the contract will not justify a rescission of the contract, since it is severable and the breach of the payment does not go to the whole of the consideration. Hansen v. Consumers' Steam Heating Co. 73 Iowa, 77; Osgood v. Bauger, 75 Iowa, 560, 1 L. R. A. 655.

Under a contract to sell ten car loads of produce with the right to draw for the price of each as delivered, the refusal of the purchaser to pay for the first car load when delivered claiming the right to hold the price to insure the compliance with the remainder of the contract will not entitle the seller to refuse to furnish the remainder of the produce. The court says: "Defendants were not in default as to the unexecuted portion of the contract. Nor did it appear that they ever would be in default as to them as they expressed a willingness to pay for the other nine car loads as they should be delivered, and there is no claim that they were not able to perform their undertaking in that regard. They did not refuse absolutely to pay for the car load which was delivered. It was not understood at the time the contract was made that plaintiffs were dependent for the means to purchase the subsequent car loads on the money which they were to obtain for those first delivered, nor is it shown that they were so dependent. Rescission of a divisible contract will not be allowed for a breach thereof, unless such breach goes to the whole contract. Myer v. Wheeler, 65 Iowa, 380.

Where the seller of iron deliverable in instalments neglected to deliver the first instalment until several months after it was due, because of which the purchasers refused to make payment for it claiming the right to set off the loss which they had sustained because of such failure, the court held such refusal did not show an intention to abandon the contract which would give the seller the right to refuse to make further delivery. Freeth v. Burr, L. R. 9 C. P. 208, 43 L. J. C. P. 91, 29 L. T. N. S. 773, 22 Week. Rep. 370.

In Weaver v. Sessions, 6 Taunt. 154, 1 Marsh. 605, which was an action of covenant for buying malt may break his contract, render the performance of the whole impossible, and, though nothing has been done under it, insist on the performance of the remainder." In Norington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 29 L. ed. 866, Mr. Justice Gray discusses the English cases very elaborately, and shows clearly that there is no support in the law for the doctrine that the vendor, after he himself is in default as to the first delivery, can enforce performance of the remaining part of the bargain by the vendee. He most confidently asserts that in mercantile transactions an agreement to deliver goods at a specified time is to be regarded as a warranty, upon failure or non-performance of which the party aggrieved may repudiate the whole contract; that "the seller is bound to deliver the quantity stipulated, and has no right either to compel the buyer to accept a less quantity, or to require him to select part out of a greater quantity; and when the goods are to be shipped in certain proportions monthly, the seller's failure to ship the required quantity in the first month gives the buyer the same right to rescind the whole contract that he would have had if it had been agreed that all the goods should be delivered at once." This case was approved in Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. v. Rhodes, 121 U. S. 255, 30 L. ed. 920, and is unchallenged authority in the Federal courts. In Blackburn v. Reilly, 47 N. J. L. 290, 54 Am. Rep. 159, the buyer accepted five weekly deliveries, and paid for them without objection. He refused afterwards to accept the sixth delivery, not because it was not in time, but for the reason that he objected to the quality of the goods previously accepted and paid for. This court held that under these circumstances the buyer could not of a third person after contracting to purchase of plaintiff, the defense was that defendant had delivered bad malt, and that therefore defendant procured his malt elsewhere; the court based its ruling mostly on the words of the contract, and held that under it a single breach by plaintiff did not destroy the contract. Dallas, J., says: "I think each of these parties has a complete remedy and must resort to the remedy by action on their respective covenants, and that the breach by plaintiff of his covenant is no discharge of the present action."

The numerical weight of authority is, however, on the other side.

In Hoare v. Rennie, 5 Hurlst. & N. 19, 29 L. J. Exch. 73, the contract was to furnish a large quantity of iron to be shipped in certain months a certain proportion each month, and the seller shipped in the first month only a small part of what the contract called for, whereupon the purchaser informed him that he would not be bound by the contract and the seller brought suit. The court says: "A man has no right to say that which is a breach of an agreement is a performance of it. On that ground this case is distinguished from almost every other case that has been cited. It does not turn upon the question of condition precedent. The only question is whether if a man who is bound to perform his part of a contract does not do so, he can enforce the contract against another party." And the court held that in case of a failure to comply with the contract in reference to the first shipment the purchaser might refuse to accept and rescind the contract; but this might not be so if the breach was in a subsequent shipment, since then the seller could not be put in statu quo.

Hoare v. Rennie, 5 Hurlst. & N. 19, 29 L. J. Exch. 73, was followed in 1881, by Honck v. Muller, L. R. 7 Q. B. Div. 92, 45 L. T. N. S. 202, 58 L. J. Q. B. 529, 29 Week. Rep. 880.

In Norington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 29 L. ed. 866, the court after examining the authorities upon the question states that the rule laid down in the earlier cases of Hoare v. Rennie, supra, and Coddington v. Paleologo, L. R. 2 Exch. 193, 36 L. J. Exch. 73, 15 L. T. N. S. 561, 15 Week. Rep. 961, as well as the later cases of Reuter v. Sala, L. R. 4 C. P. Div. 239, 43 L. J. C. P. 492, 40 L. T. N. S. 776, 27 Week. Rep. 631, and Honck v. Muller, supra, appears to be supported by a greater weight of authority than the rule stated in the intermediate cases of Simpson v. Crippin, L. R. 8 Q. B. 14, 42 L. J. Q. B. 28, 27 L. T. N. S. 546, 21 Week. Rep. 141, and Brandt v. Lawrence, L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 344, 46 L. J. Q. B. 237, 24 Week. Rep. 749, and to accord better with the 80 L. R. A. general principles affirmed by the House of Lords in Bowes v. Shand, L. R. 2 App. Cas. 455, 46 L. J. Q. B. 561, 36 L. T. N. S. 887, 25 Week. Rep. 730, while it in no wise contravenes the decision of that tribunal in Mersey Steel & I. Co. v. Naylor, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 442, affirming L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 648, 51 L. J. Q. B. 584, 47 L. T. N. S. 839, 31 Week. Rep. 83.

In Coddington v. Paleologo, supra, the contract was to deliver goods on "April 17 complete on 8th of May," and the court held that if it bound the seller to commence delivery on April 17, the buyer could rescind if he did not do so. In Brandt v. Lawrence, supra, there was a contract for oats to be shipped within a certain time, and it was held that all shipped within that time must be received although the rest were late. In Reuter v. Sala, supra, there was a contract for the sale of a certain quantity of pepper to be shipped in certain months and when it appeared that only part of the quantity was placed on board the vessel during the designated month, the buyer was entitled to reject all as not complying with the contract. These cases, it will be observed, are not strictly on the point and can only be regarded as authority by analogy.

In case of a continuing contract for the sale of corn, in which payments are to be made when shipments are received, the refusal to make a payment will authorize the seller to rescind and refuse to deliver any more of the corn. Rugg v. Moore, 110 Pa. 238.

Failure to pay according to contract for commodities furnished under a continuing sale is a breach which gives the seller the right to treat the contract as terminated and bring an action for the value of what has been furnished. Kokomo Strawboard Co. v. Inman, 184 N. Y. 92.

Refusal to give a note for the balance due on several invoices of lumber, delivered under a contract for the sale of a large amount to be delivered a small portion at a time as the contract required, will give the seller the right to rescind the contract and sue for what has been delivered. Stockdale v. Schuyler, 29 N. Y. S. R. 380.

Under an agreement to furnish 40,000 yards of flannel each month, the furnishing of only 25,000 yards the first month is such a breach of the contract as will authorize the purchaser to rescind. Elting Woolen Co. v. Martin, 5 Daly, 417.

A breach by the vendor at the outset of a continuing contract of sale will justify the vendee in rescinding the contract in toto, and refusing to accept anything that may subsequently be delivered under it. Pope v. Porter, 102 N. Y. 366.

Under a contract which is indivisible and to be fulfilled by the delivery of a commodity in instal-rescind, but must resort to his action for damages for the defects in the goods which had been furnished. That case was properly decided under the prevailing rule which applies to rescission. It is the admitted rule that rescission cannot be resorted to where part of the contract has been executed and the parties cannot be placed in statu quo. The entire contract must be rescinded, or there can be no rescission. Under the rule on which the judgment below is based, if there is a contract for twelve successive monthly deliveries, the vendor may refuse to make eleven of the deliveries as the due days arrive, and still hold the vendee to the acceptance of the twelfth delivery. Such a doctrine will be startling to the business community. It needs no discussion to show that in those pursuits where supplies are essential to the employment of labor no business enterprise can be conducted with safety or success under such a rule. A contract for goods in instalments is thereby perverted into an agreement to engage in a succession of lawsuits, if the vendor so elects, for such damages as the purchaser may be able to recover, as a substitute for what he expressly bargains for, and during all this period the purchaser cannot safely secure his needed supplies elsewhere, because he cannot know, until the due days arrive, whether the vendor will make further default. The injustice of such an exposition of the law is even more conspicuous when we consider that in many cases the purchaser will be compelled to seek redress in the courts of another state, or in those of a foreign country. I cannot assent to a doctrine so subversive of certainty and success in commercial transactions. In my opinion, the judgment below should be reversed.

ments, the failure to deliver or receive an instalment in accordance with the contract releases the other party. Smith v. Keith & P. Coal Co. 36 Mo. App. 587.

One who has agreed to buy certain barrels and hogsheads, but who refuses to pay for a quantity which are delivered, cannot maintain an action against the seller because of his refusal to furnish any more until such payment is made. Landeche v. Sarpy, 37 La. Ann. 835.

In John A. Roebbling's Sons Co. v. Lock Stitch Fence Co. 23 Ill. App. 184. It is said the law appears to be well settled that where a certain commodity is sold to be delivered in instalments and received in that manner, the failure of the seller to fulfill the contract in the particular of not delivering the quantity required as to either of the instalments gives the purchaser the right to rescind the entire contract.

In McGrath v. Gegner, 77 Md. 381, a contract for the sale of oyster shells to be paid for on the first of each successive week for the shells delivered during the week preceding was considered to mean that payment was an essential part of the contract, and that failure to make it would entitle the seller to refuse to deliver any more shells under the contract.

In Johnson v. Allen, 78 Ala. 387, 56 Am. Rep. 34, there is implied recognition of the right to terminate a continuing contract for failure to deliver an instalment, for the court says a delivery of only part of the quantity ordered, or a failure to deliver any part of it, does not terminate the contract, unless the plaintiff saw proper so to treat and regard it.

In a case where there was a contract for rails to be delivered a certain amount each month, and the purchaser attempted to rescind because of a failure to deliver the required amounts during the first two months, the court held that the right to rescind existed, saying: "This equitable doctrine [of severance] should not be invoked by one who has failed to perform, for the purpose of defeating the other's right to rescind, and thus to protect himself against the consequences of his own wrong. As against such a party the contract should be treated and enforced as entire. . . . To render the defaulting party's claims of severance 'logical,' it is necessary to take a step forward, and hold that such a transaction constitutes several distinct, independent contracts. Then, of course, it follows that a failure as respects one of several successive deliveries affords no right to rescind in regard to those yet to be made." The court then says this step has been taken by the English courts, and that the cases in this country are inharmonious, but in that case they refuse to take the step. Norrington v. Wright, 5 Fed. Rep. 768, 21 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 805.

If there is a contract for the sale of a certain quantity of iron rails to be shipped a certain number of pounds each month, and there is a material variation from such amounts in the monthly shipments, the buyer may rescind the contract. The court says: "The plaintiff, denying the defendant's right to rescind, and asserting that the contract was still in force, was bound to show such performance on his part as entitled him to demand performance on their part, and, having failed to do so, cannot maintain this action." Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 29 L. ed. 866.

In case of a contract to deliver certain castings to a certain amount on a credit of a year a refusal to receive a lot when sent puts an end to the contract as to the obligation to deliver the balance and give the stipulated credit for the amount delivered. Tyson v. Doe, 15 Vt. 571.

Where there was a contract for the products of certain looms to be delivered in lots of 1,000 each, and the first deliveries were not according to contract, and the purchaser claimed the right to rescind, the court says that "to hold that the purchaser must receive such lots as are of the right quality, and that for the periods when they are not so he must supply himself elsewhere, and sue for his damages, or claim to deduct them, would introduce confusion into business. It would in most cases entirely frustrate the object of the contract." The court then reviews the cases on the question, and says: "This conflict has arisen, partly, we think, from applying to this class of contracts, distinguished from all others by this marked peculiarity (of requiring successive deliveries), principles of decision which properly belonged only to other classes of contracts. In cases of contracts for successive deliveries the doctrine of condition precedent becomes more difficult of application. So also, when in such cases the articles already delivered have been used, it becomes impossible for the party rescinding to return them and put the other party in statu quo. Contracts of this sort should be carried out according to their spirit and object, without regard to the mere technicalities, and, we might well say, quibbles, of the older decisions." King Philip Mills v. Slater, 12 R. L. 82, 34 Am. Rep. 603.

(147 N. Y. 1.)

1. The duty and burden of showing that an act of legislation within the ordinary scope of legislative power is unconstitutional rest upon those who assert its unconstitutionality.

2. The power to divide counties or towns and erect new counties and towns, or to change their boundaries, is conferred by the general grant of legislative power, the time and mode of exercising which are in the discretion of the legislature, unless restrained by other provisions or arrangement of the Constitution.

3. The constitutional declaration that a Senate district shall consist of certain specified counties, when construed with other provisions making population the basis of apportionment and prohibiting the division of a county between Senate districts, establishes an organic relation between the boundaries of the counties as they existed at that time and the Senate districts thereby established, so that no change of county boundaries can be effectual to change the boundaries of the Senate district.

4. The provision in Const., art. 3, § 5, that nothing in that section shall prevent the division at any time of counties and towns by the legislature, although that section relates to the apportionment of members of assembly and the manner of constituting assembly districts, gives the legislature power to change such boundaries in its discretion, although the county boundaries which are changed may be the boundaries of a Senate district.

5. The annexation of a portion of Westchester county to the city and county of New York by Laws 1895, chap. 934, which is valid so far as it affects municipal burdens and municipal rights, leaves the annexed territory still a part of the 22d Senate district, which by the Constitution consisted of Westchester county, and within the jurisdiction of the board of supervisors of that county for the purpose of including it within one of the three assembly districts allotted to that county by the Constitution.

(September 27, 1895.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming an order of a Special Term for Westchester County granting a peremptory writ of mandamus requiring the Board of Supervisors of Westchester County to reassemble and divide the County into assembly districts. Affirmed.

A PPEAL by relator from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming an order of a Special Term for New York County refusing a writ of mandamus to compel the Board of Aldermen of the City of New York to reconvene and re-apportion the assembly districts of New York County. Affirmed.

A PPEALS by the town of Westchester and the Village of Williamsbridge from orders of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming judgments of a Special Term for Westchester County refusing an injunction to restrain defendants from interfering with property within their jurisdictions. Affirmed.

These actions all grew out of the question of the constitutionality of the act annexing certain territory in Westchester county to the city and county of New York. They were argued at the same time and treated in the court of appeals as one case; the appeal was heard at a special session convened for that purpose, and the court handed down the following decision:

"1st. That the act, chapter 934 of the Laws of 1895, annexing certain territory taken from the county of Westchester to the city and county of New York, is constitutional.

"2d. That by virtue of the act the annexed territory became, for all purposes of local government and administration, a part of the city and county of New York, except as otherwise provided therein.

"3d. That the act did not operate to change the territorial boundaries of the 22d Senate district, established by the Constitution of 1894; or to take the annexed territory out of the jurisdiction of the board of supervisors of Westchester county, in forming assembly districts pursuant to section 5 of article 3 of the Constitution; or to change the boundaries of the second judicial district, as they existed when the act was passed, of the boundaries of the second judicial department, as established by chapter 376 of the Laws of 1895.

"4th. That for the purpose of voting for senator, members of assembly, and justices of the supreme court, the annexed territory is to be regarded as part of the 22d Senate district, and of an assembly district to be formed by the board of supervisors of Westchester county, and of the second judicial district.

"5th. That the public property in the annexed territory vested under the act of annexation in the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of New York, as provided in said act.

"6th. That it became the duty of the board of supervisors of Westchester county, at its meeting on the second Tuesday of June, 1895, to include the annexed territory within one of the three assembly districts allotted by the Constitution to the county of Westchester.

"7th. That having omitted to perform their duty, the mandamus was properly granted.

"The order and judgment of the general term are therefore affirmed, with costs to the relator."

Subsequently, when the court convened for its regular term, the opinion printed herewith was handed down.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. William H. Robertson, for appellant Board of Supervisors of Westchester County:

The territory detached from the county of Westchester, and annexed to the city and county of New York, by chapter 984 of the Laws of 1895, was a part of the city and county of New York, and not a part of the county of Westchester, on the 11th day of June, 1895.

The question of altering judicial districts or departments is not involved in this controversy. Rumsey v. People, 19 N. Y. 41; Lanning v. Carpenter, 20 N. Y. 447.

The only apparent restriction in the light of the construction placed on section 5, article 3, of the Constitution of 1846, as amended in 1874, is only an apparent one, and has no effect upon the power conferred upon the legislature to make the division in question.

Messrs. William B. Hornblower and M'Cready Sykes, for appellant Field:

The act is constitutional.

When the Constitution provides, by section 5, of article 3, that "nothing in this section shall prevent the division, at any time, of counties and towns, and the erection of new towns by the legislature," it follows logically that the legislature can divide "counties and towns," and erect "new towns" even though the assembly district and senatorial district may be thereby divided by other than town or county lines.

The counties whose division is forbidden are the political organizations, not the territorial areas, and no county, i. e., no political organization, has been divided by the act of 1895.

Howard v. McDiarmid, 26 Ark. 100; Bittle v. Stuart, 34 Ark. 224; Pulaski County v. Saline County Judge, 37 Ark. 339.

The objection that judicial districts are divided, and that the act is thus unconstitutional, is not well taken.

The act being constitutional, and the territory in question having been duly taken out of the county of Westchester and annexed to the city and county of New York prior to the meeting of the board of aldermen on the 11th day of June, 1895, to apportion assembly districts, it was the duty of that board to deal with the then existing state of affairs, and to divide the county of New York as it then existed, and not as it had existed theretofore.

No county lines are laid down by the Constitution itself, nor is there anything sacred about the boundaries of a county. The general power of the legislature to alter county lines cannot be disputed.

People v. Morrell, 21 Wend. 568.

In determining the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of a statute, the court will inquire into its general character and effect, and will consider facts of which it can take judicial notice as bearing upon the meaning and intent of the act.

Messrs. Francis M. Scott and John Proctor Clarke, for the Board of Aldermen of the City of New York and Haffen et al.:

People v. Flagg, 46 N. Y. 401; Bank of Chenango v. Brown, 26 N. Y. 467; People v. Morrell, 21 Wend. 568.

The convention made a complete apportionment.

The provisions of the Constitution cited as prohibiting the division of counties are applicable solely to the political division thereof for apportionment purposes, and do not limit or affect the inherent power of the legislature to divide and sub-divide the territory of the state for local and municipal purposes.

People v. Rice, 185 N. Y. 478, 16 L. R. A. 836.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This controversy involves the constitutionality of chap. 984 of the Laws of 1895, approved June 6, 1895, and which took effect the same day, annexing a portion of the county of Westchester to the county of New York. The annexed territory at the time of the annexation consisted of a town and parts of towns, and of two villages in the county of Westchester, having a population of upwards of 18,000 persons, excluding aliens, of whom about 2,500 were duly qualified voters. The act declared that the territory therein described, "with the inhabitants and estates therein, is hereby set off from the county of Westchester and annexed to, merged in, and made a part of the city and county of New York and of the twenty-fourth ward of said city and county, subject to the same laws, ordinances, regulations, obligations, and liabilities, and entitled to the same rights, privileges, franchises, and immunities in every respect and to the same extent 30 L. R. A.

as if said territory had been included within said city and county of New York at the time of the grant and adoption of the first charter and organization thereof, and had so remained to the passage of this act, and except as may be modified by this act, as if such territory had been included within said twenty-fourth ward by the provisions of chapter 613 of the Laws of 1873, entitled 'An Act to Provide for the Annexation of the Towns of Morrisania, West Farms, and Kingsbridge in the County of Westchester to the City and County of New York, and the Several Acts Amendatory thereof, and had so Remained up to the Passage of This Act.' " The board of supervisors of Westchester county assembled on the second Tuesday of June, 1895 (six days after the act of annexation took effect), pursuant to the requirement of section 5, article 3, of the new Constitution, to divide the county into three assembly districts, equal to the number of members of assembly apportioned to Westchester county, and made the division of the then existing territory of the county into three assembly districts, excluding from the division the territory embraced in the act of annexation. The board of aldermen of the city of New York on the same day assembled and divided the city and county of New York into assembly districts, but in the division no notice was taken of the annexed territory, and the division was confined to the territory of the city and county of New York as it existed before the act of annexation. The result of the action of the two boards was, therefore, to leave the annexed territory unattached to any assembly district. Thereupon this proceeding was instituted to compel the board of supervisors of Westchester county to reassemble and reform the assembly districts by including in the division the territory taken from the county of Westchester by the act of annexation. The proceeding was taken on the view that, notwithstanding the act, the annexed territory remained a part of Westchester county for assembly district purposes. A mandamus proceeding was also instituted in the city and county of New York to compel the board of aldermen of that city to reassemble and include in an assembly district to be found therein the territory added to the county by the act of annexation. This proceeding was based on the contention that the act of annexation operated from the time of its passage to make the excluded territory for all purposes, including the formation of assembly districts, a part of the city and county of New York. In addition to the two proceedings mentioned, actions were commenced in the county of Westchester, one by the town of Westchester and one by the village of Williamsbridge, which town and village were included in the act of annexation, against certain officers of the street and police departments of the city of New York, who, acting under the authority of the city, had intermeddled with the public property of the town and village, to obtain an injunction to restrain them from interfering therewith. The act of annexation by its terms vests in the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the city and county of New York all the public property in the annexed territory, and these actions were based upon the theory that the act of annexation was wholly unconstitutional and void for all purposes whatever. The mandamus proceeding against the board of aldermen of the city and county of New York has been heard and decided by the special and general terms in the first district and department, and the other mandamus proceeding and the injunction actions by the courts in the second department, and all the cases have been argued before us on appeal. The courts below have concurred in the opinion that the annexed territory should be treated as a part of Westchester county in the formation of assembly districts, and that it was the duty of the board of supervisors of Westchester county to have included it in one of the three districts in that county. The courts in the second department affirmed the constitutionality of the act, chapter 934 of the Laws of 1895, as an act of annexation, but held that the annexed territory is still a part of the 22d Senate district, and that for the purpose of voting for senator, assemblyman, and judges of the supreme court, it must still be considered as a part of Westchester county. The learned judge who delivered the opinion at special term in the case arising in the city and county of New York, held substantially the same view as that of the judges in the second district. The general term of the first department did not pass upon the question of the constitutionality of the act, but limited itself to deciding the precise question presented in that case, viz., whether the annexed territory should be included in an assembly district in the city and county of New York, or in the county of Westchester. The appeals before us, taken together, cover the whole field of controversy, and they impose upon the court the duty of finally determining the grave and difficult questions presented.

The main grounds of attack upon the constitutionality of the annexation act are (1) that it changes the 22d Senate district, which by the Constitution was declared to consist of the county of Westchester, the claim being that no alteration in county lines can be made without changing the Senate district, since by the constitutional arrangement the county of Westchester with its established boundaries at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of 1894 and the Senate districts, were and must remain inseparably associated until after another enumeration; (2) that taking from Westchester county a part of its territory changes the basis of the apportionment of members of assembly made by the Constitution to the county of Westchester and nullifies the requirement that each assembly district shall be wholly within a Senate district formed by the Constitution, because it would become impossible of execution if the act is valid. The 22d Senate district, it is claimed, existing after the act took effect, would not be the same district defined in the constitutional apportionment, viz., the county of Westchester as then organized; (3) the act changes the lines of judicial districts and departments theretofore established, in defiance of constitutional restrictions.

It becomes necessary in considering these objections to refer to the provisions of the new Constitution. The Constitution, by section 3, article 3, divides the entire territory of the state into fifty Senate districts, corresponding to the number of senators to be elected, consisting of one or more counties or of subdivisions of a county. It declares that the 22d Senate district shall consist of the county of Westchester, and it divides the city and county of New York into twelve senate districts, bounding each of the twelve districts by streets and avenues, or by streets, avenues, and public waters, except that in constituting the 21st Senate district (one of the twelve districts) a general clause is added to the description by streets and avenues, which includes therein territory taken from the county of Westchester and annexed to the city and county of New York by the act chapter 618 of the Laws of 1878, which territory, it is said, had not been mapped and laid out with streets or avenues on a permanent plan when the convention prepared the legislative article. Section 4 of the same article provides that an enumeration of the inhabitants of the state shall be taken in the year 1905, and every tenth year thereafter, and directs that the Senate district "shall be so altered by the legislature at the first regular session after the return of every enumeration, that each Senate district shall contain as nearly as may be an equal number of inhabitants, excluding aliens, and be in as compact a form as possible, and shall remain unaltered until the return of another enumeration, and shall at all times consist of contiguous territory, and no county shall be divided in the formation of a Senate district except to make two or more Senate districts wholly in one county." The section also prohibits the division of a town, or block in a city inclosed by streets or public ways, in the formation of a Senate district. By section 1 of the same article the assembly is to consist of one hundred and fifty members. Section 5 deals with the subject of apportionment of members of assembly, and prescribes the manner of constituting assembly districts in counties entitled to more than one member. It perpetuates the single district system, and declares that each county theretofore established (counting Fulton and Hamilton counties as one county) shall be entitled to one member of assembly. It directs that the members of assembly shall be apportioned by the legislature at the first regular session, after the return of every enumeration, "among the several counties of the state as nearly as may be, according to the number of their respective inhabitants, excluding aliens." It prescribes the ratio for apportionment and how members shall be apportioned on remainders. The section itself makes the first apportionment. It declares that, "until after the next enumeration, members of assembly shall be apportioned among the counties as follows:" and apportions thirty-five members to the county of New York and three members to the county of Westchester. The Constitution does not, as in the case of Senate districts, divide counties entitled to more than one member into assembly districts. It imposes that duty upon the boards of supervisors, except that in any city embracing an entire county and having no board of supervisors, the common council or the body exercising the powers of a common council is to make the division. This latter provision, under existing circumstances, is applicable only to the city and county of New York. The board of supervisors of any county entitled to more than one member of assembly, or in the city and county of New York, the common council of that city, is required to "assemble on the second Tuesday of June, 1895, and at such time as the legislature making an apportionment shall prescribe, and divide such counties into assembly districts, as nearly equal in number of inhabitants, excluding aliens, as may be, of convenient and contiguous territory in as compact form as practicable, each of which shall be wholly within a Senate district formed under the same apportionment, equal to the number of members of assembly to which such county shall be entitled;" and (the section adds): "Such apportionment and districts shall remain unaltered until another enumeration shall be made as herein provided." It prohibits the division of a town or block in a city in forming assembly districts, and following the provisions above enumerated are the words: "Nothing in this section shall prevent the division, at any time, of counties and towns and the erection of new towns by the legislature."

Section 1, article 6 of the new Constitution, continued the existing judicial districts "until changed as hereinafter provided," and authorizes the legislature to alter the judicial districts "once after every enumeration of the inhabitants of the state." Section 2 of the same article declares that the legislature shall divide the state into four judicial departments: "The first department shall consist of the county of New York, the others shall be bounded by county lines." In obedience to this mandate of the Constitution the legislature on the 13th day of April, 1895, two months prior to the act of annexation now in question, divided the state into four judicial departments, the first consisting of the county of New York, and the second "of the counties embraced within the present second judicial district," of which Westchester county was one.

The act of annexation, as has been stated, set off from the county of Westchester the territory described therein, with its inhabitants and estates, and declared that it was annexed to and merged in, and made a part of the city and county of New York. As a necessary consequence, it divided the county of Westchester and changed the boundary lines both of the county of Westchester and the county of New York. It preserved, however, the existing arrangements for the collection of unpaid taxes and assessments in the territory annexed, and the sale of lands therefor, and provided for the equitable apportionment and for the payment by the city and county of New York, of such portion of the debts and obligations of the county of Westchester and of the towns and villages taken from Westchester, as should be fixed by the apportionment. If the act is valid the territory taken from Westchester county became from the time of the approval of the act on the 6th day of June, 1895, except as otherwise specified therein, for all purposes of local government and administration, a part of the city and county of New York, and it was made subject to the burdens and became entitled to the rights, privileges, and immunities, "in every respect and to the same extent" as if the annexed territory had originally been a part of that city and county and had been included in the territory annexed thereto from the county of Westchester by the act chapter 613 of the Laws of 1873 and the acts amendatory thereof.

The Constitution vests in the Senate and assembly the legislative power of the state (Const. art. 3, § 1), and the power to divide counties or towns, and to erect new counties and towns, or to change their boundaries, is legislative in its character and is conferred upon the Senate and assembly by the general grant of legislative power; and unless restrained in a particular case by other provisions or arrangements of the Constitution, the time and mode of its exercise is in the discretion of the legislature. The power of the legislature to erect new counties, although not conferred by any express grant, is implied in the prohibition in section 5, article 3, relating to members of assembly, that "no new county shall be hereafter erected unless its population shall entitle it to a member." The power is by this clause both recognized and limited. The power to divide towns or counties, or to erect new towns, was not given by any direct language in the Constitution of 1846, but it was exercised in many cases by the legislature as a part of its ordinary legislative power. We shall have occasion to refer to some provisions in the Constitution of 1894, in which the existence of this power is expressly recognized.

The act of annexation now in question is, therefore, presumptively valid, because it is an act of legislation within the ordinary scope of legislative power, and for the further reason that the presumption of constitutionality attaches to every statute enacted by the legislature. The duty and the burden of establishing that the act of annexation is unconstitutional rest, therefore, upon the parties asserting its unconstitutionality. It needs no citation of authorities in support of the doctrine that a statute can be declared unconstitutional only when it can be shown beyond reasonable doubt that it conflicts with the fundamental law, and that until every reasonable mode of reconciliation of the statute with the Constitution has been resorted to, and reconciliation has been found impossible, the statute will be upheld.

The Senate districts are established by the Constitution. The whole territory of the state is, by section 3, article 3, divided into Senate districts upon a plan which preserves the unity of the county in their formation, no county being divided except to constitute two or more Senate districts within the same county. The rule that counties were not to be divided in the formation of Senate districts, except in the cases specified, was followed by the convention, and it was made obligatory in all future apportionments. We think it is plain that the general scheme of the Constitution was to associate Senate districts with county organizations and to make them coterminous with county boundaries, and that when by the Constitution it was declared that a Senate district was to consist of certain specified counties, there was established an organic relation between the counties as they existed territorially at the adoption of the Constitution and the Senate districts thereby established, and that a subsequent change of county boundaries by the legislature, whereby a Senate district would comprise a part of two counties, would violate the constitutional plan, unless permitted by some other provision of the instrument. The claim that the counties determine the Senate districts merely in the sense that their boundaries on a certain day were used as convenient measurements for the districts ignores the constant relation between counties and Senate districts which has been maintained during the whole existence of the state government. This was equally true of the large Senate districts established by the Constitutions of 1777 and 1821, and of the single Senate districts under the Constitution of 1846 and the Constitution of 1894. The general principle that the apportionment of representatives in the legislature is to be made upon the basis of population has been modified to preserve the autonomy of counties and their relation to representative Senate districts. There could doubtless be a more exact mathematical division of population for the purpose of legislative representation, if the boundaries of counties were disregarded. But the principle of equality in representation is to some extent subordinated to the purpose of making counties the representative territorial units in the apportionment of senators. It is not difficult to trace the origin of this system embodied in our state Constitution. It has its root in the prominence given to county government and to county organizations from the earliest period of our history and to the habits and associations of the people formed under the county system. The territory of the state in colonial times was divided into counties. Under the state Constitution the county has been the agency of local government and administration in county affairs. Through the counties the state collects its taxes, and through county officers the judgments of its courts have been executed. Powers of local legislation from the beginning have to a greater or less extent been exercised by county boards, and the inhabitants of a county have been accustomed to act together in public affairs and in the promotion of local interests. It was not for mere convenience, therefore, that Senate districts established by the Constitution were made to consist of counties. There was inserted in the Constitution of 1821 a provision which has been incorporated into every subsequent state Constitution, that "no county should be divided in the formation of a Senate district," a provision which, though addressed to the legislature and applicable to future apportionments only, is an emphatic formulation of the policy which has uniformly prevailed.

We assent, therefore, to the proposition that when the Constitution declares that the 22d Senate district shall consist of the county of Westchester, it was a declaration that the county of Westchester as then organized, with its then existing territorial limits, should constitute that district, and that a change of the territorial boundaries of the county would change the Senate district as established, because neither the whole district nor any part of it was by the general scheme to remain outside of the county organization. The answer that the word "county" in article 3, section 3, constituting Westchester county as the 22d Senate district, refers to that county as a political organization, and that so long as the county exists, although shorn of a part of its territory, the part remaining constitutes the district, must be rejected. The claim assumes that by the act of annexation the excised territory became, for Senate district purposes, a part of the city and county of New York. The specific boundaries in the Constitution of the Senate districts in the city and county of New York by streets, avenues, and public waters, with the general clause in connection with the boundaries of the 21st district, inserted to embrace territory in the city not capable of a description by street boundaries, do not admit of enlargement so as to include territory subsequently added to the city by the legislature, and the added territory would form no part of any Senate district in the state if dissevered from the 22d district. But there is a broader objection to an interpretation of the Constitution which would permit the legislature to take territory from one county and Senate district and annex it to another Senate district. It would interfere with the basis of apportionment founded upon population, upon which the convention acted, and enable the legislature at any time, by changing the boundaries of counties, to subvert the approximate equality in population of the Senate districts which it was the aim of the Constitution to establish. It would place it in the power of the legislature to undo and defeat the work of the convention under guise of changing county boundaries. The Constitution gave to the county of Westchester one senator and three members of assembly, and the apportionment was fixed on the basis of its then existing population. The argument assumes that Westchester county would continue until another enumeration entitled to one senator and three members of assembly, although the greater share of its population may, by an act of annexation, be transferred to another county, and although the county to which it is annexed will gain no additional representation. The consequences which might flow from the interpretation of the Constitution just considered forbid its adoption. It would open the door for legislative interference with representative districts for partisan purposes under the guise of changing the boundaries of counties, the prevention of which was the object of several provisions of the Constitution.

Leaving out of view for the present a consideration of special clauses in the new Constitution relating to the division of counties and towns, and assuming that the legislative power over the subject is that only which is embraced in the general grant of legislative power, we have on the one hand Senate districts consisting of counties constituted and defined by the Constitution, and on the other a general legislative power to change the boundaries of counties and towns and to erect new ones. The Constitution contains no express declaration restraining the legislature from altering the Senate districts established by that instrument, intermediate a decennial enumeration. It requires the legislature so to alter the districts as to produce equality as near as may be, at the first regular session after the return of every enumeration, but no power is given by express language to alter them at any other time. If the validity of the act of annexation now in question depends solely upon the force of the general grant of legislative power, the case of Lanning v. Carpenter, 20 N. Y. 447, is an authority against its constitutionality. That case arose under the Constitution of 1846 and involved the validity of the law passed in 1854 (intermediate two decennial periods), creating Schuyler county out of parts of three counties, and the new county as formed embraced parts of two Senate districts and of two judicial districts. The act was held by a divided court to be unconstitutional for the reason that the existing judicial, Senate, and assembly districts organized by or in pursuance of the Constitution then in force, continued unchangeable until after the next succeeding enumeration, and that a change of county boundaries, which should leave Senate districts not bounded by county lines, was a change in contravention of the constitutional requirement that they should consist of entire counties. It was claimed in support of the act that the power to erect a new county was vested in the legislature under the general grant of legislative power and that such incidental and temporary changes in the county boundaries of judicial and legislative districts as might result from the exercise of this power did not invalidate the act. The court rejected this view, and held that the general power must yield to the specific regulations for the formation of Senate and judicial districts, and that the power of the legislature to erect a new county, if it involved a change in the boundaries of Senate and judicial districts by county lines, could only be exercised contemporaneously with the return of a new enumeration. In the subsequent case of Kinne v. Syracuse, 8 Keyes, 110, an act changing the boundaries of the city of Syracuse, passed in 1858, by annexing territory belonging to an assembly district in that county to territory in another assembly district therein, was held to be invalid on the ground that it was an alteration of assembly districts intermediate two decennial periods, in violation of the Constitution.

But the question as to the validity of the annexation act of 1895 does not arise under the Constitution of 1846. The Constitution of 1894 contains provisions not found in the Constitution of 1846, which in our judgment materially affect the question now to be determined. When the constitutional commission of 1873 assembled these cases had been decided. The legislative article proposed by that commission divided the state into eight Senate districts, as under the Constitution of 1821, and apportioned the members of assembly among the counties as under the Constitution of 1846. It appears from the journal of the commission that after the legislative article had been reported by the committee having this subject in charge, on motion of a member from the 7th judicial district, who resided in one of the counties from which Schuyler county was taken, the article was by unanimous consent amended by adding to the section relating to the apportionment of members of assembly and the constitution of assembly districts the clause: "Nothing in this section shall prevent division at any time of towns and counties to be effectual for the purpose of town and county administration." (See Journal of Constitutional Commission, p. 408.) Subsequently, when the article was reported by the committee on revision, this clause was changed so as to read: "Nothing in this section shall prevent division at any time of counties and towns and the erection of new towns and counties by the legislature," and in this form was adopted by the people. But the plan of eight Senate districts was rejected. The clause in a form slightly changed is incorporated in the present Constitution. There was no similar clause in the Constitution of 1846. There can be no doubt that this provision was inserted to overrule the doctrine of the Kinne Case and to relieve the legislature in the exercise of the power to divide counties and towns from the restriction imposed by the decision in that case. The power, it declares, may be exercised "at any time." It is neither restricted as to time, nor by the relation which the dis severed territory may bear to existing assembly districts. Under this power a town may at any time be taken from one county and added to another. Towns belonging to one assembly district may be divided, and the part taken away may be added to a town in another assembly district. Such changes would not violate the prohibitions that "no town shall be divided in the formation of assembly districts," and that assembly districts once formed "shall remain unaltered until another enumeration," on the construction that the assembly districts existing when a division is made remain territorially the same, notwithstanding the division. It is true that the clause is inserted in the section relating to the apportionment of assemblymen and the creation of assembly districts, and declares that "nothing in this section shall prevent," etc. Upon this reading is based an argument that the rule in Lanning v. Carpenter, as applicable to the change of Senate districts, remains unaffected. But we think the insertion of this clause indicates an intention to leave the legislature free to exercise the power to change the boundaries of counties and towns and to erect new towns at any time in its discretion. It is difficult to see any reason for denying this power when its exercise would affect a Senate district, and for permitting its exercise in the case of the smaller unit. There is another clause of some significance in the legislative article of the new Constitution, taken from the amendments of 1874: "but the legislature may abolish the county of Hamilton and annex the territory thereof to some other county or counties." This power could not be exercised between two apportionments without changing the lines of the 27th Senate district, since after the division that district would cease to be bounded by county lines.

We are of the opinion that, under the present Constitution, the act, chapter 984 of the Laws of 1895, as an act of annexation, was within the constitutional power of the legislature, although it changed, as to the 22d Senate district, the county boundaries of the district. But such effect should be given to the act as will least disturb the general plan, and this will be accomplished by regarding the annexed territory as still a part of that district for the election of a senator. The departure from the plan that Senate districts shall be bounded by county lines will be temporary. Upon a new enumeration, the counties of New York and Westchester, as they stand at that time, will be units of division in forming the new legislative districts. It will be, then, the duty of the legislature, under the mandatory provisions of the Constitution, to organize the Senate districts out of the then existing counties, and courts in considering the constitutionality of statutes may act upon the assumption that a duty positively enjoined will be performed. This mode of reconciliation between the Constitution and the statute will not interfere with the policy, so carefully guarded in the Constitution, of preventing a change of representative districts intermediate two enumerations, for partisan purposes. It also gives full effect to the requirement of the Constitution (art. 3, § 5) that boards of supervisors in constituting assembly districts shall so arrange them that each assembly district "shall be wholly within a Senate district formed under the same apportionment."

There are some embarrassments in regarding the annexed territory as part of the county of Westchester for the purpose of division of the county into assembly districts. Boards of supervisors in counties entitled to more than one member of assembly are, by section 5, article 3, of the Constitution, to meet and "divide such counties" into assembly districts. The annexation act took the annexed territory out of Westchester county and made it a part of the county of New York. Its corporate relation to Westchester county was changed. The framers of the Constitution may not in using the word "counties" have had in view the case of a change of county boundaries after an apportionment and before a division into assembly districts. But, construing the word "counties" in this connection as meaning the territorial division existing when the apportionment was made, the difficulty may be overcome. So also upon the construction we give to the act of annexation, the inhabitants of the annexed territory will not be represented in the board of supervisors of Westchester county when it comes to form the assembly districts. So also their interests as residents of the city and county of New York may possibly at times be antagonistic to those of the inhabitants of Westchester county, and yet the senator and members of assembly from that county will be the common representatives of such diverse interests.

We are not unmindful of the difficulties in the case. But they attend any construction which may be given to constitutional provisions, on their face somewhat hostile, but which the court is bound if possible to reconcile. We think the construction of the act of annexation, which affirms its validity as such, but leaves the annexed territory part of the 22d district and of the 2d judicial district and department, and within the jurisdiction of the board of supervisors of Westchester county for the purpose of forming assembly districts, most nearly harmonizes the provisions of the Constitution relating to Senate, judicial, and assembly districts, and the power possessed by the legislature to divide counties and towns.

The objection to the annexation act, that it violates the constitutional provision establishing judicial districts and departments, is answered by the reasoning upon which we sustain the change in the county lines of the 22d Senate district.

The words, "in every respect and to the same extent," found in the annexation act, read in connection with the context, are satisfied by construing them as referring to municipal burdens and municipal rights in which the annexed territory and its inhabitants were to share. The voters in the annexed territory will be entitled to vote for senator, member of assembly and for justices of the supreme court, the same as though the annexation act had not been passed. Elections in the annexed territory will of necessity be conducted under the control of the election officers of the city and county of New York, and the returns will be made to the proper authorities of Westchester county. This was the plan adopted under the annexation act of 1873, and for several years elections were conducted thereunder without confusion or difficulty.

Our conclusion is that the annexation act of 1895 is constitutional, but that it did not operate to take the annexed territory out of the jurisdiction of the board of supervisors of Westchester county in forming assembly districts pursuant to section 5, article 3, of the Constitution, and that it was the duty of the board at its meeting, on the second Tuesday of June, 1895, to have included the annexed territory within one of the three assembly districts allotted by the Constitution to the county of Westchester. The board having failed to perform this duty, the mandamus was properly granted.

The judgment should be affirmed.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

John QUEEN, by Next Friend, Appt.,
v.
DAYTON COAL & IRON COMPANY, (LIMITED).

(.....Tenn.....)

1. Violation of a statute by hiring a boy under twelve years of age to work in a mine constitutes negligence per se which will sustain a civil right of action whenever the boy sustains injuries in consequence of the employment.
2. Liability to persons for whose protection a statute was made, in case of their injury by breach of it, is subject to the defense of contributory negligence.
3. Contributory negligence on the part of a minor is to be measured by his age and his ability to discern and appreciate circumstances of danger.

(October 17, 1895.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Rhea County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Givens & Locke for appellant.

Messrs. Burkett, Miller, & Mansfield for appellee.

McAllister, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was commenced in the circuit court of Rhea county by the plaintiff in error, a minor, suing by his next friend, against the defendant company, to recover damages for personal injuries. The record discloses that the plaintiff in error, a boy about ten years of age, was employed by the defendant company to work in its mines in the capacity of a trapper. His duties were to open and close the gates for the cars to pass through, and, in addition, to keep the track between the two gates clear of coal and slate. The plaintiff testified that at the time of his employment he "was told by the superintendent to mind the car driver, and do whatever he told me. That on the day of the injury Jim Carter was car driver, and was coming on his last trip, with empty cars, and he told me to prop open the gates, and go with him to the headway of the entry, and hold his mule while he got out the loaded cars. I did as he told me and after he got the loaded car he told me to get on the car, which I did, and he then started on the return trip. When he got to the gate, on his way to the main line, he told me to jump off. But this I refused to do and asked him to stop the car; but after he told me several times to jump off, I did so, and fell under the wheels of the car, which crushed my right leg and knee." He further states he had been in the habit of riding on the cars a greater part of the time, but the driver prior to this trip always stopped for him to get off. The superintendent of the company denied that he had placed the boy under the order of the car driver, and stated that he had repeatedly forbidden the plaintiff in error to ride on the cars. The theory of the company was that at the time of the accident the boy was attempting to get on the car, but his foot missed the bumpers, and was caught beneath the car. It was claimed by the company that the boy frequently boarded the car, and had been repeatedly warned of the danger, but that he persisted in violating the rules of the company. The cause was tried by the circuit judge and a jury, resulting in a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendant company. The plaintiff appealed, and has assigned errors.

The Act of 1881 entitled "An Act to Provide for the Ventilation of Coal Mines and Collieries and the Protection of Human Life therein," provides in the 10th section, viz.: "And no boy under twelve years of age shall work or enter any mine, and proof must be given of his age, by certificate or otherwise, before he shall be employed, and no father or other person shall conceal or misrepresent the age of any boy knowingly." A violation of the act is thus declared a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment or both at the discretion of the court trying the same. The record discloses that at the time of his employment the plaintiff in error was a boy about ten years of age. The superintendent states that at the time he hired him he did not know his age, and did not inquire; that he did not demand from him, or any one else, a certificate of his age, and did not receive one. He claims, however, that he hired the boy at the request of his mother, who called to see him frequently on the subject. As applicable to this state of facts, counsel for plaintiff in error requested the court to charge as follows: "I instruct you that the laws of the state of Tennessee prohibit the employment of any child under twelve years of age in any mine in this state, and any such employment by the defendant company would be gross negligence." The circuit judge refused the instruction, and in lieu thereof submitted the following remarks to the jury, viz.: "I instruct you that the statute in question has no application to the facts of this case. It makes it a misdemeanor to employ a child under twelve years of age, and, if defendant did so, it would be guilty of a misdemeanor, and liable to be punished therefor. But the statute does not provide

NOTE.—The generally accepted rule that violation of a statute designed for the protection of persons constitutes negligence, is considered in a note to Sowles v. Moore (Vt.) 21 L. R. A. 722, so far as it is affected by the fact that compliance with the law would not have prevented the injury for which action is brought, and the same question is presented in the later cases of Brember v. Jones (N. H.) 25 L. R. A. 408; Reipe v. Riting (Iowa) 25 L. R. A. 769.

As to the right of a wrongdoer to the protection of such statutes, see note to Condran v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 25 L. R. A. 749.

that one failing to comply with its provisions shall answer civilly for all damages that may result to any such child in its employ; hence it does not apply to the facts of this case. Neither does it appear that the statute prohibits anything in or about which plaintiff was injured. If it did, and defendant disobeyed it, and as a consequence thereof plaintiff was injured, then such failure to obey might be actionable negligence; but such are not the facts of this case." The refusal of the court to give the instruction asked and the remarks made in refusing it constitute the basis of the principal assignment of error. The question presented is one of first impression in this state, but it has been frequently adjudged in other states, and is well settled upon principle. It is laid down in Comyns' Digest "that in every case where a statute enacts or prohibits a thing for the benefit of a person, he shall have a remedy upon the same statute for the thing enacted for his advantage, or for the recompense of a wrong done to him contrary to the said law." Mr. Francis Wharton, the eminent text-writer, in his work on Negligence (sec. 443) states the rule thus: "Where a statute requires an act to be done or abstained from by one person for the benefit of another, then an action lies in the latter's favor against the former for neglect in such act or abstinence, even though the statute gives no special remedy." Thus, in an action against a public officer for neglect, whereby the plaintiff was injured, it is no defense that the defendant contracted, not with the plaintiff, but with the government; the action being founded, not on contract, but on breach of duty. Even the imposition of a penalty by the statute does not oust the remedy by indictment, nor, a fortiori, by suit for negligence, unless the penalty be given to the party injured in satisfaction for injury." Says Mr. Bishop, in his work on Non-Contract Law (sec. 182): "Whenever the common law, a statute . . . imposes on one a duty, if of a sort affecting the public within the principles of criminal law, a breach of it is indictable, and a civil action will lie in favor of any person who has suffered especially therefrom. Or, if the matter of the law involves only the interests of individuals, any one who has received harm from another's disobedience may have his suit against him for the damages."

This question was considered in Pauley v. Steam Gauge & L. Co., 181 N. Y. 90, 15 L. R. A. 194. In that case it appeared that a statute of New York required that fire escapes should be provided on the outside of all factories three or more stories in height. The act imposed penalties for a disobedience of its provisions. The defendant failed to construct fire escapes on its buildings as required by the statute. It caught fire, and plaintiff's intestate was burned to death. The court said: "I am unable to agree with the contention of the appellant that the sole remedy under the statute was the public remedy which consisted of an enforcement of the penalties provided. The requirement of fire escapes was for the direct and special benefit of the operatives in such factories, and intended for their protection, and the rule applies that when a statute commands or prohibits a thing for the benefit of a person he shall have a remedy upon the same statute for the thing enacted for his advantage, or for a wrong done to him contrary to its terms." See also Willy v. Mulledy, 78 N. Y. 310, 34 Am. Rep. 536. As another illustration of the rule it has been repeatedly held that the running of a railroad train, within city limits, at a rate of speed prohibited, constitutes negligence per se, and gives a right of action to any one suffering injuries in consequence thereof. 1 Thomp. Neg. p. 506, § 8. So we think the employment of this minor in violation of the provision of the statute in question was an act of negligence on the part of the defendant, and, a causal connection between the employment and the injuries sustained by the boy being shown, a case of liability is made out. Of course, we do not hold that if the boy had died of organic disease of the heart, or from a stroke of paralysis, or from some cause wholly disconnected with his employment, the company would have been liable in damages simply on account of the employment in violation of the statute. But we do hold that the breach of the statute is actionable negligence whenever it is shown that the injuries were sustained in consequence of the employment. This view of the case does not preclude the defense of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. Says Mr. Bishop in his work on Non-Contract Law (sec. 140): "It suits the argument in many of the cases for the judges to look upon disobedience to a legal command as an act of negligence. Thereupon the doctrine of contributory negligence applies to the plaintiff, precluding his recovery in cases within its rules." Says Mr. Thompson (vol. 2, p. 1175, § 28): "Statutes exacting special precautions on the part of the owners of dangerous machinery are generally construed as not abrogating the ordinary rules of contributory negligence," etc. "The effect of such statutes is simply to make the failure to comply with their requirements negligence per se, and not to excuse negligence in other persons." Thus, a statute of Iowa requiring the tumbling rods of threshing machines to be boxed, and providing that the owners of such machines shall be answerable in damages to any person injured by a failure to do so, does not give a right of action where the negligence of the party injured directly contributed to the injury. Again, it was held in an English case that, although a shafting was unfenced, in violation of a statute, yet, if the plaintiff, contrary to the commands of the proprietor, took hold of it, and set it in motion, whereby he was injured, he could not recover damages. Canwell v. Worth, 5 El. & Bl. 849.

It is hardly necessary to add that contributory negligence on the part of a minor is to be measured by his age and his ability to discern and appreciate circumstances of danger. He is not chargeable with the same degree of care as an experienced adult, but is only required to exercise such prudence as one of his years may be expected to possess. We think the charge of the court is objectionable in not fully explaining to the jury the degree of care which is required of an infant of tender years; but we would not reverse for this reason, since there was no request for additional instructions, and more especially because the assignment of error in respect of this subject is fatally defective.

We are also of opinion that the request submitted by counsel for plaintiff in error in respect of the violation of the statute was not strictly accurate, in that it assumed that the employment of the boy was gross negligence, which charge would have constituted in itself a basis for the assessment of exemplary damages. A proper request would have made the breach of the statute actionable negligence or negligence per se.

It appears, however, that the circuit judge, in refusing the instruction submitted by counsel, undertook to give an exposition of the statute which we hold to be erroneous, and for this reason the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Jonas F. BROWN, Appl.,

v.

Joseph M. MARKHAM, Respnt.

*1. The log-lien law of 1876 (Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 82, §§ 63-77, inclusive; Gen. Stat. 1894, §§ 2451-2466) is constitutional.

2. A judgment for the plaintiff in such an action does not preclude the owner of the logs from denying the right of the plaintiff to a lien upon them in an action brought to recover the logs, or their value in case recovery cannot be had. But in such action the judgment in the original proceedings to establish the lien, regular on its face, must be held valid unless the contrary affirmatively appears, and all reasonable presumption consistent with the record must be made to sustain it.

3. The writ issued to the sheriff in this case contained all that was required by the statute. The return of the sheriff indorsed thereon, a copy being filed, also contained all that was contemplated by the statute, but, in addition, the sheriff certified that he had attached all of the right, title, and interest of the defendant in the described logs. Held, that the irregularity in the return should be disregarded, and that the return was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction over the logs to the extent necessary to proceed to a judgment establishing the lien.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County overruling a motion for a new trial after judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover possession of certain logs which had been seized for the satisfaction of a laborer's lien. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George R. Robinson, for appellant;

The log-lien law of 1876 (Gen. Stat. 1878, p. 845, §§ 63-77, etc.), so far as it assumes to take NOTE.—The decision sustaining the constitutionality of the Minnesota logger's lien law is of importance in several other states at least. For various matters about the rights of laborers under mechanics' lien laws, see note to Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Canada & St. L. R. Co. (Ind.) 11 L. R. A. 740.

As to due process of law furnished by opportunity for subsequent contest of question first dethe property of a third party to satisfy a claim for a lien without making him a party to the proceedings to enforce the same by actual notice of the proceedings or an actual seizure instead of a constructive seizure of the logs, is unconstitutional and void.

U. S. Const. art. 5; Minn. Const. art. 2, § 7. The proceeding is a proceeding in rem as to the logs.

Griffin v. Chadbourne, 82 Minn. 126.

To give the court jurisdiction of the logs, some actual seizure is necessary from which the court could presume notice to the owner; otherwise the owner should be notified.

Waples, Proc. in Rem. p. 88, § 64; Taylor v. Carryl, 61 U. S. 20 How. 583, 15 L. ed. 1028; Pellham v. Rose, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 103, 19 L. ed. 602; The Silver Spring, 1 Sprague, 551.

The proceeding under which the sheriff claimed possession was based, not on a seizure, but on a purely constructive one, by filing notice in the office of the surveyor general of logs, and could not be notice to the owner of any interference with his rights.

The levy in this case could only be good if W. M. Smith was the owner or had some interest in the property.

Waples, Proc. in Rem. §§ 43, 69, with authorities cited.

Such a levy in an ordinary execution levy has only been sustained where the defendant actually had title.

Vilas v. Reynolds, 6 Wis. 214.

The levy in this case would be construed as a deed of quitclaim of right, title, and interest should have been and was construed by our courts prior to the amendment of our statute as to construction of such conveyances.

Martin v. Brown, 4 Minn. 282; Hope v. Stone, 10 Minn. 141; Everest v. Ferris, 16 Minn. 26.

The seizure voluntarily abandoned was a release of the lien.

Mr. George H. Reynolds, for respondent:

The return shows that the officer, under writ of attachment, made a levy upon the logs themselves, but if such were not the case it would be the duty of the court to strike out that part of the return which indicates that the interest of some particular person has been levied upon.

The general statutes of the state of Minnesota providing for the renewal of an execution do not take away the common-law right to an alias.

Walter v. Greenwood, 29 Minn. 87; Barrett v. McKenzie, 24 Minn. 20.

Chapter 89 of the General Laws of 1876, entitled "An Act Providing for a Lien for Labor upon Logs and Timber," is constitutional.

Where a particular construction has been placed upon an act for over fifteen years, without question by either the legislative or executive department of the government, it would be on considerations of public policy too late to question its correctness, unless it is very clearly wrong.

Cooley, Const. Lim. §§ 82-85; Nash v. Sullivan, 29 Minn. 211; Farribault v. Misenor, 20 Minn. 396; Ames v. Lake Superior & M. R. Co. 21 Minn. 241.

Chapter 89 of the Laws of 1876 entered into and became a part of the contract made by appellant and W. M. Smith who took the contract to cut the logs, and appellant is presumed to have notice of the existence of the lien in favor of the man who swings the axe, wields the goad-stick, or cooks a pot of beans.

Bardwell v. Mann, 46 Minn. 255; Van Stone v. Stillwell & B. Mfg. Co. 142 U. S. 123, 35 L. ed. 961; Reilly v. Stephenson, 62 Mich. 509; Mallory v. La Crosse Abattoir Co. 80 Wis. 170; Bourgette v. Williams, 73 Mich. 208; Oliver v. Woodman, 66 Me. 54.

The general owner of the logs had notice of the pendency of the action to enforce the log lien, and it was his duty under section 6 of chapter 89, Laws of 1876, to apply to the court to be admitted as a party to such action.

Griffin v. Chadbourne, 32 Minn. 26; Stapp v. The Clyde, 43 Minn. 192; Miller v. Corinna, 43 Minn. 391; Happy v. Mosher, 48 N. Y. 818.

A party is not deprived of his property without due process of law if he can bring an action against the officer who seized the logs, in which action he can show that the logs are not subject to the lien.

Munger v. Lenroot, 32 Wis. 541.

Saw-logs in the boom at Minneapolis worth $2 each would, standing in the woods on one of the tributaries of the upper Mississippi river, be worth not more than 25 cents. The addition in value has been created by the labor of some one entitled to a lien under chapter 89 of the Laws of 1876.

Sheppard v. Taylor, 80 U. S. 5 Pet. 675, 8 L. ed. 269; Taylor v. Carryl, 61 U. S. 20 How. 538, 15 L. ed. 1028; Stapp v. The Clyde, supra.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The leading question in the case is the constitutional right to a lien.

stitutionality of the log-lien law of 1876 (Gen. Stat. 1873, chap. 82, §§ 63-77, inclusive; Gen. Stat. 1894, §§ 2451-2465). The claim is made that the law provides for and authorizes the taking of the property of one person to pay and discharge the debt of another without due process of law, because there is no requirement that notice of the pendency of the proceedings shall be given to the owner of the logs. It is true that the only defendant contemplated by the law is the person liable for the payment of the debt itself, except in cases of intervention, and frequently such person is not, and never has been, such owner. Although there has been much litigation growing out of the passage of this act almost eighteen years ago, the question was first presented to this court at its last term. While the fact that its validity has never been questioned here has been, so far as this tribunal is concerned, acquiesced in for nearly two decades, cannot be allowed to control our decision, the fact must not be disregarded altogether. No one questions the power of the legislature to give those who perform labor upon logs a lien thereon for their wages. The objection urged against the validity of the statute is that heretofore noticed. Upon the theory that the judgment in lien proceedings is conclusive against the owner of the property, the objection cannot be overcome. Treating the action as a proceeding in rem as to the logs, the mere constructive seizure of them by filing a copy of the writ of attachment and of the sheriff's return thereon in the office of the surveyor general is clearly inadequate as notice to the owner. If we treat the action as one in personam, there is also an entire absence of any provision for notice to the owner, such as would constitute "due process of law." But, if the only effect of the action is to protect or continue the lien of the laborer, if he have one, leaving the lien still in pais as to the log owner, who still has the right to contest it on the merits whenever his property is seized or interfered with, then there can be no constitutional objection to the law. Although the judgment in the statutory action would be as to the owner of the logs res inter alios acta, yet it would be competent for the legislature to make it prima facie evidence against him. That would be a mere rule of evidence. The log-lien law of 1876 was copied, undoubtedly, from the statutes of the state of Wisconsin. In 1873 (Munger v. Lenroot, 32 Wis. 542) the validity of the law was upheld in that state. It was said in the opinion in that case that, while it might have been proper to have provided for the giving of notice to and the bringing in of the log owner into the action, it was not absolutely essential, for, by the proceedings actually had, he was not prevented from having his day in court. He could bring a suit to recover possession of his property, and therein show that the claimants were not entitled to enforce any liens against it. It was held that the elementary principle that the log owner could not be concluded by a judgment to which he was not a party, was applicable when such owner attempted to assert his legal right to the property against which lien proceedings had been taken. Redington v. Frye, 43 Me. 578, was referred to as authority upon the question. In 1875 (Winslow v. Urquhart, 39 Wis. 260) the decision in the Munger Case was adhered to, it being distinctly laid down that the Wisconsin statutes, under which the lien proceedings were had, were valid laws, although they did not require that the general owner of the logs in controversy should be made a party, and, further, that such proceedings were not invalid merely because such owner was not made a party. But, on the authority of the Munger Case, it was declared that in an action brought by the general owner he might contest the right of the claimant to enforce a lien against his logs. An examination of the cases cited from Wisconsin will show that they are exactly in point here. The log-lien law of the state of Michigan is much like the one we are considering. The noticeable difference is that the officer executing the writ of attachment is required to serve, or to cause to be served, a copy of such attachment on the log owner or his agent or attorney, before the return day, if such owner, agent, or attorney be known to the officer, and be a resident of the state. The person primarily liable for the payment of the debt is made defendant in the action as he is here under the statute of 1876, and, as with us, the owner is privileged to appear, intervene, and defend. From what we have stated concerning the requirement of the Michigan statute as to service of a notice or copy of the attachment upon the owner, his agent or attorney, it is obvious that it is open to attack upon the same ground as that urged in this case, for no one could contend that this provision as to service on the log owner or his agent really aided the law as against an objection to its validity from a constitutional standpoint. While the precise question now before us was not involved, it was remarked in Reilly v. Stephenson, 62 Mich. 509, that such a law was valid if an opportunity was given the log owner to contest the claimant's right to a lien. See also Oradock v. Dwight, 85 Mich. 588, in which it is affirmed, on the strength of previous decisions, that the lien is valid.

Under our view of the statute of 1876, an opportunity is given the owner of the logs to contest the right of the claimant to a lien in an action like this to recover the property, or its value in case a recovery cannot be had. As was said in the case last cited, the owner of the standing pine knows perfectly well when he enters into a contract for lumbering that labor must be performed which, day by day, enters into the material, and enhances its value; and he knows equally as well that the laborers have the right to protect themselves in the matter of compensation by putting a lien on the logs. Knowing this, and having it within his power to care for his own interests when contracting for the work, the owner of the logs cannot say that a law which simply secures payment to the men who perform the manual labor is unreasonable. He must intend that liens shall attach, and his own rights be subjected thereto. The same thought is found in the mechanics' lien case of Bardwell v. Mann, 46 80 L. R. A.

Minn. 285. Nowhere in the statute now being considered is there an attempt to deprive the log owner of his right to be heard,—of his day in court. He knows the law, and, at least, expects if he has not protected himself, as well as the men, that liens will be filed. If he has not contracted with responsible parties, or provided for the payment of wages in his contract, he must intend that liens shall be filed, and the records in the office of the surveyor general of logs and lumber are open to his inspection, so that he can easily be advised of the situation. These records cannot well be held as notice which will bind him, but they convey the desired information. And by express provision of the statute the owner is given an opportunity to intervene, and take part in the original action. If he does so, he is bound by the result. If he fails to participate, the proceeding does not take away his property; it simply establishes a lien, which he expected and intended when entering into a contract for the lumbering,—a lien in which a sale is made and a sheriff's certificate given, but it cannot be made conclusive evidence of ownership as against such owner. That the action should be brought against the employer who hired the laborer, and not against the owner, when not the employer, is quite proper, for with the owner the laborer had no contract. See Oliver v. Woodman, 66 Me. 54. The lien is a just one, and to the extent here indicated easily sustained. In an action brought by the owner of the logs the judgment in the original proceedings, regular on its face, must be held valid, unless the contrary affirmatively appears; and all reasonable presumptions consistent with the record must be made to sustain it. Winslow v. Urquhart, supra. This disposes of the claim that the law is unconstitutional.

We will now briefly consider appellant's contention that in any event the levy of the attachment was insufficient. The writ, as provided in Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 32, § 65 (Gen. Stat. 1894, § 2458), required the sheriff to attach and safely keep the logs described in plaintiff's lien affidavit, namely, 1,501,680 feet, bearing certain specified marks, or so much thereof as might be necessary to satisfy the amount stated as plaintiff's claim for his work and labor. Under the statute the attachment is made by filing certified copies of the writ, and of the sheriff's return of levy indorsed thereon, in the office of the surveyor general, specifying the mark or marks on the logs and the quantity levied on. The return actually made—a copy thereof being filed—contained all that the statute contemplated, but, in addition, the sheriff certified that he had attached all of the right, title, and interest of the defendant in that action, Smith, therein. But, in view of the statute, and notwithstanding this irregularity, the return was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction over the logs to the extent necessary to proceed to a judgment establishing an already existing lien. That part of the return which stated that the interest of the defendant had been levied on must be disregarded as manifestly repugnant to what the sheriff was directed to do, what be intended to do, and what he actually did. Fullam v. Stearns, 80 Vt. 448; Buck-Reiner Co. v. McCoy, 85 Iowa, 577. This covers all of the alleged errors which need to be specially considered.

Order affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

ETNA LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY,
Pf in Err.,

v.

Nancy L. FLORIDA

(80 Fed. Rep. 922.)

1. It will be presumed that the rulings of the court below excluding from evidence a will offered to show the condition of the testator's mind, and claims filed in the probate court offered to show his financial condition, were correct where, the will and claims were not contained in the record.

2. The insured can be held to have "contemplated suicide" so as to defeat a policy of life insurance, under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 5855, only when he intended or had resolved to commit suicide at the time when he made his application for the policy.

(September 16, 1895.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on certain insurance policies. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion. Before Caldwell, Sanborn, and Thayer, Circuit Judges.

Mr. Frank M. Estes for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. L. R. Willsey, W. F. Boyle, and E. B. Adams for defendant in error.

Thayer, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by Nancy L. Florida, the defendant in error, against the Etna Life Insurance Company, the plaintiff in error, to recover the amount of two life insurance policies issued by said company on the life of Alonzo K. Florida, the plaintiff's husband. Both of said policies were made payable to the plaintiff as beneficiary. One of them was executed on July 30, 1891, for the sum of $5,000; the other was executed on July 12, 1892, for the sum of $10,000. The plaintiff's husband committed suicide on April 27, 1893, and a demand was thereafter made on the defendant company for payment of the policies. Payment was refused, and the present suit was thereupon instituted.

On the trial of the case the circuit court instructed the jury, in substance, that it was conceded by the defendant company that the plaintiff was entitled to recover on the policies, "unless, at the time Alonzo K. Florida made application for them, he was in contemplation of committing suicide at some future time, so that by such acts of self-destruction the insurance company would be defrauded of the sum so insured;" and, as no exception was taken to this instruction, we must assume, for the purpose of this decision, that the only defense intended to be relied upon by the defendant company was the defense pleaded in its answer, as follows:

"Defendant states . . . that on the 27th day of April, 1893, and within two years from the date of said policies, said Florida committed suicide; and the defendant alleges the fact to be that said Florida, at the time that he made his said applications to the defendant for said policies, contemplated suicide; that, at the time of making said applications for said insurance, said Florida contemplated and intended to secure the said contracts of insurance from this defendant with the intention soon thereafter to take his own life; that the said purpose and intention of said Florida were not known to the defendant, and were purposely concealed by him in order that he might secure said policies of insurance, and thereafter, by taking his own life, enable his representatives to secure the benefits accruing under said policies; that the said acts of said Florida were a fraud upon this defendant; and that, by reason of said acts of said Florida, said policies of insurance became wholly void."

It should be stated in this connection that the policies in question were executed and delivered in the state of Missouri, and that at the date of their execution the following statutes were in force in that state:

"No misrepresentation made in obtaining or securing a policy of insurance on the life or lives of any person or persons shall be deemed material, or render the policy void, unless the matter misrepresented shall have actually contributed to the contingency or event on which the policy is to become due and payable, and whether it so contributed in any case shall be a question for the jury." Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 5849.

"In all suits upon policies of insurance on life hereafter issued by any company doing business in this state, it shall be no defense that the insured committed suicide, unless it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the court or jury trying the cause that the insured contemplated suicide at the time he made his application for the policy, and any stipulation in the policy to the contrary shall be void." Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 5855.

In the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Missouri, where the case was tried, the plaintiff recovered a judgment for the full amount of the policies; and the case was brought to this court for review on a writ of error sued out by the defendant company. The errors assigned relate to the exclusion of testimony and to the charge of the trial court. There are numerous assignments of the former kind, but it would subserve no useful purpose to review them in detail, as most of the questions propounded which were excluded were obviously improper questions, because they were calculated to elicit hearsay or secondary evidence, or the conclusions of witnesses rather than the facts on which such conclusions were based, or because the questions were designed to establish the existence of particular facts by common rumor, or because the questions asked were too vague and general, or a mere repetition of questions that had already been asked and answered. We shall forego any discussion of the several assignments of error to which the last remark applies, confining ourselves to those exceptions taken which seem to us to be most tenable.

At one stage of the trial, counsel for the defendant company offered in evidence what purported to be the will of Alonzo K. Florida, deceased, for the purpose, as stated by him at the time of showing the condition of the testator's mind. It was objected to and excluded, and an exception was saved. We cannot decide whether this ruling of the trial court was right or wrong, because the alleged will is not found in the bill of exceptions, and, without examining it, it is impossible to say what it may have tended to show with respect to the testator's purpose or mental condition. The defendant also appears to have offered in evidence a large number of claims which had been filed in the probate court of the city of St. Louis against the estate of Alonzo K. Florida. These were objected to, the claims were excluded, and an exception was saved. The claims in question appear to have been excluded because the circuit court was of opinion that they had no tendency to show the financial condition of the deceased at or prior to the taking out of the policies in suit. Whether that ruling was erroneous or otherwise cannot be determined, because the claims are not contained in the record. The ruling of the trial court must be presumed to have been correct. A witness for the defendant company was also asked the following question: "What was Mr. Florida's financial condition during the winter of 1892 and 1893? I will put it this way: Do you know what his financial condition was during the winter of 1892 and the beginning of 1893?" The answer to this interrogatory was excluded, on the ground that it could have no tendency to show the financial condition of the deceased in July, 1891, and in July, 1892, when the policies were taken out, and that no attempt had been made to furnish authentic evidence of his financial condition at the latter dates. We cannot say that there was any material error in this ruling, although the testimony would doubtless have been competent, and would probably have been admitted if counsel had undertaken to show that the indebtedness existing against the deceased in the winter of 1892 and 1893 had its origin prior to the issuance of the policies, or either of them. Without pursuing this branch of the case at any greater length, it will suffice to say that none of the errors assigned on account of the exclusion of testimony appear to us to be tenable.

The question in the case of paramount importance is whether the circuit court properly defined the words "contemplated suicide," as used in Mo. Rev. Stat. § 5855, supra. On this subject the court charged the jury as follows: "The fact of suicide is no defense, unless it be the culmination of a purpose formed at the time application was made for the respective policies. Unless, therefore, you believe from the weight of the evidence that on the 30th day of July, 1891, at the time of making application for the policy of that date, Alonzo K. Florida contemplated thereafter committing suicide, and thereby enabling his wife to collect the amount named in the policy, then your verdict upon the first count must be for the plaintiff."

Unless you believe from the weight of the evidence that on the 12th day of July, 1892, at the time of making application for the policy of insurance of that date, Alonzo K. Florida did so with the contemplated, well-formed purpose of thereafter committing suicide, and thereby enabling his wife to collect the amount named in the policy, your verdict must be for the plaintiff upon the second count of the petition. . . . The fact, if from the evidence you believe it to be a fact, that Alonzo K. Florida committed suicide, constitutes in itself no defense on the part of the insurance companies under this clause. In order to make a defense out of such fact, you must believe from the preponderance of the evidence that Alonzo K. Florida, at the time he made application for either or both of the policies of life insurance involved in this suit, contemplated suicide; and by contemplated is meant there was a complete, well-formed purpose of taking his own life, and that purpose culminated by actually killing himself, with a view and for the purpose of defrauding the defendant company out of the money stipulated in the policy to be paid."

The objection made to this part of the charge, and the only objection thereto, is that the court declared that the word "contemplated" meant the same as the word "intended." It is insisted that there is a material distinction between the words "contemplated" and "intended;" that the former word means "attentively considered," "thought about," whereas the latter word signifies "a more determinative state of mind," a well-formed purpose; and that the legislature must be presumed to have used the word "contemplated" in the sense above suggested.

The proposition maintained by the defendant company is thus concisely stated by its counsel: "It was not necessary for the defendant to show that Florida effected this insurance with the deliberate purpose to commit suicide; it was sufficient to show that he was 'considering with attention' the project of suicide, and effected the insurance with the design that, in case his contemplation should ripen into actual perpetration of suicide, then his beneficiaries should be provided for out of the proceeds of the insurance. . . . Hence it follows that the theory expressed throughout the several portions of the charge bearing on this point, that 'contemplated suicide' meant a predetermined, well-formed purpose of suicide, is erroneous, and those portions of the charge expressing this conception were erroneous."

It is no doubt true that the primary signification of the word "contemplate" is to consider attentively or to meditate; but it is equally true that a secondary meaning of the word is to "intend;" and in ordinary conversation the word "contemplate" is frequently used as a synonym for the word "intend,"—that is, to express a well-formed purpose. Moreover, instances are not wanting where the word "contemplate" has been held to be synonymous with the words "expect" or "intend." Thus, in Buckingham v. McLean, 54 U. S. 13 How. 151, 167, 14 L. ed. 91, 97, the words "in contemplation of bankruptcy," as used in the bankrupt act of 1841 (5 Stat. at L. 442, chap. 9, § 2), were held to be tantamount to the expression "expecting or intending to commit an act of bankruptcy." See also Jones v. Howland, 8 Met. 377, 41 Am. Dec. 525.

We think, however, that the sense in which the legislature intended to use the word "contemplated" in the statute now under consideration can be best determined by considering the statute itself and the connection in which the word occurs. The statute was primarily designed to prevent the plea of suicide from being thereafter interposed as a defense to an action on a policy of life insurance. It declares that, "in all suits upon policies of insurance on life hereafter issued by any company doing business in this state, it shall be no defense that the insured committed suicide." The subsequent clause, "unless it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the court or jury trying the cause that the insured contemplated suicide at the time he made his application for the policy," was not intended to create or afford to life insurance companies a new defense to such actions, but rather to state an exception to the general rule first enunciated. The legislature was doubtless aware of the fact that at common law, without the aid of any statute, it was competent for an insurance company to show, by way of defense to an action on a life insurance policy, that the assured had taken out the policy with the preconceived intent of thereafter committing suicide, and that such purpose was subsequently executed. It doubtless intended by the concluding clause to preserve the right to still make that defense. Smith v. National Ben. Soc. 128 N. Y. 85, 9 L. R. A. 616. This seems to us to 80 L. R. A.

have been the manifest purpose of the concluding paragraph of the statute. It recognizes the existence of a defense well known to the law, to wit, the defense of fraud, and authorizes the insurer to make that defense. It must be borne in mind that the general purpose of the statute was to curtail the rights of insurance companies rather than to enlarge them, wherefore it cannot well be presumed that the legislature intended to create in their favor a new statutory defense consisting in the fact that the assured, prior to his application for insurance, had considered the expediency of committing suicide in a given emergency, although he had formed no fixed resolution to do so. We think, therefore, that the contention that the legislature used the word "contemplated" to signify a state of mind in which the assured had considered or thought about the subject of suicide without having any well-defined purpose or intent, is not tenable.

Another objection to the construction sought to be placed upon the statute by the defendant company is that it renders the law too uncertain and difficult of application. If we adopt the defendant's definition of the word "contemplated," and assume that it was used by the legislature in that sense, then the inquiry immediately arises, When can a person be said to have so far considered the subject of suicide, or to have so had that thought in mind, as to vitiate a policy of life insurance? In the practical administration of the law, courts will find it difficult to answer this question to the comprehension of a jury. The line must necessarily be drawn somewhere between that amount of thought or contemplation which will and that which will not defeat a policy, because a subject may be considered with different degrees of intensity or attention, and it will hardly do to say that any amount of thought on the subject of suicide as a future possibility, at the time of taking out a policy, will serve to avoid it if the assured eventually dies by his own hand.

Upon the whole, therefore, we conclude that the statute should be construed to mean that hereafter it shall be no defense to a suit upon a life insurance policy that the insured committed suicide, unless it shall be proven to the satisfaction of the court or jury that the insured intended or had resolved to commit suicide at the time when he made his application for the policy. This, as we understand the charge, was the view that was entertained by the trial court and substantially expressed in its instruction, and in thus declaring the law no error was committed.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, FOURTH CIRCUIT.

W. Briggs GREEN, App't,

v.

Lawrence P. MILLS.

(69 Fed. Rep. 632.)

1. An appeal lies to the United States circuit court of appeals from an interlocutory order continuing a preliminary injunction where, although there is a question of jurisdiction resting on the challenging of a state law as in contravention of the Federal Constitution, yet at the threshold of the case the further question arises whether the facts relied on make a case of equitable cognizance.
2. An injunction to restrain the exercise of governmental powers under an unconstitutional statute cannot be granted on behalf of individuals who assert no threatened infringement of rights of property or civil rights.
3. An injunction against any registration of voters on the ground that the statute providing for the registration is unconstitutional because its provisions are so unreasonable, unnecessary, and burdensome that complainant has been unable to register after repeated and persistent efforts to do so, cannot be granted, since the action sought to be enjoined is political and governmental, and will not infringe any right of property or civil right of the complainant and others similarly situated.

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina enjoining defendant from furnishing registration lists for the carrying out of an election. Reversed.

Before Fuller, Circuit Justice, and Hughes and Seymour, District Judges.

Statement by Fuller, Circuit Justice:

This was a bill of complaint filed in the circuit court of the United States for the district of South Carolina April 19, 1895, by Lawrence P. Mills, described as "a citizen of the state of South Carolina and of the United States," against W. Briggs Green, described as "a citizen of said state and the United States," and exhibited on behalf of complainant and all other citizens of the county of Richland, in the state of South Carolina, circumstanced like himself, and too numerous to be made parties, alleging that complainant was twenty-one years of age February 4, 1895; that he is a resident of ward 4, precinct of Columbia, in said county and state; that he is a male citizen of the United States; that he has resided in the state of South Carolina for more than one year preceding the last general election in that state, and in the county of Richland for more than sixty days prior to the said general election; that complainant is an elector of the state of South Carolina, possessing all the qualifications of an elector of the most numerous branch of the state legislature, provided by the state Constitution, and that he is subject to none of the disqualifications set forth in said Constitution; and that he is, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, duly qualified to vote at all Federal and state elections held in said ward, county, and state.

The bill then set forth section 90 of the General Statutes of South Carolina of 1882, as follows: "All electors of the state shall be registered as hereinafter provided; and no person shall be allowed to vote at any election hereafter to be held unless registered as hereinafter required." And section 133 of the Revised Statutes of South Carolina of 1893 to the same effect: "All electors of this state shall be registered, and no person shall be allowed to vote at any election hereafter to be held unless he shall have heretofore registered in conformity with the requirements of chapter 7 of the General Statutes of 1882, and acts amendatory thereof, or shall be registered as herein required." And also section 94 of the General Statutes of 1882, providing: "When the said registration [in certain books to be provided him and made in the manner provided for in section 93] shall have been completed the books shall be closed and not reopened for registration except for the purposes and as hereinafter mentioned until after the general election for state officers. After the said next general election the books shall be opened for the registration of such persons as shall thereafter become entitled to register on the first Monday in each month to and until the first Monday in July, inclusive, preceding the following general election, upon which last-named day the same shall be closed and not reopened for registration until after the said general election, and ever after the said books shall be opened for the registration of such electors, and on the days above mentioned, until the first day of July preceding a general election, when the same shall be closed as aforesaid until the said general election shall have taken place." And in section 137 of the said Revised Statutes of 1893 it is provided: "After every general election the registration books shall be opened for registration of such persons as shall thereafter become entitled to register on the first Monday in each month until the first day of July preceding a general election, when the same shall be closed until such election shall have taken place." And also section 97 of the General Statutes of 1882, in the following words: "Any person coming of age and becoming qualified as an elector may appear before the supervisor of registration on any day on which the books are opened as aforesaid and take oath as to his age and qualification, as hereinbefore provided, and if the supervisor find him qualified he shall enter his name upon the registration book of the precinct wherein he resides."

NOTE.—An appeal from the decision in the above case was dismissed by the Supreme Court of the United States on November 25, 1895, on the ground that the occasion for which the injunction was sought had already passed.

It was further alleged "that, in and by the requirements of said registration enactments of the government of the state of South Carolina, it is provided that the respective supervisors of registration in the several counties shall issue to the voter when registered a certificate of registration, and that said voter shall present the same at the polls to the managers of election, and that no one shall be allowed to vote at any election to be held in the said state unless his certificate of registration as aforesaid is exhibited at the time and in the manner aforesaid. And it is further required, in and by the said alleged enactments, that, in case a voter or elector shall remove from one county to another in said state, or from one precinct to another in the same county, or from one residence to another in the same precinct, he shall obtain a transfer and a renewal certificate. And it is further provided, in said enactments, that, in the event an elector shall lose his said certificate of registration, he must obtain a renewal thereof upon furnishing evidence satisfactory to the registrar of the said county wherein he resides that his said certificate has been mislaid or lost, and that the same has not been wilfully or intentionally disposed of." And it was averred "that, by the provisions and requirements of said enactments, the elector failing for any reason to comply with any of the provisions aforesaid is denied the right of suffrage both in Federal and state elections," and "that the provisions of the said enactments fixing the time for registration and the closing of the books for that purpose on the 1st day of July preceding every election, and the many and divers provisions, requirements, and conditions set out in the various and sundry sections of said alleged act, were intended to, and that they in effect do, abridge, impede, and destroy the suffrage of the citizen both of the state and of the United States."

The bill further averred the passage on the 24th day of December, 1894, by the government of the state of South Carolina of an act to provide for calling a constitutional convention, by section 4 of which it was declared who should be entitled to vote for delegates to the said constitutional convention: and in addition to the qualifications prescribed for electors by the Constitution of the state of South Carolina, a further qualification was provided, to wit, that the elector be "duly registered as now required by law, or who, having been entitled to register as a voter at the time of the general registration of electors in the state which took place in the year of our Lord 1882, or at any time subsequent thereto, failed to register at such time required by law, or who has become a citizen of this state and who shall register as hereinafter provided in such cases." Sections 6 and 7 of this act were set forth as follows: "That on the first Monday of March, in the year of our Lord 1895, the supervisor of registration of each county shall, at the county seat thereof, open his books of registration, and shall hold the same open for ten consecutive calendar days thereafter, except Sundays, between the hours of 10 o'clock in the forenoon and 4 o'clock in the afternoon, except 30 L. R. A.

Charleston, Beaufort, and Richland counties, where the said books shall be kept open from 10 o'clock in the forenoon to 6 o'clock in the afternoon, during which time any elector then or theretofore at any time entitled to register as a qualified voter, or who has become a citizen of this state, shall be, during the time herein fixed by law for registration, entitled to register as such, as hereinafter provided; and any elector having been heretofore duly registered, or having since changed his residence, or having lost his certificate, shall be entitled to have the same transferred or renewed, as now provided by law." "Any elector who shall have been entitled to register at the general registration in the year of our Lord 1882, or at any time subsequent thereto, and who failed to register at such time as required by law, and who shall make application under oath in accordance with the printed form to be prepared by the attorney general, setting forth in each case the fact, to wit: The full name, age, occupation and residence of the applicant at the time of the said general registration, or at any time thereafter, when the said applicant became entitled to register, and the place or places of his residence since the time he became entitled to register, which affidavit shall be supported by the affidavits of two reputable citizens who were each of the age of twenty-one years on the 18th day of June, A. D. 1882, or at the time the said applicant became entitled thereafter to register, or any elector who has become a citizen of this state, by moving into the same and his place of residence since living in the state and who shall make application under oath, stating the time of his moving into the state and his place of residence since living in the state, which application shall be supported by the affidavit of two reputable citizens, who were twenty-one years of age at the time the applicant became a resident of this state, such applicant shall be allowed to register as a voter and to have issued to him a certificate as a duly qualified elector in the manner and form now provided by law, and be entitled to vote at said election for delegates to said convention."

The bill then charged that these sections so limited, abridged, and qualified the privilege of registration that they resulted in a practical denial of the right to vote to those electors who, by the operation of the provisions of the General Statutes of 1882 and Revised Statutes of 1893, are now unregistered; and that they were so "interwoven with, and are such integral parts of, the whole alleged registration laws of the state of South Carolina, that, if the same be declared unconstitutional and void, as herein prayed, the whole enactments in regard to registration are likewise void." And it was charged that said sections were in violation of the Constitution of the state of South Carolina, and of section 2 of article 1, section 1 of amendment 14, and section 1 of amendment 15, of the Constitution of the United States.

"(10) By section 2 of the aforesaid act of 1894 it is provided that the election of delegates to the said constitutional convention shall be held on the third Tuesday in August, 1895; that the said convention shall assemble on the second Tuesday of September, 1895; that such convention is called for the purpose of revising, amending, or changing the Constitution of said state, and when assembled will have full power to revise, alter, abridge, curtail, and qualify the right of your orator and of all citizens of the said state of South Carolina to vote for the members of the most numerous branch of the state legislature, and thereby to revise, alter, abridge, and curtail the qualifications now requisite to enable your orator to vote at all Federal elections as now imposed by the Constitution of the United States. (11) That W. Briggs Green has been appointed to the office of supervisor of registration for Richland county aforesaid, under and in pursuance of the said unconstitutional registration laws; that he is now exercising the duties prescribed by the same, and your orator has been informed and believes that he intends to continue so to do, and, furthermore, he specifically intends to furnish and deliver to the several boards of managers for the several precincts of Richland county aforesaid, to be hereafter appointed, to hold the election of delegates to the said constitutional convention, certain paper writings purporting to be the registration books aforesaid of the several precincts to be used by said managers at said approaching election. (12) Your orator further shows that, under and by virtue of the said unconstitutional registration laws, the supervisors appointed thereunder are required to continue said partial, void, and illegal registration on the first Mondays in May and June and July, 1895, and that after the 1st day of July, 1895, they are directed by section 8 of the act of 1894 to 'furnish the managers at each precinct with one of the registration books for such precinct, and no elector shall be entitled to vote whose name is not registered as hereinbefore or already provided by law, and who does not produce his registration certificate at the polls where he offers to vote.' (13) That your orator failed to register at the registration made after the general election of 1888, or to be registered during the ten days in March, 1895, provided for in said act of 1894, because, although he made repeated and persistent efforts to become registered, he found himself unable to comply with the unreasonable, unnecessary, and burdensome rules, regulations, and restrictions, prescribed by said unconstitutional registration laws as conditions precedent to his right to register, and your orator has never been allowed to vote at any Federal or state election of the said state of South Carolina. (14) That your orator is desirous of voting for delegates to the aforesaid constitutional convention at the election prescribed by the act of 1894 for the purpose; that the paper writings purporting to be books of registration now in the hands of the said defendant do not and will not contain the name of your orator as a registered voter for the reasons hereinbefore stated; that your orator, and others like circumstanced with him, will not be permitted to vote at said special election by the managers thereof unless their names be found upon the books of registration, and they can produce the registration certificates hereinbefore mentioned; that if the said defendant be permitted to continue the aforesaid illegal, partial, and void registration, and be allowed to turn over to the managers of election for the aforesaid county of Richland (when appointed) said paper writings, purporting to be books of registration for the several precincts in said county, your orator will be deprived of his right to vote at said election, and grievous and irreparable wrong and damage will be done to your orator and a large class of citizens like circumstanced with him, which can be prevented only by the interposition of this court by way of restraining the said defendant from the performance of any of the acts hereinbefore referred to. To the end, therefore, that your orator may have full, perfect, and sufficient relief in the premises, may it please your honors to grant unto your orator a writ of injunction restraining and enjoining the said defendant, individually and as supervisor of registration, from the performance of any of the acts hereinbefore complained of, and that your orator may have such other and further relief in the premises as may be just and reasonable."

Then followed the prayer for process. The bill was sworn to by complainant as "true to the best of his knowledge and belief," and, on preliminary application, the following order was entered: "It is ordered that the defendant, W. Briggs Green, both individually and as supervisor of registration for Richland county, in the state of South Carolina, be enjoined and restrained until the further order of this court from the commission of any of the acts complained of in the above-entitled bill, a copy of which must be served upon him with this order. It is further ordered that the said W. Briggs Green do show cause before me at Columbia, S. C., on Thursday, the 2d day of May, next, why this order should not be continued, or some order of like purport and effect be then granted, enjoining and restraining him, both individually and as such supervisor of registration, from the commission of any of the acts complained of in said bill until the final hearing and determination of this cause. This hearing shall be in the United States circuit court room, Columbia, S. C."

Subpoena was issued returnable on the first Monday of June. On May 2, 1895, cause was shown by defendant under the rule, defendant stating, among other things: "(1) That he is supervisor of registration for Richland county, in the state of South Carolina, and as such is not amenable to the jurisdiction of the court for his conduct in his political capacity aforesaid; that the matters, facts, and things alleged and complained of in the said bill, and upon which the injunction has been improvidently granted, are all matters relating to the political duties of the office. That this is in effect a suit against the state of South Carolina, in violation of the 11th amendment to Constitution of the United States, and this court has no jurisdiction. (2) That he submits that the bill presents no question arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States to give jurisdiction to this honorable court. (3) That he submits that the bill presents no case upon which the jurisdiction of a court of equity can be founded, as there are plain and adequate remedies at law for the correction of any of the matters and things alleged, if so be that the allegations are true. (4) That the bill is totally defective for the purposes of the motion in its allegations and in the verification, in this: that there is no sufficient averment of irreparable injury and statement of facts supporting it, and that the material facts on which the injunction is sought are not positively sworn to by the complainant."

On May 8, 1895, the cause having been argued upon bill and return, the circuit court filed an opinion [Mills v. Green] (reported 67 Fed. Rep. 818), and entered the following order: "It is ordered that the restraining order heretofore granted by this court, bearing date the 16th day of April, 1895, enjoining and restraining the said respondent from exercising duties or performing any acts complained of in the said bill of the complainant, either individually or as supervisor of registration for the county of Richmond, state aforesaid, be, and the same is hereby, continued, subject to the final determination of the issues involved in this case until the further order of this court." From this order an appeal was prayed and allowed to this court, errors being duly assigned covering the points made on the return. Objections to the docketing of the case were made and overruled, and the appeal was heard June 7, and decree entered June 11, 1895, reversing the order of the circuit court, dissolving the injunction, and remanding the case with directions to dismiss the bill.

Messrs. Wm. A. Barber, Attorney General, and Edward McCrady for appellant.

Messrs. H. N. Ohear and Charles A. Douglass for appellee.

Fuller, Circuit Justice, delivered the opinion of the court:

It is contended on behalf of appellee that jurisdiction of this appeal cannot be entertained, because if the case went to final decree an appeal therefrom would lie only to the Supreme Court. Under section 7 of the judiciary act of March 8, 1891, where, upon a hearing in equity in the circuit court, an injunction is granted or continued by an interlocutory order or decree, "in a cause in which an appeal from a final decree may be taken under the provisions of this act to the circuit court of appeals, an appeal may be taken from such interlocutory order or decree granting or continuing such injunction to the circuit court of appeals." By section 5 of that act, appeals or writs of error may be taken directly to the Supreme Court "in any case in which the jurisdiction of the court is in issue. In such cases the question of jurisdiction alone shall be certified to the Supreme Court from the court below for decision," "in any case that involves the construction or application of the Constitution of the United States," or "in any case in which the Constitution or law of a state is claimed to be in contravention of the Constitution of the United States."

It was early held, in McLish v. Roff, 141 U. S. 661, 85 L. ed. 893, that the act gave to a party to a suit in the circuit court, where the question of the jurisdiction of the court over the parties or subject-matter was raised and put in issue upon the record, at the proper time and in the proper way, the right to a review by the Supreme Court, after final judgment or decree against him, of the decision upon that question only, or by the circuit court of appeals on the whole case. Maynard v. Hecht, 151 U. S. 324, 38 L. ed. 179. And in Carey v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. 150 U. S. 170, 37 L. ed. 1041, it was ruled that, in order to hold an appeal maintainable under the second of the above-named classes, the construction or application of the Constitution of the United States must be involved as controlling, although on appeal or error all other questions would be open to determination, if inquiry were not rendered unnecessary by the ruling on that arising under the Constitution. Horner v. United States, 143 U. S. 570, 36 L. ed. 266. In United States v. Jahn, 155 U. S. 109, 39 L. ed. 87, the Supreme Court decided that, if the question of jurisdiction is in issue, and the jurisdiction sustained, and judgment or decree on the merits is rendered in favor of the plaintiff, then the defendant can elect either to have the question certified, and come directly to the Supreme Court, or to carry the whole case to the circuit court of appeals, where the question of jurisdiction can be certified by that court.

In view of these and other cases, we are of opinion that, where the jurisdiction is not in issue, but the question of the constitutionality of a state law is raised, and must necessarily be decided in the disposition of the case, there the case on final decree should be taken directly to the Supreme Court. But, where the jurisdiction depends on the existence of a Federal question, which is controverted, the jurisdiction sustained, and the case goes to decree on the merits, the defendant may take the whole case to the circuit court of appeals. Whether that court, if the conclusion were reached that the constitutional question was controlling in the premises, should remand the case to the circuit court, or may certify the question to the Supreme Court, we are not called upon to determine. Here the jurisdiction of the circuit court rested on the existence of a Federal question, namely, the validity of the state laws, challenged as in contravention of the Constitution and laws of the United States; but, conceding the jurisdiction, the question arose on the threshold whether the case made or attempted to be made was one of equitable cognizance, and we think that, upon the final decree, an appeal would lie to this court, whether the bill were dismissed on final hearing on that ground or otherwise. The motion to dismiss will therefore be overruled.

The jurisprudence of the United States has always recognized the distinction between common law and equity as, under the Constitution, matter of substance as well as of form and procedure. And the distinction has been steadily maintained, although both jurisdictions are vested in the same courts. Fenn v. Holmes, 62 U. S. 21 How. 481, 484, 16 L. ed. 198, 199; Thompson v. Central Ohio R. Co. 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 184, 18 L. ed. 765; Cates v. Allen, 149 U. S. 451, 87 L. ed. 804; Mississippi Mills v. Cohn, 150 U. S. 202, 205, 37 L. ed. 1052, 1053. It is well settled that a court of chancery is conversant only with matters of property and the maintenance of civil rights. The court has no jurisdiction in matters of a political nature, nor to interfere with the duties of any department of government unless under special circumstances and when necessary to the protection of rights of property, nor in matters merely criminal, or merely immoral, which do not affect any right of property. Re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 200, 31 L. ed. 402; Luther v. Borden, 48 U. S. 7 How. 1, 12 L. ed. 581; Mississippi v. Johnson, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 475, 18 L. ed. 437; Georgia v. Stanton, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 50, 18 L. ed. 721; Holmes v. Oldham, 1 Hughes, C. C. 70, Fed. Cas. No. 6,643. Neither the legislative nor the executive department, said Chief Justice Chase, in Mississippi v. Johnson, "can be restrained in its action by the judicial department, though the acts of both, when performed, are, in proper cases, subject to its cognizance." "The office and jurisdiction of a court of equity," said Mr. Justice Gray, in Re Sawyer, "unless enlarged by express statute, are limited to the protection of rights of property." To assume jurisdiction to control the exercise of political powers, or to protect the purely political rights of individuals, would be to invade the domain of the other departments of government or of the courts of common law.

Similar views have been repeatedly expressed by state tribunals of high authority. Thus, in Fletcher v. Tuttle, 161 Ill. 41, 25 L. R. A. 143, the supreme court of Illinois says: "The question then, is, whether the assertion and protection of political rights, as judicial power is apportioned in this state between courts of law and courts of chancery, are a proper matter of chancery jurisdiction. We would not be understood as holding that political rights are not a matter of judicial solicitude and protection, and that the appropriate judicial tribunal will not, in proper cases, give them prompt and efficient protection, but we think they do not come within the proper cognizance of courts of equity." Re Sawyer and Georgia v. Stanton, supra; Sheridan v. Colvin, 78 Ill. 237, Dickey v. Reed, Id. 261, Harris v. Schryock, 83 Ill. 119, and many other cases are cited, and the court continues: "Other authorities of similar import might be referred to, but the foregoing are amply sufficient to show that, wherever the established distinctions between equitable and common-law jurisdiction are observed, as they are in this state, courts of equity have no authority or jurisdiction to interpose for the protection of rights which are merely political, and where no civil or property right is involved. In all such cases the remedy, if there is one, must be sought in a court of law. The extraordinary jurisdiction of courts of chancery cannot, therefore, be invoked to protect the right of a citizen to vote or to be voted for at an election, or his right to be a candidate for or to be elected to any office. Nor can it be invoked for the purpose of restraining the holding of an election, or of directing or controlling the mode in which, or of determining the rules of law in pursuance of which, an election shall be held. These matters involve in themselves no property rights, but pertain solely to the political administration of government. If a public officer, charged with political administration, has disobeyed or threatens to disobey the mandate of the law, whether in respect to calling or conducting an election or otherwise, the party injured or threatened with injury in his political rights is not without remedy. But his remedy must be sought in a court of law, and not in a court of chancery."

In Hardesty v. Taft, 23 Md. 513, 87 Am. Dec. 584, where application was made for an injunction to prevent the use of a register of voters prepared for a certain county, the court of appeals of Maryland observed: "On this branch of the inquiry it seems to the court very clear that a court of equity cannot be invoked to prevent the performance of political duties like those committed to the officers of registration under the law. The wilful, fraudulent, or corrupt refusal of a vote by judges of election, or a like denial of registration by the officers appointed to register votes, which is the same thing, can be adequately compensated for in damages at law. Bevard v. Hoffman, 18 Md. 484, 81 Am. Dec. 618. The writ of injunction will not be awarded in doubtful or new cases not coming within well-established principles of equity. Donaparte v. Camden & A. R. Co. Baldw. C. C. 218, Fed. Cas. No. 1,617. Each voter has a separate and distinct remedy for the wilfully improper deprivation of his vote; and the joinder of others, like circumstanced or injured, as complainants in equity, on the ground of avoiding a multiplicity of suits, will not avail to afford equitable relief. To interfere in the mode asked for by the complainants would be to stop a popular election in one portion of the state, and thus arrest, as to it, the wheels of government. For irregularities in the conduct of an election, for receiving illegal or rejecting legal votes, and for the correction of consequences resulting therefrom, the law provides appropriate remedies and modes of procedure. Such matters are not the subjects of equitable jurisdiction."

The general doctrine as to public officials is thus stated by the New York court of appeals in People v. Canal Board, 55 N. Y. 893: "A court of equity exercises its peculiar jurisdiction over public officers to control their action only to prevent a breach of trust affecting public franchises, or some illegal act under color or claim of right affecting injuriously the property rights of individuals. A court of equity has, as such, no supervisory power or jurisdiction over public officials or public bodies, and only takes cognizance of actions against or concerning them when a case is made coming within one of the acknowledged heads of equity jurisdiction."

Nor will equity interfere by injunction to restrain persons from exercising the functions of public offices, on the ground of the illegality of the law under which their appointments were made, but will leave that question to be determined by a legal forum. The doctrine is clearly established that courts of equity will not thus interfere to determine questions concerning the appointment or election of public officers or their title to office, such questions being of a purely legal nature and cognizable only by courts of law. High. Inj. 3d ed. §§ 1812 et seq., and cases cited. And see Hagner v. Heyberger, 7 Watts & S. 104. 42 Am. Dec. 220; Smith v. McCarthy, 56 Pa. 359; Smith v. Myers, 109 Ind. 1, 58 Am. Rep. 375; Peck v. Weddell, 17 Ohio St. 271; Kemp v. Ventulett, 58 Ga. 419. The rule is not otherwise in South Carolina. The supreme court of that state has decided upon a similar application for a like injunction, made, as would appear, by this same complainant, that the relief asked "is not the appropriate remedy for the grievance set out." Ex parte Milla, 41 S. C. 554.

Tested by these principles, this bill of complaint cannot be maintained, for it seeks on behalf of individuals to restrain the exercise of governmental powers, and asserts no threatened infringement of rights of property or civil rights, and no recognized ground of equity interposition. No discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude is charged, or pointed out as deducible on the face of the acts in question. No specific application to the defendant as supervisor to register complainant is alleged, but it is said that complainant has failed to register because, in spite of repeated and persistent efforts to that end, he found himself unable to comply with the provisions of the law in that behalf. In this regard, the gravamen of the bill is that, although the legislature might require registration under reasonable restrictions as proof of the possession of the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution, which is, indeed, made the duty of the general assembly by that instrument (S. C. Const. art. 8, § 8), the requirements of these acts are such as to materially abridge and impair the exercise of the elective franchise and impose additional qualifications to those prescribed; and that therefore the acts are invalid, as in contravention of the Constitutions of the state and of the United States. But, if this were true, it would not follow that complainant would have a locus standi in equity. The bill is brought to restrain the registering officer from discharging, at all, duties imposed upon him by law in respect of the public, least complainants and other individuals similarly situated might thereafter be deprived of a political right because of alleged inability to comply with legislative requirements, which he contends are invalid for that reason. We repeat that the action sought to be enjoined is political and governmental, and it is not 30 I. R. A.

This being so, we are clearly of opinion that no ground of equitable cognizance exists, and, although the appeal is from interlocutory orders, yet, as we entertain no doubt that such a bill cannot be maintained, we are constrained, in reversing these orders, to remand the cause with a direction to dismiss the bill. And it is so ordered.

Hughes, District Judge, concurring:

This case was heard by the chief justice, Judge Seymour, and myself, on Friday last, the 7th inst. We thought it was of a character to call for an early decision, and it was determined, after adjournment on Friday, that the decision should be announced to-day, and a decree entered. The case was exhaustively argued at the bar, and nothing can be gained by waiting a further time for the examination of briefs. We are of opinion that the preliminary injunction which was granted in the case ought to be dissolved and the bill dismissed. A decree to that effect, prepared by the chief justice, will be entered at once. The opinion of the court on the important questions presented by the record will be prepared by the chief justice, and filed and reported as soon as practicable. I have thought that, in the meantime, it was due to the public, and might not be improper in me, to present at once some of the considerations which have led me to the opinion that the injunction of the circuit court below should not have been granted. I therefore submit what follows. I have had no opportunity of presenting it to the other judges who sat with me, and am solely responsible for the views expressed.

This bill is brought by the complainant, on his own behalf, and "on behalf of other citizens of the county of Richland, in the state of South Carolina, and the United States," circumstanced like himself. It sets out that he is twenty-six years of age, and that he is entitled to be registered as a citizen and voter. It describes, by quotation, in considerable detail, sundry provisions of the registration laws of South Carolina now in force. It charges that these provisions violate certain clauses of the state Constitution, in two respects, viz.: First, by requiring the voter always to be in possession of his certificate of registration, and to present it when offering to vote; and, second, by allowing only ten days in each year (in the month of March) for the registration of voters who have failed to register at the times provided by law for registration at periods anterior to those ten days. It charges that the registration laws complained of, by adding a compliance with these two qualifications as necessary to the exercise of the right of suffrage,—these being qualifications which are not required by the state Constitution,—thereby violate the state Constitution. It adds the charge that these two requirements also violate the Constitution of the United States, inasmuch as section 2 of article 1 of that instrument provides that electors for members of Congress "in each state shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature." The bill alleges that complainant failed to register at the times designated by law, or within the ten days set apart for that purpose in March, 1895, for those who had not previously registered, because, although he had made repeated efforts to become registered, he found himself unable to comply with the unreasonable, unnecessary, and burdensome rules, regulations, and restrictions prescribed by the alleged unconstitutional registration laws as conditions precedent to his right to register. He complains that, in consequence of his having thus failed to be registered, he has never been allowed to vote at any state or any Federal election in South Carolina. The bill alleges that the defendant, Green, has been appointed supervisor of registration for Richland county under these unconstitutional laws, is exercising the duties prescribed by them, and intends to deliver to the managers of the election in Richland county the registration books, which he is preparing, to be used by them in deciding upon the right of citizens to vote, among other elections, at the first next ensuing election to be held in South Carolina, which will be one to be held in August next for members of a state convention called to frame a new state Constitution. The bill alleges, in general terms, that the registration laws of South Carolina, complained of, violate, as before described, section 2 of article 1 of the National Constitution, and are also "in violation of section 1 of article 14, and section 1 of article 15, and of divers other sections and articles of the said instrument." As there are but seven articles in the original Constitution of the United States, the presumption is that the bill has reference to the 14th and 15th amendments (not articles) of the National Constitution. The complainant therefore prays the court to grant a writ of injunction restraining and enjoining the defendant, Supervisor of Registration Green, individually and officially, from the performance of any of the acts required of him by the registration laws complained of, and for other relief. The court below granted an order temporarily enjoining and restraining Supervisor Green from the commission of any of the acts complained of in the bill, and granted at a later day an order restraining and enjoining this supervisor from exercising duties or performing any acts complained of in the bill until the further order of the court. From this order appeal is taken to this court.

There is nothing in the record to show that the complainant is a man of color, or that those for whom he sues are colored persons. The bill contains no allegation that the provisions of law complained of were devised against the complainant, or those for whom he sues, on account of their race, color, or previous condition of servitude. There is nothing in the averments of the bill from which it may naturally, or must necessarily, be inferred that the complainant, and those for whom he sues, are citizens of color. There are no averments in the bill which show that the case falls within the purview of the 15th amendment of the Constitution of the United States. Nor does the bill contain any allegations which raise a Federal question under that clause of the 14th amendment which forbids a state "to deny to any person the equal protection of the laws." It charges that the effect of the provisions of the registration acts complained of is to give unequal facilities of registration to different classes of citizens, but it does not point out how this is so. It leaves the discrimination as to the privilege of registering, if there be discrimination, to inference, and to research in sources other than its own averments. It charges that the provisions of law complained of discriminate, but does not describe the manner of discrimination, or define the classes affected pro or con., nor does it show that the law complained of, in discriminating between classes, as to the privilege of registering granted by them, violate that clause in the 14th amendment which forbids a state "to deny to any person within it, the equal protection of the laws." It confounds privilege with protection. The bill has no reference to a Federal election, in setting out complainant's case. The gravamen of the bill contemplates only a state election to be held for members of the state convention called to convene in August next. It is not shown that any Federal election is to be held in the state of South Carolina before November, 1896. To the bill thus described, and to the orders of injunction granted by the court below in pursuance of its prayers, several objections are urged, in behalf of the state of South Carolina. In what follows I shall consider but one of these.

I regret that I cannot concur in the ruling of the circuit court rendered on circuit in this case, in which it was held that the court had jurisdiction to restrain a county supervisor of registration in the performance of his duties under the election laws of South Carolina. The division of our government into the legislative, executive, and judicial departments is a distinguishing feature of our American polity, and it is essential to its existence that each of these departments shall be independent of the other. This is fundamental and organic. It would be just as dangerous to its stability for the judicial department to override the others as for the executive or legislative department to do so. Hence, while the right of the judiciary to pass upon the constitutionality of laws is undoubted, it has that right simply as an incident to its protection of private rights. It has not that right as a mere means of settling abstract questions, and, even in the enforcement of private rights, it has not the power to interfere with the discretion vested in the other departments, or with the exercise of the political powers of those departments. It seems to me that it is a dangerous encroachment upon the prerogatives of the other departments of government, if the judiciary be intrusted to exercise the power of interfering with the holding of an election in a state. If the supervisor of one county can be enjoined from the performance of the duties imposed upon him by the election laws of the state from whom he holds his commission, those of the other counties can be also. Thus, a single citizen in each county (and in the case at bar he is not even a qualified voter) can enjoin an election throughout the entire state, and thus deprive thousands of their right to vote. If a court has power to do this, free elections are at an end. If elections are improperly held, there are appropriate means provided by law for questioning their results, and remedying wrongs, without the exercise of this dangerous power by the courts. A candidate who has been defeated may contest; a voter whose right to register has been denied may proceed to compel the enforcement of that right; and these privileges give what the legislature deems sufficient protection to the injured. But, in my judgment, one citizen cannot, in an endeavor to right his own wrongs, disfranchise others. I do not think that a court has jurisdiction to interfere, by injunction or otherwise, with the enforcement of laws by officers holding and deriving their powers from these laws; certainly not to the extent in which it is attempted to be done by this bill. In arriving at this conclusion I have not considered the question whether or not the registration laws of South Carolina violate the Federal Constitution or laws. I prefer to rest my opinion upon the ground of the independence of the different departments of government; upon the impolicy of interference by the courts in question which will result in dragging them constantly into the arena of party politics; and upon the general principle that each department of the government, and each officer thereof, high or low, has the right to administer, according to his best judgment, the duties imposed upon him by the laws creating his office. As illustrating these general principles, I refer to the following decisions: Mississippi v. Johnson, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 475, 18 L. ed. 437; Gaines v. Thompson, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 347, 19 L. ed. 62; Louisiana v. Jumet, 107 U. S. 711, 27 L. ed. 448; Hagood v. Southern, 117 U. S. 52, 29 L. ed. 805; Ex parte Ayers, 123 U. S. 443, 31 L. ed. 216; Re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 209, 31 L. ed. 405. It is useless to cite the many other cases which bear on the questions arising in this case, and cited so profusely at the bar. In the case of Mississippi v. Johnson, which was a bill to enjoin the President of the United States and the military commandant of the military district of Mississippi from carrying into effect certain provisions of the reconstruction acts of 1867, the Supreme Court said that "an attempt on the part of the judicial department of the government to enforce the performance of the (executive and political) duties of the President might be justly characterized, in the language of Chief Justice Marshall, as 'an absurd and excessive extravagance.'" "It is true," says the court, "that in the instance before us the interposition of the court is not sought to enforce action by the executive under constitutional legislation, but to restrain such action under legislation alleged to be unconstitutional. But we are unable to perceive that this circumstance takes the case out of the general principles which forbid judicial interference with the exercise of executive discretion. The Congress is the legislative department of the government. The President is the executive department. Neither can be restrained in its action by the judicial department, though the acts of both, when performed, are, in proper cases, subject to its cognizance." This language of the Supreme Court is quoted to show that the court was at pains to distinguish between acts of public officers which were political and executive, and those which were merely ministerial, and between duties of officers as officers, and those which belong to persons as mere citizens. These distinctions are carefully adhered to by the Supreme Court in the subsequent decisions which I have cited. I do not think it necessary to point out how particularly and carefully it has done so, in those cases.

In the one at bar the person enjoined from the performance of duties was an officer of the executive department of the government, and he was enjoined as an officer, and not as a citizen, from performing political functions. The duties which he was discharging were political,—exclusively political,—and did not appertain to him as a private citizen. I think the teaching of the cases I have cited is clear that a court cannot, by injunction, prohibit a public officer generally from discharging political duties imposed by law. If the law be vicious, the remedy must be sought elsewhere than in the courts. Probably the homely way of getting rid of a bad law, recommended by Gen. Grant, is the best, viz., by enforcing it rigidly. I do not think that the fact was so; but let it be admitted, for the sake of argument, that the duties of the registration officer who was enjoined in this case were entirely ministerial, affording no room for discretion. Yet they were strictly political. They dealt with that prime subject in a republic,—the elective franchise. The duties were prescribed by legislation, and the performance of them was an executive act. For the court to enjoin an executive officer generally from discharging those duties was for the judiciary to invade the province of both the other two independent departments at once. It was, so far as the injunction operated, a nullification of legislation, and a prohibition of the performance of important executive duties.

So far as the rights of the individual complainant in the bill were concerned it may have been competent for the court to grant individual relief. The Supreme Court of the United States the other day granted relief from the payment of an income tax to the individual complainant in the suit before it, but it went no further. On the authority of Mississippi v. Johnson, supra, we may assume that it would not have entertained a bill for enjoining internal revenue officers of the government from collecting income taxes generally. The judicial power covered the right to grant individual relief, but did not extend to the general power of repealing the law imposing the tax, as to the entire public. I repeat that in the case at bar it may have been competent for the court to grant individual relief. But the bill asked more. It asked similar relief for all citizens of the county situated like the complainant. It practically asked relief for a numerous political party forming a portion of that people to whom the legislature was solely responsible for its laws, and to whom alone the genius of our institutions makes the legislature responsible. Moreover, it brought the court into immediate and active contact with party contestation. It made the court a controlling factor in party strife. I can imagine nothing more pernicious than a direct participation by the judiciary, by judicial action, in the politics of the people. The bill asked, practically, that the process of registration under the laws of the state should be suspended in an entire county during the pleasure of the court, and that all the citizens of a county not then registered as voters should be denied the right of suffrage during that pleasure. It seems to me that the mere statement of this view of the case shows that the injunction was improvidently granted. I think the bill should be dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bailey & Balleray for appellants.

Mr. William Parsons, in propria persona.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit by William Parsons to restrain the defendants from selling exempt personal property upon execution. The plaintiff, in substance, alleges that the defendant George A. Hartman, having obtained a judgment against him in the circuit court of Umatilla county, Or., caused an execution to be issued thereon, and delivered to the defendant William J. Furnish, the sheriff of said county, who, in pursuance of the direction of his codefendant, levied upon necessary wearing apparel of the plaintiff and his family, and upon the household goods, furniture, utensils, books, library, tools, implements, and apparatus necessary to enable him to carry on his profession of an attorney at law, by which he earns a living; that at the time of said levy he was a householder of said county, and as such selected, and reserved as exempt from execution and sale under said writ, all said personal property, and delivered to said sheriff a schedule thereof, with the reasonable value of each article set opposite thereto, amounting in the aggregate to $550.80, but that said sheriff, acting under the direction of his codefendant, advertised and was threatening to sell all of said property, to his irreparable injury; that he had no plain, complete, or adequate remedy at law for the injury threatened, and prays an injunction restraining said sale. The defendants demurred to the complaint, alleging that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of suit, and that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter thereof; and, the demurrer having been overruled, they refused to further plead, whereupon the court, by decree, made the temporary injunction which had been granted perpetual, and awarded the plaintiff his costs and disbursements, from which decree the defendants appeal. Their counsel contend that the plaintiff has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law, and that equity will not entertain jurisdiction to enjoin the sale upon execution of personal property that is exempt therefrom.

There is a conflict of authority upon the right of a judgment debtor to enjoin the sale of his personal property under execution upon the ground that it is exempt by law from sale under judicial process. It has been made in this note in subheads XL, XVI, XXI, b, on account of the questions involved.

L. Exempt personal property.

The case of PARSONS v. HARTMAN denies the right to obtain an injunction against an execution sale of exempt personal property. There is some conflict of authorities on this question, but where there is a special statutory remedy, that is quick, adequate, and affords the same relief as would be obtained by injunction, as in PARSONS v. HARTMAN, the rule adopted in that case is supported by some authorities. But where the objection to the injunction is, that there is a remedy by replevin, trover, damages, or the like, the weight of authority is in favor of granting the injunction.

So, relief against an execution sale of exempt personal property will be denied in equity where, under Ark. Mansf. Dig. § 3068, a stay of proceedings could be maintained until the debtor's claim of exemption could be determined. In this case the debtor did not file his schedule and claim of exemption with the officer under Ark. Mansf. Dig. § 3006, as he did not know of the levy in time, and the court holds that the statutory mode of making the claim of exemption excludes all others. Driggs' Bank v. Norwood, 49 Ark. 188.

And in Baxter v. Baxter, 77 N. C. 118, an injunction was refused against a sale under execution of personal property where possession had not been disturbed, on the ground that the title to personal property claimed to be exempt will not be tried by injunction, but if it should be seized, the remedy is an action to try title at law under N. C. C. P. § 177, subsec. 4, allowing complainant's right to continue in possession, and try title. But see next case, infra.

But in Gaster v. Hardie, 75 N. C. 460, where it seems the same section of the Code was in effect but not referred to, it was held that a debtor owning chattels that are mortgaged is entitled to the exemption in the same, as against a subsequent judgment creditor claiming that the mortgages are fraudulent, and may enjoin the execution sale, as the rights of the parties cannot be ascertained and administered in an action by the creditor against one only of the other parties, or by a levy and sale of the property as belonging to one only of two adverse claimants; and this suit prevents a multiplicity of suits; and an injunction was granted. This case is not referred to in Baxter v. Baxter, supra.

In Stout v. McNeill, 98 N. C. 1, where it was held that an injunction will not be granted to restrain a sale of personal property, out of firm assets, under a judgment against the firm, claimed as exempt by one member, where the other member had consented to his claiming such exemption but revoked the consent before the sale, the question as to the right of injunction in case the property was exempt was not discussed, or other cases referred to on that question.

But in Nebraska it is held that a levy on exempt personal property may be enjoined, notwithstanding a remedy by mandamus to compel the officer to appraise and release the property. Cunningham v. Conway, 35 Neb. 618.

The weight of authority is in favor of granting an injunction to prevent the sale of exempt personal property, notwithstanding a remedy of replevin, trespass, or trover. Stein v. Frieberg, 64 Tex. 371; Alexander v. Holt, 59 Tex. 205; Nichols v. Claiborne, 39 Tex. 368; Anderson v. Larremore, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 947; Dearborn v. Phillips, 21 Tex. 449; Hammer v. Woods, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 179; Naill v. Kansas Farmers' F. Ins. Co. 47 Kan. 223.

An execution sale of property exempted, to a farmer, will be enjoined, and the fact that he stopped farming will not authorize a dissolution, as the seizure may have prevented him from carrying on farming occupation. Ray v. Hayes, 28 La. Ann. 641.

And an injunction will be granted against a sale of growing crops raised on a homestead. Coates v. Caldwell, infra.

But in Bryan v. Long, 14 Fla. 396, it was held that an injunction will not be granted to restrain an execution sale of exempt personal property where there is a remedy at law by replevin against the officer. In this case the levy was for a debt, on a held in Texas that a sale of personal property which is exempt from execution may be restrained at the suit of the judgment debtor. Nichols v. Claiborne, 89 Tex. 363; Alexander v. Holt, 59 Tex. 205; Stein v. Frieberg, 64 Tex. 271. But Mr. Freeman, in his work on Executions (vol. 2, 2d ed. § 489), in commenting upon the rule established in Nichols v. Claiborne, supra, says: "No reason for the decision was given, and we doubt whether any sufficient reason can be found. The remedy at law, where exempt personal property is seized, is, in most, and perhaps in all, cases, adequate for the protection of the interests of the claimant." The rule announced in Texas has been adopted in Nebraska (Cunningham v. Conway, 25 Neb. 615), where the court gives the following statement and reason for its decision: "The plaintiff alleges in his petition that he possesses neither lands, town lots, nor houses subject to exemption as a homestead, and that he filed an inventory of all his property with the officer, who refused to call appraisers to appraise the same. If these statements are true, the debtor might have compelled the officer to call appraisers, or have brought an action against him for the failure to perform his duty. Yet he is not restricted to these remedies. The property being exempt, the debtor is entitled to the peaceable possession of the same, and the officer may be enjoined from wrongfully depriving him of his property, as the officer is proceeding illegally under a claim of right. Johnson v. Hahn, 4 Neb. 149; Mohawk & H. R. Co. v. Archer, 6 Paige, 83; Belknap v. Belknap, 3 Johns. Ch. 463, 7 Am. Dec. 548." In Johnson v. Hahn, supra, an injunction was granted to restrain the sale of real estate for delinquent taxes, which could only result in a conveyance creating a cloud upon title. In Mohawk & H. R. Co. v. Archer, supra, the defendant sought to dissolve an injunction which restrained him from opening a private way across plaintiff's real property. The court continued the injunction for the reason that the act complained of was not a mere trespass, but an attempt to exercise a continued right of passing across and through the complainant's premises, to the permanent injury of the property. The case of Belknap v. Belknap, supra, was a suit to enjoin the defendant from lowering the outlet of a pond which furnished water to operate plaintiff's mill. The court found that it was not a case of an ordinary trespass impending; but one great and special, leading to lasting mischief and the destruction of the estate, and tending to promote a multiplicity of suits, and per-purchase-money note, which waived the exemption, and the county court had tried the question and held that the waiver prevented an injunction. The supreme court decides the case on the further ground that an action of replevin will be sufficient remedy.

And an injunction will not be granted against a sale under execution of exempt personal property, where it is not shown that the damages are irreparable or that the constable making the levy is insolvent. And Mo. Rev. Stat. § 2722, provides for injunctions only where an adequate remedy cannot be afforded by an action for damages; and there is no allegation in this case that the horse seized has any peculiar value that could not be measured in damages. Bailey v. Wade, 24 Mo. App. 186.

And in Texas M. R. Co. v. Wright (Tex.) 29 S. W. Rep. 1124, it was said that an injunction will not be granted to restrain the sale of exempt property where there is a remedy at law.

An injunction will not be granted where the bill of complaint does not show that the property seized is exempt from such seizure, or where the attack is on the judgment ordering the sale of such property.

An injunction will not be granted where the property is not exempt from seizure,—as gathered crops. Coates v. Caldwell, infra.

And where there is no exemption against a judgment for tort, the defendant cannot claim an exemption on an execution for the costs in such a case, on the ground that the liability for costs is a liability on a contract; and he cannot have a sale of personal property enjoined. Church v. Hay, 93 Ind. 323.

As, under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 708, such property is not exempt from levy on such a debt, although it was said that if a tender of certain of the costs against which there was no exemption had been made, an injunction would have been granted as to the other costs. Russell v. Cleary, 105 Ind. 503.

And an injunction should not be granted where the bill of complaint did not allege that the debt grew out of contract, for if it grew out of tort there was no exemption. Berry v. Nichols, 96 Ind. 287.

And an injunction will not be granted against a sale on execution, commanding the constable to make collection without appraisal, where the judgment was not rendered "without relief from valuation and appraisal laws," as complainant's remedy is in the justice's court to have the execution corrected, and there has been no attempt to have it corrected. Martin v. Pifer, 96 Ind. 245.

And a judgment of a justice directing a forced sale of exempt personal property should not be enjoined, where there is a remedy by appeal, and the remedy to attack erroneous judgments is not by injunction but by appeal. Rountree v. Walker, 46 Tex. 200.

Where the record does not show the value of the exempt personal property, or amount involved, an appeal from the order dissolving an injunction against the sale will not be dismissed for want of jurisdiction. Ray v. Hayes, 28 La. Ann. 641.

II. Homestead.

An injunction will be granted to restrain the sale of a homestead under execution, where such injunction is necessary to prevent a cloud on title, or extraneous evidence is necessary to establish the homestead; and relief may be obtained by the wife of the defendant in the execution, or by a purchaser from the debtor.

A case in Missouri denies the right of injunction on the ground of adequate remedy in the court rendering judgment, and a case in Texas denies relief on the ground that the bill of complaint does not show that the sale would be a cloud, and that the other Texas cases had granted relief because extraneous evidence was necessary to establish the homestead right as against the lien of the judgment. See also subdivision XVII. b.

The homestead exemption will be protected in equity, and an injunction will be granted to prevent the sale of the same, and this relief is generally given on the ground of preventing a cloud from being cast on the title. Clegg v. Varneil, 18 Tex. 294; Irwin v. Lewis, 50 Miss. 368; Lewton v. Hower, 18 Fla. 372; Farley v. Hopkins, 79 Cal. 306; Dunn v. Tozer, 10 Cal. 167; Culver v. Rogers, 28 Cal.

perpetually enjoined the threatened injury. It will thus be seen that each case cited in support of the rule adopted in Cunningham v. Conway, supra, related to injunctions granted to restrain the creation of clouds upon title, or to prevent trespasses upon real property.

In Baxter v. Baxter, 77 N. C. 118, it was held that injunction was not the proper remedy of the judgment debtor to determine the title to exempt personal property seized under execution. "Upon principle," says Mr. High, in his work on Injunctions (sec. 122), in discussing the right of the judgment debtor to enjoin the sale of exempt personal property under execution, "it is difficult to perceive any satisfactory reason for interfering by injunction in such cases, since adequate relief may usually be had by an action at law." Section 380, Hill's Code, provides that "the enforcement or protection of a private right, or the protection of or redress for an injury thereto, shall be obtained by a suit in equity in all cases where there is not a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law. Sections 182-148 furnish such a remedy at law for the recovery of personal property, and section 214 authorizes a jury to award damages for an unlawful seizure of such property. The owner of a chattel having a complete remedy at law for its unlawful seizure or detention, equity will not entertain jurisdiction at his suit to recover possession of it, except where it has a certain, special, extraordinary, and unique value, impossible to be compensated for by damages. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 177. And if it appeared from the complaint, in the case at bar, that any article of personal property levied upon by the defendants possessed a special value to the plaintiff alone, such as a keepsake or memento of any kind, the loss of which could not be compensated in damages, equity would interfere to prevent its sale. Where an unlawful and oppressive seizure of exempt property has been made upon execution, the claimant, under ordinary circumstances, may safely risk his cause to the keen sense of justice inherent in mankind, and feel assured that a jury will, by its verdict, award him damages for the injury sustained.

The plaintiff having, under the statute, a complete remedy at law for his injury, and nothing appearing in the record to entitle him to invoke the interposition of a court of equity, the decree of the court below is reversed, the demurrer sustained, and the complaint dismissed.

500; Tucker v. Kenniston, 47 N. H. 297, 98 Am. Dec. 425; Webb v. Hayner, 49 Fed. Rep. 601.

And an execution sale of a house on leased land owned and occupied as a homestead confers no title, and the purchaser will be enjoined where he is in possession and threatens to remove the house. Conklin v. Foster, 57 Ill. 104.

And an execution sale of a homestead would be enjoined as a cloud upon the title where a necessity might exist of the introduction, in an action of ejectment, of extrinsic evidence to show that the property was a homestead. Roth v. Insley, 86 Cal. 134.

And an injunction was granted to remove a cloud on title, of a homestead as against a judgment, but the court refused to make the injunction perpetual, on the ground that the property might increase in value, or might be abandoned, and granted the injunction on the ground that extrinsic evidence was necessary to protect the title, reserving, however, to the creditor the right to move to have the same vacated on showing cause. Corey v. Schuster, 44 Neb. 209.

A levy on an execution upon growing crops upon a homestead will be enjoined. Coates v. Caldwell, 71 Tex. 19.

A restraining order against the levy and sale under execution on a dormant judgment, of a homestead, may properly be made, notwithstanding the remedy of applying to the court to recall the execution. Krinke v. Parish, 9 Ohio C. C. 141, 2 Ohio Dec. 85.

And the defendant is entitled to an injunction to restrain the collection of a judgment out of property bought with pension money, as it would create a cloud on his title; and the remedy to move to set aside the levy will not prevent an injunction, as he was entitled to have the case tried on common-law evidence, and not on ex parte affidavits. Buffum v. Forster, 77 Hun. 27.

The act of Congress, June 1, 1872 (U. S. Rev. Stat. 1916), providing for similar remedies upon a judgment by execution or otherwise as are now provided in like causes by the laws of the state in which such court is held, having been passed subsequent to the homestead exemption statute of Wisconsin, that statute applies to judgments in favor of the United States, and an execution sale 30 L. R. A. thereunder will be enjoined. Fink v. O'Neil, 108 U. S. 272, 27 L. ed. 196.

So, an injunction will be granted restraining the sale on execution of a homestead claimed under the laws of the United States, if the judgment on which the execution issued was recovered for a debt contracted before the homestead claim was patented. Miller v. Little, 47 Cal. 348.

And a sale under execution of land exempt as a homestead will be enjoined where the land levied upon had been conveyed by deed as security for the debt; but it is questionable whether or not the deed was not void on account of usury. Johnson v. Griffin Bkg. & T. Co. 55 Ga. 691.

An injunction will be granted after an execution sale of the homestead to prevent the purchaser from conveying such land, where the requirements of the statute as to settling off the homestead have not been complied with, and the sale is for a grossly inadequate price. Bullen v. Dawson, 139 Ill. 633.

And a homestead acquired after a judgment will be protected by injunction against execution sale, where possession could not be obtained by the owners for some months after purchase and after the judgment, owing to a lease on the premises, and such homestead was bought with the proceeds of a former homestead. Gardner v. Douglass, 64 Tex. 76. See Mann v. Wallis, infra.

And the homestead right may be claimed by a wife, or widow, where an injunction is sought to protect her rights against a forced sale.

So, an injunction will be granted in favor of the wife to restrain the sale of the homestead. Eaton v. Eaton, 68 Mich. 158; Nichols v. Snow, 42 Tex. 72.

And a widow, with children depending upon her for support, may obtain an injunction against a sale of a saw and grist mill, as the same are fixtures and attached to the land which was exempt. Tison v. Taniehill, 28 La. Ann. 793.

And a writ of possession on a judgment against a husband to which the wife was not a party, and in which the homestead was not in issue, may be enjoined to protect the homestead right. Freeman v. Hamblin, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 157.

The purchaser of a homestead is generally entitled to an injunction against the sale of the same, on execution against the grantor, where he is a bona fide purchaser for value, although some cases refuse the injunction on the ground that such sale will not affect him, or that he has other and equally adequate remedies.

A purchaser of land exempt as a homestead is entitled to an injunction against a sale on execution on a judgment existing at the time of purchase against his grantor, as preventing a cloud on his title, and a homestead exemption attaches without any assignment, where that is all the land the debtor has. Ketchum v. McCauley, 28 S. C. 1.

And an injunction will be granted, although the judgment was rendered against his grantor before he purchased the land. Smith v. Zimmerman, 66 Wis. 542.

And will be granted in favor of a purchaser of homestead property, to prevent a cloud upon his title. Van Ratoliff v. Call, 72 Tex. 491. See Mann v. Wallis, infra.

And an injunction will be granted under Wis. Taylor's Stat. chap. 124, § 30, providing that the owner of the homestead may sell the same, and that such sale will not render it liable to execution. Goodell v. Blumer, 41 Wis. 436.

And the same was held where the purchaser was also the equitable owner of the lien of a judgment attacked. Goodell v. Blumer, 41 Wis. 436.

But in Mann v. Wallis, 75 Tex. 611, a purchaser of a homestead was refused an injunction to prevent a sale under execution on a judgment against a prior owner, where the bill of complaint showed that the execution was not a lien on the land, or a cloud on the title; and the remedy of trespass to try title was adequate. It was said that if his claim of relief had been made on the ground that evidence outside of the record would be needed to protect his title, an injunction would be granted: as, in Van Ratoliff v. Call, supra, the question was whether the abstract of judgment was properly recorded in the county before the debtor sold the land, and whether there was a homestead at the time of filing the abstract, so in Gardner v. Douglass, supra; extraneous evidence would be necessary to establish the homestead right.

And in Meiller v. Bartlett, 89 Mo. 124, it was held that under Mo. Rev. Stat. § 2406, giving the execution debtor a right to apply to the judge of the court out of which the execution issued, to stay, set aside, or quash the same, that the judge of a court of another county could not quash the levy on a homestead in that county.

A personal representative of an estate is entitled to an injunction against a judgment setting off a homestead to the debtor as fraudulent, where there was no representative to contest the allowance of homestead at the time it was made, and it is attacked on the ground of fraud. Brown v. Thornton, 47 Ga. 474.

But an injunction against an execution sale of land claimed as a homestead will not be granted where the homestead right has been lost, or has not been acquired, or has been adjudicated, or the bill does not make out a cause of action.

Where an exchange of land is made, the exemption of the debtor in the tract conveyed by him does not continue after exchange, where he claims an exemption in the other tract, and the same may be levied upon for his debt, as the homestead is a mere right of occupancy, in Arkansas. Moore v. Granger, 30 Ark. 574.

And the purchaser of an abandoned homestead is not entitled to an injunction against a sale under a judgment against a party claimed to be entitled to the exemption, where the purchaser waived all claim by reason of any judgments on said lands against his vendor. Warren v. Peterson, 32 Neb. 727.

In an action to enjoin a sale of homestead property on the ground that the mortgage was void because not executed by a wife, where she died 30 L. R. A.

pending the suit, the homestead character was divested; but while the mortgage was held void, it was but an incident to the debt, and the debt was held good and the property liable, and the injunction was refused. Revalk v. Kremer, 8 Cal. 63, 68 Am. Dec. 304.

And 2 Ind. Rev. Stat. 1876, p. 507, providing that if the personal estate of the decedent is insufficient to make the sum of $500 for the widow the deficit shall be a lien on the real estate, will not authorize an injunction against an execution sale, on a judgment prior to the death of her husband, as her lien did not attach until his death, and the creditors are entitled to sell two thirds of the estate. Mead v. McFadden, 68 Ind. 340.

The owner of an undivided part of land cannot enjoin a sale, as exemption does not apply to an undivided tract. Henderson v. Hoy, 26 La. Ann. 156; Brown v. Solilbellos, 28 La. Ann. 355.

And a sale of homestead property under a decree will not be enjoined where the matter of homestead has been fully adjudicated in the decree, and no new matters for equitable interference are set up in the bill. Brinson v. Wessolowsky, 58 Ga. 233.

So, where two unsuccessful attempts to claim a homestead are made, and the last one is passed upon by the court, an injunction will not be granted against an execution sale, where the sheriff refuses to recognize a third attempt that complies with the statute, as laches of complainant and res judicata prevent an injunction. Platt v. Sheffield, 63 Ga. 627.

A purchaser seeking to enjoin a sale of the land exempt as the homestead of his grantor, alleging the judgment lien, the conveyance to him, and the relinquishment of the homestead; but not showing that the relinquishment of the homestead was at the same time as the conveyance, — is not entitled to an injunction; for, if the relinquishment of the homestead took effect before the conveyance, the lien of the judgment attached. Marriner v. Smith, 27 Cal. 642.

And although a purchaser of a homestead would be entitled to have a sale on execution against his grantor enjoined as a cloud upon his title, the bill must allege that the value of the premises did not exceed the amount allowed under the homestead law. Ibid.

And an injunction against the sale of a homestead under an execution is not authorized where the bill does not state that an execution is in the hands of the sheriff, nor does it refer to the judgment. Adams v. White, 23 Fla. 362.

A decree enjoining the collection of a judgment, and to refrain from all proceedings on the same, is erroneous, on a bill for an injunction to prevent a sale of complainant's property exempt under the appraisement law. Anthony v. Shannon, 8 Ark. 52.

In Moriarty v. Galt, 125 Ill. 417, solicitors' fees were not allowed on dissolution of an injunction against a sale of property claimed to be homestead, on an execution against the purchaser's grantor.

III. What kind of property first liable.

The remedy by injunction to prevent an execution sale of one kind of property until another kind shall be first sold, has generally been denied, where the debtor does not point out to the officer, or deliver to him, property liable to sale; but a case in Rhode Island granted an injunction where property of a school district was seized.

An injunction will not be granted against the execution sale of real estate on the ground that complainant had personal property liable to execution, where he does not disclose the same or point it out to the sheriff. Smith v. Frederick, 32 Tex. 236; Hefner v. Hesse, 29 La. Ann. 149; Reagan v. Van Evans, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 35; Devile v. Hayes, 23 La. Ann. 550; Cook v. De la Garga, 13 Tex. 431; Loes v. Lister, 14 Tex. 469; Kendrick v. Bloch, 18 Tex. 254.

And a sale of land under a judgment which is a lien upon that land will not be enjoined on the ground that personal property has been taken on execution, where it was claimed by a third party and a delivery to the sheriff was not made, where it is not shown but that the land is necessary to satisfy the debt. Garrity v. Thompson, 67 Tex. 1.

And a levy upon real estate will not be enjoined on the ground that personal property was delivered to the sheriff where there is a remedy of certiorari at law. Texas M. R. Co. v. Wright (Tex.) 20 S. W. Rep. 1184.

And under La. Code Pr. art. 648, providing that the debtor shall not have the right to point out particular property to the sheriff when the creditor has a privilege or a mortgage on the property, an injunction will not be granted for refusal of the right. Iambeth v. Sentell, 38 La. Ann. 691.

And in Indiana the court of one county cannot enjoin a levy and sale, on process from another court, where it is claimed that realty should be sold before personalty, as the remedy is in the court issuing the process. Indiana & I. R. Co. v. Williams, 22 Ind. 198.

A defendant in an execution cannot obtain an injunction against a levy on the ground that sureties on the appeal bond given by the other defendants have personal property, which should be first exhausted. Kendrick v. Rice, 16 Tex. 364.

And an execution sale of work animals will not be enjoined on the ground that they cannot be sold separate from the plantation to which they belong, where the defendant points out the property to the sheriff. Dorsey v. Hills, 4 La. Ann. 108.

And irregularity in a levy in that it was not made on realty instead of personalty, as required by statute, will not entitle an injunction against the same as oppressive, where the defendant in the execution does not offer to the officer property subject to the levy. Beard v. Foreman, 1 Ill. 335, 12 Am. Dec. 197.

One of the defendants jointly bound cannot enjoin a sale on execution of his property on account of arrangements made between the defendants, nor because a prior levy was made on the property of another, who died before sale. Boyce v. Woods, 37 Tex. 245.

And the defendant in an execution cannot have a sale thereunder enjoined on the ground that property of another person was seized. Gusman v. De Foret, 33 La. Ann. 333.

An appeal in general terms in an action by the debtor to enjoin a f. fa. because the property belonged to other than the debtor must be considered as embracing, not only the plaintiff, but also the sureties, in the injunction bond. Mitchell v. Lay, 4 La. Ann. 514, 3 La. Ann. 593.

But in Kenyon v. Clarke, 3 R. I. 67, it was held that the exemption of real estate from an execution sale until after personal property is exhausted and the body of the debtor has been taken in the execution applies to judgments against school districts attempted to be enforced against a member of the district, and an injunction was allowed.

IV. Public property.

The sale of public property under execution will generally be restrained by injunction, and this is sometimes on the ground of statutory prohibition against such sales, or that such a sale is contrary to public policy.

An injunction will be granted against an execution sale of public school property on the ground of public policy, and to prevent a cloud on the title. State v. Tiedemann, 60 Mo. 306, 38 Am. Rep. 493.

And an injunction will be granted against an execution sale of land where the land has been condemned by the city for a park, as it will be held to be in the custody of the law, and the lien of the 30 L. R. A.

creditor is transferred to the fund. Moore v. Barrett, 6 Phila. 204.

And buildings furnished by a parish and used for a court-house and jail are not subject to sale on execution, and the same will be enjoined. Police Jury of West Baton Rouge v. Mitchell, 4 La. Ann. 84.

And the waterworks of a city are not liable to sale under an execution, and stock of a city taken on a transfer by the city of such waterworks to a corporation in trust for bondholders, under an act giving such exemption as to the stock of the city, is not liable to sale under execution, and the sale will be enjoined; and the statute continuing the exemption in another form does not impair an obligation of the contract. New Orleans v. Morris, 105 U. S. 600, 26 L. ed. 1134.

And under a statute prohibiting the issuing of writs of f. fa. against a city, passed after an injunction was dissolved and an appeal taken, an injunction should be granted against a sale of city property seized on execution. New Orleans v. Ruleff, 23 La. Ann. 708.

And under such a statute a sale will be enjoined, especially where the judgment creditor had a check on the treasury which was a novation, and never offered to return the same. New Orleans v. Smith, 24 La. Ann. 405.

And an injunction will be granted against an execution on a judgment against a municipal corporation, as its property is held in trust for the public. Darling v. Baltimore, 51 Md. 1.

And public property is exempt from seizure. Police Jury of West Baton Rouge v. Mitchell, 4 La. Ann. 84.

But where an execution against a municipal corporation is enjoined, it is error to enjoin all further proceedings on the judgment. Darling v. Baltimore, 51 Md. 1.

V. Property in the custody of the law.

Property in the custody of the law will be protected by injunction from seizure and sale on execution.

An injunction against the sale of property on execution will be allowed where it appears that such property is in custodia legis and is not subject to levy of execution, and a sale would confer no title. Moore v. Barrett, 6 Phila. 204; Cooper v. Newell, 38 Miss. 313; Ryan v. Parris, 48 Kan. 765.

And an injunction will be granted at the instance of receivers of a corporation to restrain a sale of goods belonging to the same on an execution against an agent of such corporation, although the corporation may be estopped to deny that the goods are subject to levy, having held him out as a partner; but the property, being in the custody of a receiver, should not be levied upon. Thompson v. McCleary, 159 Pa. 139.

And an execution sale will be enjoined where the property should be sold by a receiver to protect claims. Russell v. East Anglian R. Co. 3 Maon. & G. 104, 6 Ballw. Cas. 501, 20 L. J. Ch. N. S. 237, 15 Jur. 985; Gardner v. Caldwell (Mont.) 41 Cent. L. J. 133; State v. King County Super. Ct. (Wash.) 39 Pac. Rep. 244.

So, property was held to be in the custody of the law, where an assignment for creditors was made prior to a suit for a mechanic's lien, and the assignee was not a party to such suit, and a sale under the lien was enjoined. Quinby v. Slipper, 7 Wash. 475.

And the same was held in a similar case, where the sheriff obtained possession of the goods in replevin, and then attempted to levy another execution. Ryan v. Parris, supra.

And an injunction was granted against the execution sale of a legacy pending the settlement by the administrator, as the same was regarded in the custody of the law. Stout v. La Follette, 64 Ind. 335.

And leave of court must be first obtained in order to enforce a judgment against property in the custody of the law. Brady v. Johnson, 75 Md. 445, 20 L. R. A. 737.

And where personal property of a third person is taken by a Federal marshal in attachment, and the owner gives a bond, sells the property, and pays the money to the marshal, and the same is in the custody of the law, and claims are filed against the fund, the owner may, by ancillary proceedings in the Federal court, obtain an injunction against the distribution of the fund until his rights are settled; otherwise he would have no remedy. Krippendorf v. Hyde, 110 U. S. 276, 28 L. ed. 145.

The appointment by a state court of a receiver of the property of a corporation in proceedings for its dissolution gives the court jurisdiction from the time of the appointment, and an injunction will be granted against a seizure under subsequent process of a Federal court in admiralty, although the receiver has not filed his bond or taken possession. Re Schuyler's Steam Tow Boat Co. 138 N. Y. 169, 20 L. R. A. 391.

And property seized under process from the state court is held to be in the custody of the law, and the Federal court will not enjoin the sale. Ruggles v. Simonton, 3 Biss. 325.

In Northfield Knife Co. v. Shapleigh, 24 Neb. 635, it was held that a garnishment is an attachment of the goods in the hands of the garnishee, and such goods are not subject to levy and sale upon process thereafter levied during the continuance of the attachment, and such sale will be enjoined,—disapproving Bigelow v. Andrews, 31 Ill. 322, to the contrary, and which held that the goods in such a case were not in the custody of the law, and that a garnishee could sell the goods where the attaching creditor had not obtained a judgment.

But property will not be held to be in the custody of the law, and the Federal court cannot enjoin a levy made on land in a foreign state, where the creditor is not a party or privy to the suit in the Federal court appointing a receiver. Schindelholtz v. Cullum, 55 Fed. Rep. 885, 12 U. S. App. 242.

And where a judgment is a lien on the property prior to the appointment of a receiver of an insolvent corporation, the sheriff will not be enjoined from delivering a deed, although the sale was made after the receiver was appointed. Cherry v. Western Washington I. E. Co. (Wash.) 40 Pac. Rep. 136.

As to exclusiveness of jurisdiction by appointment of a receiver, see note to Re Schuyler's Steam Tow Boat Co. (N. Y.) 20 L. R. A. 391.

And see Ades v. Levi, infra, XIII. a, for custody of the law.

VI. Railroad and quasi public corporation property.

In regard to protecting the property of quasi public corporations from sale, it seems that where the suit in equity is in behalf of bondholders, and an injunction is necessary to protect their interests, an injunction will be granted, as in Pennock v. Coe; Phillips v. Winslow; Titus v. Mabee; Titus v. Ginheimer; Central Trust Co. v. Moran; Londenslager v. Benton; Minnesota & M. R. Co. v. Soutter; Great Northern R. Co. v. Tahourdin; Brady v. State; Brady v. Johnson; and Brown v. Maryland, infra.

So, an injunction against a sale under an execution in favor of second-mortgage bondholders, will be granted where such sale would impair the lien of the prior bondholders on the railroad property, and the whole property is insufficient to satisfy the bondholders under the first mortgage. Pennock v. Coe, 64 U. S. 23 How. 117, 18 L. ed. 436, 6 Am. L. Reg. 729.

In Ruggles v. Simonton, 3 Biss. 325, it was held that under 1 U. S. Stat. at L. 335, § 5, prohibiting an injunction to stay proceedings in a state court, 90 L. R. A.

an injunction will not be granted in favor of bondholders to restrain the sheriff from selling rolling stock of a railroad company, under an execution issued from a state court. Pennock v. Coe, supra, is affirmed as to the question of exemption from seizure, but the court held that it was powerless to act.

And the trustee under a deed of trust of a railroad and franchise is entitled to an injunction against an execution sale of the property on a judgment against the corporation, on the ground that it would destroy the use of the railroad. Phillips v. Winslow, 18 B. Mon. 431, 68 Am. Dec. 729.

And an injunction will be granted at the instance of trustees for bondholders of a railroad to prevent the sale of a car on execution, if such car is in use by the railroad company, as it cannot be sold subject to the deed of trust; but as to an iron safe or a planing machine the sale of the same will not be enjoined where they were not owned by the company at the time the deed of trust was made. Titus v. Mabee, 25 Ill. 257.

So, an injunction will be granted to restrain an execution sale of a water-tank, locomotive, and cars at the instance of a trustee for bondholders, as the same, if in use, cannot be detached from the operation of the road; and as to one of the executions which issued from a justice's court, the same would be enjoined on the ground that under such an execution realty could not be sold. (The judgments were obtained after the making of the deeds of trust.) Titus v. Ginheimer, 27 Ill. 462.

Under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 34, §§ 72, 73, the rolling stock and property of a railroad mortgaged under these sections is an entirety, and cannot be levied on separately, and will be enjoined at suit of the mortgagee. Central Trust Co. v. Moran, 55 Minn. 188, 29 L. R. A. 212.

And an injunction was granted against an execution sale of equipments of an insolvent street railroad corporation, on a bill filed by the trustee for bondholders, as the execution creditor's remedy is by sequestration against an insolvent corporation; but security was required for the debt and for the lien of li. fa. to continue until further order of the court. Londenslager v. Benton, 4 Phila. 382.

And where the ownership or liens upon rolling stock on a railroad were not adjudicated in a foreclosure suit on a mortgage on a division part of the road, and the master misinterpreted the effect of the order of sale and sold the same, a bill in equity, claiming that this rolling stock was also subject to a mortgage on the other division, and that the master's sale was unauthorized, and asking for an injunction, was not subject to demurrer, although exceptions to the sale had been overruled and the sale confirmed. Minnesota & M. R. Co. v. Soutter, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 609, 17 L. ed. 888.

And a dock company organized under an act authorizing such company to build a railway is protected by the railway companies' act 1867/31 & 32 Vict. chap. 127, § 4, and an execution sale of an hydraulic lift used by the company will be enjoined at the instance of mortgage bondholders. Great Northern R. Co. v. Tahourdin, L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 320.

Under Md. act 1834, chaps. 241, 231, giving a state the net tolls and revenues of a canal, an injunction in behalf of a state will be granted to restrain an attachment levy upon the same, under a judgment against the canal company. Brady v. State, 26 Md. 290.

So, under a decree of the court placing canal franchises in the hands of trustees for bondholders subject to the rights of the state, an injunction will be granted against an execution levy on property which was really in the custody of the courts. Brady v. Johnson, 75 Md. 445, 20 L. R. A. 737.

And an injunction against a judgment and attachment of revenue and tolls of a canal was granted where such revenues were subject to a prior lien of mortgage bonds for construction under a state statute, and also subject to the lien of the state for moneys advanced for the construction of the canal of which the judgment creditor had notice. Brown v. Maryland, 114 U. S. 598, 29 L. ed. 393.

So an injunction should be granted prohibiting the sale under a f. fa. of part of the property owned, used, and necessary for the use of a public canal, in which the state has an interest, where it would destroy the use of the franchise and value of the property of the stockholders. Gue v. Tide Water Canal Co. 65 U. S. 24 How. 257, 16 L. ed. 635.

But as to canals, see Erie Canal Co. v. Lowrie, and Boyd v. Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. infra.

And injunctions in some cases are granted to prevent the destruction of the use of the property or the franchise, as in Gue v. Tide Water Canal Co. supra; Oakland R. Co. v. Keenan; Boyd's Appeal, and Southwestern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. Howard, infra.

An injunction will be granted to prevent the obstruction of the business of a railroad company in the exercise of its franchise by an execution sale. Oakland R. Co. v. Keenan, 56 Pa. 198.

And the levy upon the property of a corporation in actual use apart from its franchises will be enjoined, when the corporation is for a quasi public purpose, as fire insurance patrol. Boyd's Appeal (Pa.) 15 Atl. Rep. 736, affirming Patrol v. Boyd, 44 Phila. Leg. Int. 252.

And an injunction against the levy of an execution on the property of a third person will be granted where it is shown that acts of trespass done or threatened to be done to plaintiff's property would be ruinous, or irreparable, or impair a just enjoyment of the property in the future,—as the sale of a telegraph line by sections. Southwestern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. Howard, 3 Tex. Civ. App. 385.

But other cases refuse injunctions in behalf of a mortgagee, where he fails to state a cause of action or has another remedy, and deny an injunction in favor of an execution creditor; and others deny relief to the debtor, where it is not shown that the debtor is insolvent.

So, a mortgagee of a railroad is not entitled to an injunction where the bill does not show that the security of a mortgage would be impaired. Coe v. Knox County Bank, 10 Ohio St. 412.

And a mortgagee cannot obtain an injunction against a sale under execution of the personal property of a street railway company, where he has a remedy by interpleader. Eckfeldt v. Starr, 5 Phila. 497.

And an execution creditor of a street railroad corporation is not entitled to an injunction against other execution sales of the same property, even if he holds bonds of the railroad as collateral security for his debt. Spering v. Kern, 4 Phila. 388.

Where an original bill for an injunction against an execution sale of railroad property which was not exempt from seizure shows no ground of relief, it cannot be aided by a supplemental bill filed after final decree, setting up that the original judgment had been reversed. Fahs v. Roberts, 54 Ill. 132.

Under Tex. Const. art. 10, § 4, providing that rolling stock shall be personal property, and that all the property of a railroad shall be liable to execution and sale, and Tex. Rev. Stat. art. 2237, providing that a levy shall be first made on personal property where it is delivered into possession of an officer,—that a levy on a box car was not made before the realty will not be ground for an injunction where possession was not delivered as required by the statute. Texas M. R. Co. v. Wright (Tex.) 31 S. W. Rep. 613, affirming 20 S. W. Rep. 1134. See also Lamolle Valley R. Co. v. Bixby, infra, VII.

And a railroad company is not entitled to an injunction against a levy and sale of a locomotive on an execution against the company for a valid debt, where it is not shown that the debtor is insolvent. If the suit had been by bondholders, it is said it might be different. Midland R. Co. v. Stevenson, 180 Ind. 97.

And to the same effect as to a levy on personal property, was said to be the rule in Londenslager v. Benton, supra.

A canal company is not entitled to an injunction against a judgment of condemnation in attachment, on the ground that it has executed mortgages to the state, of all its assets, as the state must assert its own claims. Boyd v. Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. 17 Md. 195, 79 Am. Dec. 646.

And a canal company is not entitled to an injunction against an attachment of its funds on execution under judgments, on the ground that it is necessary to keep the canal in repair, as the remedy is in the court issuing execution. Erie Canal Co. v. Lowrie, 5 Clark (Pa.) 464.

Stockholders in a railroad company cannot obtain an injunction against a decree of foreclosure and reorganization, where the creditors were agreed as to the decree and the company was not injured. Mexican Ore Co. v. Mexican Guadalupe Min. Co. 47 Fed. Rep. 361.

(For cases as to execution against stock or stockholders of corporations, see Stout v. La Follette, XI. b. 1; Bargate v. Shortridge, and Hampson v. Weare, XIX. a. 4; Anderson v. Biddle, and Weber v. Bullock, VIII. h.)

VII. Partnership property.

An injunction against the sale of personal property of a firm for the individual debt of a member will be granted. But an injunction will not be granted where the interest only of the member is attempted to be sold, or where there is no attempted interference with the property; and a partner suing individually in replevin, or a surety in a replevin bond, cannot obtain an injunction on the ground that the property is firm property; and a dormant partner is not entitled to an injunction against a levy made under a judgment confessed by the other partner. So, where the debt is a firm debt, an injunction will not be granted, unless as in a case where the statutory notice of levy was not given which would allow a partner to surrender other property.

An injunction will be granted at the suit of a firm, to prevent specific articles of firm property from being sold on an execution against a member of the firm for his individual debt. Williams v. Lewis, 115 Ind. 45; Place v. Sweetzer, 16 Ohio, 142; Cropper v. Coburn, 2 Curt. C. C. 465.

And in Sutcliffe v. Dohrman, 18 Ohio, 181, 51 Am. Dec. 450, it was said that an injunction would be granted against the sale of partnership personal property on an execution against one member, where he would have no interest in the property after paying firm debts.

And in Harney v. First Nat. Bank, infra, it was said that the equity of each partner to have land held individually, but really firm property, to be applied to the firm debts before it can be seized by individual creditors, will entitle them to an injunction against the sale of firm property.

And in Greenwood v. Brodhead, infra, it was said that a partner is entitled to the aid of equity to prevent the sale of firm property for the individual debts of a member.

And an execution sale of goods of a firm for the individual debt of a partner may be enjoined when such partner has no interest in the same and plaintiff offers an accounting to establish the same. Turner v. Smith, 1 Abb. Pr. N. S. 804.

Where a partner died before a writ of execution came into the hands of the sheriff against him, the surviving partner was entitled to the goods, and an injunction was granted against the levying of the execution on the partnership effects. Newell v. Townshend, 6 Sim. 419.

Equity will not enjoin an execution sale of the interest of one partner in firm property for an individual debt; and it was said that the cases referred to in Madd. Ch. do not warrant the conclusion made by Mr. Maddock, that chancery stops such executions by injunction. The bill in this case was filed by partners for an accounting and for a settlement of the firm debts. Moody v. Payne, 2 Johns. Ch. 548.

And an execution levy on the interest of a partner in the goods of an insolvent firm will not be enjoined at the suit of the other partners, as the purchaser acquires no right of possession; and in Minnesota the officer levying may take the property into his possession till he executes the levy. Wickham v. Davis, 24 Minn. 167.

In Mowbray v. Lawrence, 44/ra, it was said that in New York the authorities are adverse to the interference by injunction to restrain the sale of the interest of one partner in firm property, on an execution against him individually. But in Turner v. Smith, supra, referring to that case, it is said that the refusal to grant an injunction was predicated on the fact that it did not appear by the complaint that the debtor had no interest which the creditor should be allowed to reach by a sale on his execution.

Partnership creditors cannot enjoin a levy on the firm property for individual debts, as a sale of such property would only pass the interest of the members subject to the rights of firm creditors; and if the sheriff sold the whole interest in the property and delivered possession to the purchaser, he would be a trespasser; and the presumption is that he will do his duty. Saunders v. Trevin, 17 Hun. 342.

And in Young v. Frier, 9 N. J. Eq. 465, it was held that creditors at large of a firm are not entitled to an injunction against the sale of firm personal property, on judgments claimed to have been fraudulent, overruling Blackwell v. Rankin, 7 N. J. Eq. 153, which granted an injunction in favor of general creditors against a levy on firm property for individual debts of members.

The same rule is declared in Mittnacht v. Smith, 17 N. J. Eq. 259, 58 Am. Dec. 238, and said to be the rule in Harney v. First Nat. Bank, 53 N. J. Eq. 697.

And the same is held in Greenwood v. Brodhead, 6 Barb. 563.

Levy of an execution and sale of partnership effects under an execution against one partner will not be enjoined where the bill does not show any interference, actual or threatened, with the possession of the partners, and it does not appear from the bill of complaint but that only the interest of the partner is going to be sold. Daniel v. Owens, 70 Ala. 297.

And a partner cannot prevent levy and sale by execution, on the other partner's interest in copartnership property, where he does not show that there is no interest of such partner, after paying partnership debts, which could be sold on execution. Mowbray v. Lawrence, 23 How. Pr. 107, 18 Abb. Pr. 317. (But see Turner v. Smith, supra).

Under Vt. Rev. Laws, § 3443, providing that cars and engines may be levied upon on judgments against a railroad company for injuries, a levy on the property of a railroad run by three companies on a judgment against one, where it was not known that a partnership existed, was sustained, as under this statute the right of a creditor is superior to the general equity of the partners, and an injunction was refused. Lamolle Valley R. Co. v. Bixby, 55 Vt. 235.

A partner, having replevied property taken under an execution on a judgment against the other partner, and being defeated, cannot then obtain an injunction against the judgment for the return of 30 L. R. A.

the goods, as the fact that the property is that of a person not a party to the replevin suit is no defense against the judgment, and there is a remedy at law if the judgment is erroneous. Bowman v. McGregor, 6 Wash. 118.

And surety in a replevin bond cannot enjoin the judgment on the ground that the property is firm property and not individual property of his principal. Smyth v. Barbee, 9 Lea. 173.

And a dormant partner is not entitled to equitable relief enjoining a levy of an execution and judgments confessed by the other partner for individual debts. Cammack v. Johnson, 2 N. J. Eq. 163.

And an execution lien obtained by the creditor of one partner will not be enjoined where there has been a sale of the firm effects to such partner by the other partner without reserving any lien for firm creditors. Ketchum v. Durkee, 1 Barb. 480, 45 Am. Dec. 412.

One of a firm who is a party defendant in an attachment suit against the firm, and who made an assignment of the firm property for creditors, cannot prevent a confirmation of a sale of firm property held in the name of the other partner who had absconded, and which was attached for a firm debt, where he made no defense at law. Ashton v. Jones, 14 Neb. 426.

A purchaser, A, from one partner, of his real estate, was refused an injunction against the sale of the same on a judgment against the firm, where a mortgage had been foreclosed on the real estate of the other partner, subject to the judgment against the firm prior to the purchase, and the purchaser, B, at foreclosure obtained control of the judgment, and it was claimed that the real estate already acquired was a primary fund; but the court required the complainant to pay into court the amount of the judgment or give the bond required, provided by N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 612, subsec. 1, and § 612, as complainant was a privy to the judgment. Rosow v. Bank of Commerce, 22 N. Y. Week. Dig. 448.

In Garlick v. McArthur, 6 Wis. 450, where one partner had securities as collateral, and had given a bond in penalty to apply the proceeds to a judgment against the firm, and had sufficient property to satisfy the judgment, liable to execution, an injunction was granted against the collection of the execution from the property of the other members, as equity will prevent an inequitable use of the judgment where the assignee of the judgment had notice of such equity.

A purchaser of goods from one partner is not entitled to an injunction against the sale of the same on an execution against the other partner where he leaves the goods mingled with those in the possession of the defendant in execution. Chappell v. Cox, 18 Md. 518.

Under Pasc (Tex.) Dig. art. 3937, providing that on dissolution of an injunction, if the petition is continued after final hearing, the defendant shall give bond to refund, such bond should be required in an action by a legatee of a deceased partner attempting to enjoin the surviving partner from collecting assets. Foster v. Shephard, 33 Tex. 687.

An injunction will not be granted against the sale of individual property of a partner to satisfy a judgment against the firm on the ground that he has not been made liable by sol. fa., where the bill does not allege that the judgment was against the firm and not against the members individually, and does not show that sol. fa. remedy has not been pursued. Jones v. Jones, 18 Iowa, 276.

But the statutory notice of seizure, required to be given three days prior to the sale, must be given to both partners on an execution for a firm debt, as each partner had the right to point out property to the sheriff; and a failure to give such notice will authorize an injunction. Lapens v. McCann, 28 La. Ann. 749.

VIII. Property owned by third parties.

For purchaser of homestead, see II.
a. Condition precedent.

An injunction against the sale of land will not be granted at the instance of a third party having a defective title inferior to the judgment lien, or not having possession, where such possession is a condition precedent to obtaining an injunction.

In order to maintain an injunction against a sale of lands, as a cloud upon title of complainant holding the same under a tax deed, it is necessary that the bill should allege possession. Bevill v. Smith, 25 Fla. 209.

And a sale under foreclosure will not be enjoined as a cloud on title, unless complainant shows that he has title in himself. Benner v. Kendall, 21 Fla. 584.

Or where complainant's title is shown to be defective. Hall v. Theisen, 61 Cal. 534.

So, the purchaser of land under a void tax deed cannot enjoin a levy of an execution on the land under a judgment lien superior to the title under the tax deed. Hill v. Gordon, 45 Fed. Rep. 375.

And in order to remove a cloud on title by enjoining an execution levy, and the judgment, it must be shown that the person complaining has some property which could be seized on execution, or subjected to the judgment. Titaworth v. Cook, 49 Ill. App. 367.

An injunction will not be granted against a sale on execution of property which the defendant had conveyed by warranty, where the judgment was rendered after the conveyance, as it would not be a breach of the covenants of the deed, and plaintiff has no interest in the property. Small v. Somerville, 58 Iowa, 262.

Under La. Code Pr. art. 44, providing that no one can maintain a petitory action except the party in whom the legal title is vested, a vendor of land cannot enjoin the sale of property of his vendee on an execution against a third person. Kelly v. Wiseman, 14 La. Ann. 671.

Where an injunction is sought to prevent the sale of real estate on process against another, and the defense of the title against the purchaser at such sale would be required to depend on extrinsic evidence, an injunction will be granted. Where the injunction is asked on the ground of preventing a cloud on the title, and the distinction above is not made, there is much conflict in the cases, but some uniformity in the different states.

Where the title of complainant or the defense of the same depends upon extrinsic evidence, an injunction will be granted to protect the property of a third party from a sale under process against another party, or will be denied if extrinsic evidence is not necessary. Talieferro v. Barnett, 37 Ark. 511; Schuyler v. Broughton, 65 Cal. 252; Pixley v. Hugins, 15 Cal. 127; Barnes v. Mayo, 19 Fla. 542; Clifton v. Anderson, 40 Mo. App. 616; Texas Land & M. Co. v. Worham, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 245; Roman Catholic Archbishop v. Shipman, 60 Cal. 586; Shalley v. Spillman, 19 Fla. 500; Moore v. Cord, 14 Wis. 214; Lehman v. Roberts, 88 N. Y. 232; Conkey v. Dike, 17 Minn. 457.

And the same rule has been applied to protect a wife's property from a sale for the debts of the husband. Rea v. Longstreet, 54 Ala. 291; Caldwell v. Lawler, 70 Ala. 238; Alverson v. Jones, 10 Cal. 9, 70 Am. Dec. 6-9; Tibbets v. Fore, 70 Cal. 242; Roe v. Dailey, 1 Tex. Unrep. Cas. 247.

Some of the states make this their rule of decision. Some use it as a rule in some of their cases, thereby implying that it is applicable in that state. This rule might probably be applicable to the cases where complainant has an equitable title.

An execution sale of land on a judgment against another person will be enjoined where it would be a cloud on the title and would require proof of extraneous facts. Talieferro v. Barnett, 37 Ark. 511; Schuyler v. Broughton, 65 Cal. 252; Pixley v. Hugins, 15 Cal. 127.

An injunction will be granted against the sale of land of an heir under a judgment that is void because the debtor died pending a suit as to the owner not made a party, as a multiplicity of suits will be avoided, and cloud on title prevented, when the invalidity of the sale depends on matters outside of the record. Clifton v. Anderson, 40 Mo. App. 616.

In Budd v. Long, 18 Fla. 285, it was held that a third party is entitled to an injunction against the sale of his land, upon an execution in favor of another person, where the sale would be a cloud on his title. But in Barnes v. Mayo, infra, this general rule was criticized as improper, the limitation being that injunctions should not be granted unless extraneous evidence was necessary.

In Barnes v. Mayo, 19 Fla. 542, it was held that where the defendant in the execution never had any interest in the land a third party cannot enjoin a sale of the land on execution against another person, unless he shows that his rights are injuriously affected or irreparable injury will follow, and the distinction is made that injunction will not be granted unless extrinsic evidence is necessary.

So an injunction will be granted in favor of an owner of land to prevent an execution sale against his grantor, where the vendor's lien notes on which the judgment was obtained are paid, and parol evidence is necessary to show that fact, as it would create a cloud on the title. Texas Land & Mortg. Co. v. Worham, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 245.

Other Texas cases put the right of injunction on other grounds. See infra.

But if the complainant's title does not depend on extraneous evidence, an injunction will not be granted against a sale of his property on an execution against another person.

A judgment of foreclosure of lien, and sale thereunder, will not be enjoined at the instance of the party owning the fee and in possession of the land, who was not a party to such foreclosure suit, and it does not create a cloud on his title, and does not require extrinsic evidence; besides there are remedies in the court at law,—to refuse a writ of fi. fa. or supersedeas, or by an original action in that court. Roman Catholic Archbishop v. Shipman, 60 Cal. 586.

So, an injunction will not be granted where extraneous evidence is not necessary to defend complainant's title. Shalley v. Spillman, 19 Fla. 500.

And the same was held where the holder of the equity of redemption was not a party to the suit. Moore v. Cord, 14 Wis. 213.

Some cases may be classed within the rule that injunctions will only be granted in case extrinsic evidence is necessary, not that the decisions are made on that ground, but that such seems to be the rule in that state; as—

In Lehman v. Roberts, 88 N. Y. 232, it was held that an action to remove a cloud upon the title, or to restrain a sale or conveyance, upon the ground that it would create a cloud, can only be maintained where the pretended title, which is alleged to constitute the cloud, or the proceeding which it is apprehended will create one, is apparently valid on its face, and the party in possession will be compelled to resort to extrinsic evidence to show the invalidity of the pretended title, and to defend his own. But when the pretended claim is invalid on its face, or requires extrinsic evidence to establish its validity, equity will not interfere. Where objection to the jurisdiction of equity is not made, and a judgment creditor insists on a mechanic's lien against complainant's property where the contract for the lien was not made by a legal title holder, the purchaser may obtain an injunction.

A bona fide purchaser may have an execution sale of the property enjoined, and have a discovery as to the validity of the judgments, in order to remove the cloud on his title, where he claims the judgments are satisfied, the question involved not being a trial of title, but a bill for the discovery of title. Kimberly v. Seils, 8 Johns. Ch. 470.

But injunction will not be granted where a remedy exists by filing notice of lis pendens. And the court on final decree may declare that the judgment was not a lien, and preliminary injunction will not be granted unless necessary to protect some interest or right of complainant. Osborn v. Taylor, 5 Paige, 515.

And will not be granted where the judgment mentioned constitutes no apparent cloud on the title of the purchaser. Gamble v. Loop, 14 Wis. 466.

In Armstrong v. Sanford, 7 Minn. 49, it was held that a purchaser of mortgaged property cannot enjoin a sale on foreclosure under a mortgage made before his purchase, on the ground that the sale of the entire estate is threatened without regard to the equity of redemption; for if such sale could not be made, the purchaser would not acquire title, and the plaintiff's interest would not be clouded. But see Conkey v. Dike, infra.

And in Hart v. Marshall, 4 Minn. 294, it was held that an injunction will not be granted against an execution sale in favor of a purchaser pendente lite, where he claimed that such judgment was void; as, if so, it would not be a cloud on his title, and if not, he has no right to delay the execution sale.

But in Conkey v. Dike, 17 Minn. 457, which was an injunction to prevent the sale of the debtor's property because the holder of the lien had acquired the same by a fraudulent assignment which should have been discharged, it was held that Minn. Gen. Stat. chap. 66, § 182, provides that a temporary injunction may be granted where the act enjoined would injure the plaintiff; and referring to Montgomery v. McEwen, 9 Minn. 103, based upon Armstrong v. Sanford and Hart v. Marshall, supra, it was said that the remark in Armstrong v. Sanford, that "the injury is not of that kind that a writ of injunction should be granted to restrain," is not agreed to. "The remark in Armstrong v. Sanford, that a sale which violates a right of plaintiff, apparent on record, is not such an injury; which is true, but the reason why it is not, is that such a sale is not a cloud, for, what is meant by a cloud on plaintiff's title, is where the proceedings are valid on the face of the record, and extrinsic facts are necessary to be proved to establish their invalidity."

These cases infra do not show clearly that extraneous evidence is necessary, but in Roman Catholic Archbishop v. Shipman, 99 Cal. 588, the distinction is made and it is claimed there that the prior California cases really can be classed under that distinction.

A third party may have an injunction against the sale of his lands on an execution issued against another person. Hickman v. O'Neal, 10 Cal. 202.

And the same was held where the defendant in execution had no interest in the land. Shattuck v. Carson, 2 Cal. 588.

And a purchaser from an administrator's intestate may enjoin a sale by an administrator under a decree of the probate court, as it would cast a cloud upon his title. Thompson v. Lynch, 29 Cal. 189.

And in California it is not necessary that the complainant should be in possession in order to enable him to maintain an action to restrain a sale of lands on process against another person. Ibid.

And a party claiming to be a purchaser in good faith and in possession is entitled to an injunction against a sale under an execution against his grantor, where the creditor claimed that the deed to complainant's grantor from the debtor was only a mortgage. Porter v. Jennings, 89 Cal. 440; Chase v. Jennings (Cal.) 23 Pac. Rep. 681.

But in Macovich v. Wemple, 18 Cal. 104, it was held that an injunction will not be granted in favor of the purchaser of an equity not having a deed against a sale under a decree enforcing a mechanic's lien, where complainant was not a party to such suit, as his rights are not affected.

And a party claiming that the lien of a mortgage is invalid as to property owned by him is not entitled to enjoin a sale; but he may obtain an injunction against the delivery of the deed, as it is discretionary with the court to grant him an injunction restraining the sale. Goldstein v. Kelly, 61 Cal. 301.

In Rea v. Longstreet, 54 Ala. 291, it was said that "the true test recognized by the authorities in this state is: Would the owner of the property, in an action of ejectment brought by the adverse party, founded upon the deed, be required to offer evidence to defeat a recovery? If such proof would be necessary the cloud would exist; if the proof would be unnecessary, no shade would be cast by the presence of the deed."

So, an execution sale may be enjoined by a purchaser of the land, where the lien of the execution is lost by lapse of time. Downing v. Mann, 43 Ala. 206.

Or where the purchase is made before lien of execution attached. Martin v. Hewitt, 44 Ala. 418.

So, a purchaser of land is entitled to an injunction against an execution sale against his grantor, where the debtor had tendered payment of the debt in confederate money, which was a good tender under the Alabama statutes; and the lien of the judgment was lost by failure to issue an execution until after a lapse of a term of court. As Ala. act Dec. 10, 1861, 'provides that the lien of the judgment shall be lost for refusal to take such tender, and Ala. Code 1852 provides that the lien shall be lost by the lapse of an entire term without a release of the execution. Downing v. Mann, 43 Ala. 206.

Where the injunction is asked to prevent a sale of the property of a third party on the ground of quieting complainant's title, in cases not controlled by the rule as to extrinsic evidence there is a conflict. The right to injunction is recognized in Indiana, Iowa, Louisiana, Maryland, Ohio and Oregon, and denied in Nebraska, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Tennessee.

In Georgia, Arkansas, and Illinois some of the cases appear to conflict with others in the same state. And in Texas the right to injunction seems to depend on interference with the possession or irreparable damages, though some cases make the distinction as to extrinsic evidence.

In Missouri injunctions are generally denied when claimed on the ground of quieting title, but the cases might be classed under the distinction that extraneous evidence was not necessary.

In Indiana injunctions are granted to protect purchasers and third parties from sales under execution or final process against other parties, and an owner of land may have an injunction restraining an execution sale of his land, on a judgment against another person, as a cloud on his title. Otis v. Gregory, 111 Ind. 504; Petry v. Ambroscher, 100 Ind. 510; Scobey v. Walker, 114 Ind. 254; Bishop v. Moorman, 98 Ind. 1, 49 Am. Rep. 731; Boes v. Morgan, 130 Ind. 306; Thomas v. Simmons, 103 Ind. 538.

So, one who has conveyed real estate by deed of warranty may maintain a suit for an injunction against the sale of land upon an execution against a former owner where he claimed the debt was paid. McCulloch v. Hollingsworth, 27 Ind. 115.

Where, after a judgment was obtained, an action was brought upon such judgment in another state, as this merged the former judgment and all liens thereunder were lost, an injunction was granted in favor of a purchaser from the judgment debtor. Gould v. Hayden, 63 Ind. 442.

A purchaser of trust property from a trustee is entitled to an injunction against a sale of such property on an execution against the trustee individually, when such trustee had the legal title at the time of the execution, and had no interest whatever in the property. Hollingsworth v. Trueblood, 59 Ind. 542.

Where land was conveyed to the husband and wife jointly, the right of survivorship was not a contingent or vested remainder, and the land was not subject to execution for the husband's debt, and a purchaser of the property might enjoin the sale as a cloud upon his title. Davis v. Clark, 26 Ind. 425, 89 Am. Dec. 471.

Where a plaintiff insists upon his levy despite an injunction obtained by a third person, he cannot after the lapse of ten years enforce the lien of the judgment against another parcel of land, and the owner of such land may have the levy enjoined, when such judgment is not a lien. Shanklin v. Sims, 110 Ind. 143.

But where necessary dates are left blank in the bill of complaint, which should show that the land was not subject to levy, an injunction should be refused. First Nat. Bank v. Deitch, 88 Ind. 181.

And a party claiming that a judgment is a cloud on his title, and seeking to have the execution enjoined, and showing that he became the owner of the land before the commencement of the suit, must also show that he is a purchaser for value. Petry v. Ambroscher, 100 Ind. 510.

In Louisiana a vendor is entitled to protect the title warranted by him by an injunction against an execution sale on a judgment against his grantor, where it is not shown that such judgment was any lien upon the land. Bach v. Goodrich, 9 Rob. (La.) 361.

And an injunction will not be dissolved for failure to show registration of title in the plaintiff in the injunction, where the property does not belong to the debtor in the execution. Mallion's Estate v. Lynch, 15 La. Ann. 547.

And where an injunction is granted against a sale on execution, on the ground that the property seized belongs to plaintiff, no other issue can be made but that of ownership. Basso v. Benker, 38 La. Ann. 432.

A sheriff, defendant in a suit to enjoin a fi. fa. levied on land of a third party, need not be a party in an appeal from a judgment dissolving the injunction, where he is not prejudiced. Hobgood v. Brown, 2 La. Ann. 323.

A third party obtaining an injunction is not entitled to an order to restore possession pending the suit to try title. State v. Judge of Tenth Dist. 6 La. Ann. 548.

But an injunction will not be granted where there is no description given of the property seized, or statement of its value, in the affidavit. McRae v. Brown, 12 La. Ann. 181.

In Maryland one joint owner acquiring conveyance from the other takes it subject to judgment liens, but he is entitled to an injunction against a levy on judgments rendered against his grantor subsequent to the conveyance. Hollida v. Shoop, 4 Md. 465, 59 Am. Dec. 88.

In Ohio a purchaser is entitled to an injunction where the lien of the judgment against his grantor expired before purchase, on the ground of clouding the title. Norton v. Beaver, 5 Ohio, 178; Bank of United States v. Schultz, 2 Ohio, 471.

And a third party is entitled to an injunction where his deed was made by mistake to another party, the defendant in the execution, who conveyed to him when he was embarrassed. Tear v. Mathews, Wright (Ohio) 371.

And a levy under a decree for alimony will be 30 L. R. A.

enjoined at the instance of a purchaser from the defendant where such decree is not a lien. Olin v. Hungerford, 10 Ohio, 298.

In Wilhelm v. Woodcock, 11 Or. 518, it was said that a third party is entitled to an injunction against a sale where he is a privy to the title and the judgment is not a lien or a charge thereon, and such proceeding clouds the title.

In Iowa a purchaser six months after a decree eliminating usury where the principal and interest were paid into the court and accepted, was entitled to an injunction against a sale where the plaintiff in such judgment appealed to the supreme court after the purchase, and obtained a reversal and issued execution. Davis v. Bonar, 15 Iowa, 171.

And an execution sale against the property of a third person will be enjoined, where the judgment never was a lien upon his property, although the execution levy may purport to be upon the interest only of the judgment debtor in such property. Key City Gas Light Co. v. Munsell, 19 Iowa, 805.

A purchaser is entitled to an injunction against a sale under a decree for a mechanic's lien, where he was not a party to such decree, and the action on the lien was barred by the statute of limitation. Gates v. Ballou, 55 Iowa, 741.

Or where the owner of the decree simply denied knowledge of an alleged payment. Gates v. Ballou, 54 Iowa, 485.

Or where land levied upon was held only as a security. Eberke v. Hecht (Iowa) 54 N. W. Rep. 652.

But in Nebraska the holder of a tax title is not entitled to an injunction against an execution sale on a prior judgment, as the purchaser under the judgment will have the right to contest the validity of the tax-deeds. Rickards v. Coon, 12 Neb. 420.

And in New Jersey an injunction will not be granted against the sale of property of a purchaser or a third party, on an execution against another party, the ground of refusal being that the question of title will not be tried by injunction, and there is a remedy at law. Sheldon v. Stokes, 24 N. J. Eq. 87.

In Holmes v. Chester, 28 N. J. Eq. 79, under Pamph. Laws 1870, p. 20, an act "to Compel the Determination of Claims to Real Estate in Certain Cases, and to Quiet the Title to the Same" providing that any person in peaceable possession of lands, whose title is disputed, may bring suit to quiet title to the same, an injunction was granted against an execution sale, where the complaint alleged that the debtor had no interest in the land, on the ground that such a suit compels a speedy trial of the question, and until the result can be reached prevents casting a cloud on the title, and the question of the validity of the lien could not be tried in the suit in which the execution issued, and such a suit is within the meaning of the act. (But see next case.)

But in Swayze v. Hackettstown Nat. Bank, 44 N. J. Eq. 9, although the bill was filed under the same act, a purchaser was denied an injunction on the ground that the question of superiority of title should be settled at law. Referring to Holmes v. Chester, supra, it was said that the case was heard on demurrer to the bill, and such case determined that the bill may be filed under the statute, notwithstanding an execution has been issued upon a decree of this court, which constitutes the defendant's claim upon the real estate. The question as to the propriety of issuing an injunction to restrain a sale under an execution upon a judgment at law was not discussed. In his opinion upon the final hearing the chancellor said that the demurrer merely called in question the right of the complainant under the circumstances of the case to maintain a suit in this court by virtue of the statute.

And where this act was claimed as ground for relief in equity, this case of Holmes v. Chester was not referred to, but it was held that the state was not a proper party defendant, where it had parted with the title, and the order appealed from was one simply dissolving an ad interim injunction and denying an injunction to stay a sale by trustees under their foreclosure decree until the question of title should be determined, and the complainant's bill was not dismissed, and the subject-matter as to claims of ownership is still pending in chancery. The statute confers jurisdiction only where the complainant is in peaceable possession and no suit pending to enforce or test the validity of the adverse claim, and as to whether this bill was properly filed under this statute will not be discussed, as such discussion is not necessary to the subject under review, whether the chancellor should have enjoined the mortgagees from a sale under foreclosure where the stay is sought by parties who were not parties to that decree, and against whose claim of title a sale will be destitute of all legal force. A court of equity will ordinarily not interfere to enjoin a sale of lands under an execution against one person, the title to which is claimed by another, for the manifest reason that the sale will not prejudice the rights of the latter, and the question of title is properly triable in a court of law. And to warrant such interference there must be some recognized ground for equitable relief, fraud, or irreparable injury. Besides, the state cannot be enjoined, and this suit is to enjoin a sale of complainant's land under a mortgage given by another owner under another grant to secure funds to the trustees of public schools. American Dock & Imp. Co. v. Public Schools, 32 N. J. Eq. 428, 35 N. J. Eq. 181.

Where the same statute came under consideration, it was held: "It is merely intended to bring to trial here the question as to the validity of the complainant's title to the land, and to restrain the defendants from proceeding to sell the property under the judgment until that question shall have been decided in this court. No fraud, gross injustice, or irreparable injury, or other ground of equitable jurisdiction is alleged. This court therefore will not entertain jurisdiction. It is the ordinary case of the threatened sale under execution against one person of property claimed by another, and equity will not take jurisdiction in such case." Dawes v. Taylor, 35 N. J. Eq. 40.

An injunction against an execution was denied on the ground that there was a remedy at law under ejectment where the complainant claimed to have purchased in 1838 and to have obtained a deed in 1837, and recorded the same in 1846, and a judgment was recovered against his grantor in 1841, which the purchaser claimed was not a lien on his premises and that his deed was not recorded through ignorance of law, the court saying: As the complainants are in possession, the effect of N. J. Rev. Stat. 643, § 18, declaring deeds void against subsequent judgment creditors not having notice unless recorded within fifteen days after delivery, can be decided in ejectment. Fresman v. Kilmendorf, 7 N. J. Eq. 475, 655.

And a purchaser of a judgment will not be enjoined from a levy and sale although purchased after he saw the owners of lands, subject to such judgment, erecting a building thereon believing the same to be free from any lien, as he is not estopped, and the ignorance of the owner in not knowing that there was any supreme court in New Jersey is gross negligence. Dellatt v. Kemble, 25 N. J. Eq. 66. (The temporary injunction was granted in Dellatt v. Kemble, 23 N. J. Eq. 58.)

The general rule in Pennsylvania is not to enjoin a sale of land under execution, where the levying creditor claims that the execution debtor has some interest in the land, as, if he has no interest, the title does not pass, and if he has, the question is left to an action of ejectment. Small v. Greenough (Pa.), 8 Cent. Rep. 240; Griesinger v. Booth, 12 30 L. R. A.

Lanc. L. Rev. 259; Taylor's Appeal, 8 W. N. C. 122; Walker's Appeal, 118 Pa. 579.

And an owner of land must file an original bill to restrain a levy upon the land on a claim against a former owner, as he cannot interplead in a suit at law to which he is not a party. Dent v. Ross, 35 Pa. 387.

In South Carolina a third party cannot obtain an injunction against an execution sale where no fraud, accident, or mistake, or equitable ground is shown, as equity will not prevent a trespass; and if no title is conveyed by sale, there is no ground for injunction. Wilson v. Hyatt, 4 S. C. N. S. 369.

So, in North Carolina third parties and purchasers are not entitled to an injunction against the sale of their property on an execution against another person, as the question of title will not be tried in the injunction suit. But an injunction was granted to prevent dispossession under a foreclosure suit where complainant was not a party and owned the land mortgaged by another.

And an injunction will not be granted against an execution sale on land claimed to be free from the liens of the judgments, as, if the plaintiff has a good title, a sale under execution against another will not affect it. Gatewood v. Burns, 99 N. C. 357; Bristol v. Hallyburton, 98 N. C. 384.

So, an owner of land in possession cannot have an injunction against the sale on an execution against his grantor on the ground of fraud, as the validity of the judgment can be tested in a suit to try title after sale. Southerland v. Harper, 83 N. C. 320.

And under N. C. act 1885, chap. 147, providing that a conveyance of land shall not be valid as against creditors and purchasers for value unless registered, a claimant under a trust deed that is not recorded is not entitled to an injunction against a sale on execution against a prior grantor, as the question of title will not be tried by injunction. Bostic v. Young, 116 N. C. 766.

But, in Turner v. Cuthrell, 94 N. C. 239, where a widow made a mortgage of all the land of her deceased husband and it was sold under foreclosure, an injunction was granted against a writ of possession at the instance of an heir, who was not a party to the suit, as to all the property except the widow's dower, on the ground that it would be unjust to eject him from that portion of the land that apparently belongs to himself and sisters, without opportunity to assert his title and right to remain in possession. He may establish his right to the relief he seeks. It was therefore proper to grant the injunction pending the action and until the hearing upon the merits. N. C. Code, § 388.

The apparent conflict in North Carolina cases may be reconciled by observing the distinction between a sale and dispossession under a writ, similar to injunctions against enforcing writs in ejectment.

In Tennessee an injunction will not be granted, as the creditor has the right to try title in an action of ejectment. Moore v. Hallum, 1 Lea. 511.

In Georgia there appears to be some conflict of authority as to the right to obtain an injunction to prevent the sale of property for the debts of another person, some cases denying relief on the ground of the statutory remedy of claim of title, the earlier cases granting relief to prevent annoying suits.

A holder of a title through a voluntary deed older than the judgment cannot obtain an injunction against an execution sale, as the same is not a cloud upon his title and there is a remedy by claim of title under the statute. Jones v. Word, 61 Ga. 28.

But an injunction was granted against the enforcement of an execution where such was claimed to be a cloud on title, and a sale was attempted to be made, under the execution, of machinery which plaintiffs claimed belonged to them as fixtures, and on which machinery the party constructing it same had placed a chattel mortgage, and the removal of the machinery would destroy the value of the property and the damages would be irreparable as the debtor was insolvent. Harrell v. Amerious Refrigerating Co. 32 Ga. 463.

And in Cox v. Griffin, 17 Ga. 249, an injunction was granted against a sale on execution of property dedicated to the public, at the instance of the city, where the judgments were recovered against a former owner long after he had dedicated the land to the public. The levies on the property dedicated were many, annoying, and vexatious; the point of objection to the injunction was that in a prior suit there had been a retroact.

And in Kendall v. Dow, 46 Ga. 607, it was held that an execution sale will be enjoined whereafter the judgment there was an agreement to release this land from the operation of the judgment lien. "The remedy in a court of law would not be as adequate and complete as in a court of equity; it will prevent a multiplicity of suits by quieting the title to a number of lots of land by one final decree, and remove a cloud from her title."

But a defendant in execution is not entitled to enjoin a levy and sale of property which he alleges belongs to and is in possession of another person, in the absence of some equitable ground, as the third party is not asking any relief. Tompkins v. Tumlin, 40 Ga. 460.

And a sale on execution against the life tenant will not be enjoined at the instance of the holder of the fee, as such sale does not cast any cloud on his title. Stone v. Franklin, 89 Ga. 126.

Or, where it is doubtful whether execution would not lie against the life estate. Watson v. Goolsby, 36 Ga. 305.

In Stone v. Franklin, supra, it was said that it has never been the practice in Georgia to restrain sheriffs or others by injunction from making harmless sales or executing harmless conveyances.

In Arkansas there appears to be some conflict as to the right of a third party to obtain an injunction to prevent the sale of his property for the debt of another, as a cloud on his title.

In King v. Clay, 34 Ark. 291, a levy and sale under an execution on the land of third parties was enjoined as a cloud upon their title where a levy was made on lands of children, under an execution against their father, as a sale by the sheriff would cloud the title, which equity will prevent.

But in Blakeney v. Ferguson, 14 Ark. 640, where three injunctions by the heirs of A were obtained against a sale of land for the debt of B, to whom A had conveyed the legal title, and the injunctions were granted on the ground that A subsequently had obtained a tax title, but which was not perfected when he died, the supreme court dismissed the bill for injunction on the ground that the evidence did not show that complainant was a widow or heir, and held that there was no pretense that the complainants feared waste or irreparable injury or mischief which it is the object of an injunction to prevent, while they showed that the defendant claimed by adverse title, and as between him and them the title was at least disputed if not doubtful.

In Illinois there seems some conflict as to the right to an injunction, the later cases granting the same to prevent a cloud on title.

In Coughron v. Swift, 18 Ill. 414, an injunction to prevent the sale of land belonging to a third party was refused on the ground that there was a remedy at law to contest title. The bill for injunction showed that the mechanic's lien judgment was obtained without making complainant a party, and he had a chain of title overreaching the lien, and it was held that his title was paramount and could not be affected. This case has been approved, on the ground that a remedy at law prevents equitable interference, in Winkler v. Winkler, 40 Ill. 184; 30 L. R. A.

Chittenden v. Rogers, 43 Ill. 99; Hubbard v. Jasinski, 46 Ill. 162; and Gore v. Kramer, 117 Ill. 182.

But in Groves v. Webber, 72 Ill. 608, where the purchaser paid for land and took a conveyance before the writ of attachment issued against his grantor and of which he had no notice, and his deed was made several hours prior to the issue of the attachment, an injunction was granted to prevent a sale of the property.

And in Bennett v. McFadden, 61 Ill. 334, an injunction was granted in favor of a third party to prevent a sale of his land under an execution against another person who never had any interest in the land, as it was a cloud on his title.

In neither of these cases is Coughron v. Swift, supra, referred to.

In Texas the rule in some cases is that the right to injunction must depend on interference with the possession, or irreparable damages, although in Ivory v. Kempner, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 474, it is held that a mortgagee is entitled to an injunction against proceedings on a judgment affecting his rights, where extrinsic evidence is necessary to protect his title, claiming this is the rule in Mann v. Wallis, infra; Gardner v. Douglass, 64 Tex. 76; and Van Ratcliff v. Call, 72 Tex. 492.

In Wofford v. Booker (Tex.) 80 S. W. Rep. 67, an injunction was allowed against the enforcement of a decree of a lien, and writ of possession under Bayles's (Tex.) Civ. Stat. art. 1840a, providing that an order of sale on foreclosure of lien shall have the effect of a writ of possession, where the purchaser was not a party to the suit of foreclosure of a vendor's lien note, and bought before suit was filed; the court saying: "It is held that ordinarily an injunction will not be granted to prevent a cloud on a title where such sale will not dispossess the complainant of his land or deprive him of his enjoyment, or embarrass him in his legal remedies for any injury to his title or possession."

And in Carlin v. Hudson, 12 Tex. 203, 68 Am. Dec. 521, it was held that injunctions are only granted in cases to restrain the alienation of property where it is indispensable to secure the enjoyment of specific property, or to preserve the title to such property, or to prevent frauds, or gross and irreparable injustice; and an injunction in favor of a purchaser will not be granted to prevent a sale under execution against his grantor, as, if the grantor had no title, the complainant would not be affected by the sale.

And a sale of land under execution against another party will not be enjoined, unless a showing is made that complainant's right will be injured or that some irreparable injury will follow. Mann v. Wallis, 75 Tex. 611; Gaskins v. Peebles, 44 Tex. 390; Whitman v. Willis, 51 Tex. 429.

An injunction will not be granted where complainant does not allege that he is in possession or will suffer loss by the sale, and does not allege his ignorance of the pendency of the suit, for if his rights are affected he should have interfered. Henderson v. Merrill, 12 Tex. 1.

In Missouri an injunction will not be granted to restrain the sale of property of a purchaser or a third party on an execution against another, where a valid defense may be made in ejectment or a remedy exists by suit to quiet title.

And a sale of the right, title, and interest of B in land which may be owned in fee simple by A does not cast a cloud upon the title of A; and it is settled in this state that an injunction will not be granted against a sale of land under execution, on the ground that such a sale will pass no title and will not cast a cloud on the title of the true owner. Witthaus v. Washington Sav. Bank, 18 Mo. App. 181.

Or, while it is alleged that the sale will pass no

Where the judgment creditors of a husband obtain an injunction against an execution sale of land held by the wife sought to be sold for her debts, on the ground that it was conveyed by the husband without consideration and liable for his debts, an appeal was dismissed for defect of parties. Alston v. Rowles, 13 Fla. 110.

In Lucas v. Rickerriob, 1 Lea. 723, under Tenn. Code, § 2481, providing that the interest of a husband in the real estate of his wife shall not be sold under process against him, nor shall the husband and wife be ejected from such real estate by virtue of such decree or judgment, it was held that this did not apply to the rents and profits of her real estate, and that the same was liable for his debts as at common law, and the garnishment of the same would not be enjoined at her instance.

Subsequent purchasers.

A purchaser of property subject to the lien of a judgment cannot obtain an injunction against a sale of such property. Henry v. Tricou, 81 La. Ann. 519; Mallory v. Dauber, 83 Ky. 239; Pettit v. Shepherd, 5 Paige, 493, 28 Am. Dec. 437; Sauvinet v. New Orleans, 1 La. Ann. 344; French v. Shotwell, 6 Johns. Ch. 235.

Or where he agreed to pay the judgment. Calhoun v. Tullasa, 35 Ga. 119.

So, a purchaser of land assuming a deed of trust erroneously describing the land is not entitled to an order staying the execution of a judgment on such deed of trust, where he deducted the same from the purchase money, and had sold the land to an innocent purchaser, and thereby prevented a reformation of the deed of trust. Price v. Reed, 38 Mo. App. 501.

So, a purchaser with knowledge of an unrecorded mortgage is not entitled to an injunction against the sale thereunder. Harrison v. Yerby (Ala.) 14 So. Rep. 351.

And a mistake of law, by a purchaser at an execution sale supposing that a prior judgment held by the same party would not thereafter be enforced, is not sufficient to authorize enjoining a sale under such judgment. Shotwell v. Murray, 1 Johns. Ch. 512.

And a purchaser of property against which are judgment liens cannot obtain an injunction against the sale under the same by tendering the value of the land at the time exclusive of the improvements he has made, claiming that he did not know of the existence of the judgments. Taylor v. Morgan, 85 Ind. 295.

And a sale will not be enjoined where the purchaser claiming to be a bona fide purchaser pending attachment proceedings does not show any defects in the attachment proceedings, nor what interests the grantor had at the time of levy. Manistique Lumbering Co. v. Lovejoy, 55 Mich. 189.

And where an amended attachment included lands privately sold by the defendant therein, pending the original attachment, an injunction was refused against a sale in attachment at the instance of a purchaser pending the attachment. Tilton v. Coffeld, 93 U. S. 163, 23 L. ed. 553.

Laches in enforcing a judgment lien against land claimed by a purchaser will not authorize an injunction against levy and sale where it was doubtful if anything could be realized, and the purchaser also controlled a large amount of liens, holding them against the property. Hill v. Gordon, 45 Fed. Rep. 273.

And adverse possession of land in Florida for more than seven years will not authorize an injunction against a levy on an execution under a judgment lien that exists against the land. Hill v. Gordon, 45 Fed. Rep. 273.

And purchasers of property owned by a judgment debtor claiming that such judgment was entered satisfied of record, and that they were misled by the records, and seeking to have their title protected, cannot have an injunction against a levy, where there is no allegation that they were purchasers for value or that they were misled by a record of satisfaction of the judgment. Yeates v. Mead, 63 Miss. 59.

Where a grantor, who is a stranger to the title of the defendant in the fi. fa. conveys the land to a third person under a warranty, and the vendee interposes a claim for the property under the statute, which is not successful, his grantor cannot thereafter obtain an injunction against the sale on a writ of fi. fa. without some special reason. Welch v. Gordon, 63 Ga. 610.

And the failure of a purchaser who was a party to make all his defense against the mortgage on the land at the time of the judgment, prevents an injunction. Smith v. Brownson, 19 La. 312.

And a bidder who has failed to comply with his bid is not entitled to an injunction against a subsequent sale of the property. Boyer v. Cannon, 46 La. Ann. 767.

And a purchaser of land is not entitled to an injunction against a sale in favor of a previous prior vendor on the ground of equities between the owner and his immediate grantor. Hawkins v. Dearing, 93 Ga. 103.

Claimants under succession, who are in possession of the property, have no ground of complaint, if the sheriff did not divest them of that possession while the property was under seizure, and the party in possession cannot maintain that it is an act which authorizes an injunction, under La. Code Pr. art. 908, and cannot make a defense to the original mortgage on which the sale was ordered that the mortgagors could not make. Citizens' Bank v. Webre 44 La. Ann. 384, 1081.

c. Fraudulent purchasers.

Generally a party holding title to real estate under a fraudulent conveyance is not entitled to an injunction to restrain a sale of the same for the debt of another, but in Louisiana the creditor cannot disregard the conveyance and levy on the land, but must resort to a revocatory action. Yet in that state if it is shown that the complainant's title is simulated, the injunction will be denied.

A grantee taking a conveyance to defeat the creditors of his grantor is not entitled to an injunction against an execution sale of the property. Potter v. Phillips, 44 Iowa. 363.

So, where a purchaser obtains title pending a suit against his grantor, and then files a bill to enjoin an execution levy on his land, alleging that the execution creditors claim that his title is fraudulent, an injunction will not be granted. Welde v. Scotten, 59 Md. 72.

And where a judgment is a lien on the land because a voluntary conveyance was in fraud of creditors, the fact that no harm would come on enjoining the sale on account of there being a term of court soon, at which the case could be tried on its merits, is not sufficient for an injunction. Jones v. Word, 61 Ga. 23.

A third party cannot enjoin an execution sale of personal and real property, where he acquires the same in fraud of his vendor's creditors. In this case the evidence of title was three promissory notes, and the sale was shown to be a mere simulation. Lewis v. Dinkgrave, 24 La. Ann. 499.

But in Payne v. Graham, 23 La. Ann. 771, it was held that real estate of a third party under a recorded title cannot be seized on an execution against his grantor, where fraud is charged, until the title is set aside by a direct action, and a sale will be enjoined.

And the same was held in Theurer v. McGibbon, 23 La. Ann. 22, as it is only in purely simulated acts, where through deeds of transfer purely fictitious, having only the semblance of title, parties seek to screen property from seizure under the pretense of sales, that creditors may seize directly, disregarding mere paper titles utterly void. In this case the complainant proved that he was a bona fide holder for value.

1. Equitable owners.

The owner of land by a superior equitable title at the time of the judgment lien is entitled to an injunction against the sale of his property, under process against another. Fonda v. Sage, 48 N. Y. 173; Uhl v. May, 5 Neb. 187; Rodriguez v. Buckley (Tex.), 30 S. W. Rep. 1123; Parks v. People's Bank, 97 Mo. 130, 31 Mo. App. 13, 18; Gerry v. Stimson, 60 Me. 186; Monticello Hydraulic Co. v. Loughry, 73 Ind. 562; Merriman v. Polk, 5 Helsk. 717.

As where the execution defendant held title under a deed which was only a mortgage. Nell v. Bank of Upper Canada, 2 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 366.

And possession under an unrecorded deed entitles the owner to an injunction against a judgment subsequently rendered against his vendor, on the ground of casting a cloud upon his title. Burt v. Cassey, 12 Ala. 734.

So, a purchaser of land under a parol contract and in possession for ten years, obtaining a deed of the same, may enjoin an execution sale on a judgment against his grantor rendered after he had taken possession and before his deed. Niles v. Davis, 60 Miss. 750.

And an execution sale against A will be enjoined at the instance of B where A had bought the property for B taking title in his own name, and after the judgment against A the title bond was assigned to B, who was in possession of the land from the time of purchase. Dierks v. Martin, 16 Neb. 120.

And an execution sale will be enjoined where there are peculiar equities between the holder of such judgment and the owner of land to whom the holder of the judgment had bargained it before the judgment was rendered, as the ordinary remedy of claim would not be adequate. Horne v. Seisel, 92 Ga. 682.

So, a vendor of land having executed a deed upon conditions which were never fulfilled, and suing for a rescission, may obtain an injunction against an execution levy upon the land under a judgment against his grantee. Taylor v. Strong, 10 Smedes & M. 63.

And a bona fide purchaser without notice is entitled to an injunction against a sale under a judgment that was satisfied at the time of his purchase on the records, and the attorney of the judgment creditor told him that the judgment was satisfied, although it is subsequently shown that no money was received, as plaintiff's claim is not based on a mere legal right, but on an equity. Wheeler v. Alderman, 34 S. C. 533.

And in Knight v. Mayberry, 48 Me. 158, it was said that a person having an equitable title to land may obtain relief in equity against a levy, under a judgment against another party.

Although a court of equity will protect an equitable title of a purchaser against the legal lien of a judgment against his grantor by enjoining the sale, where the equity is denied by the answer, and has not been overcome by evidence, an injunction should be refused. Jones v. Jones, 13 Iowa, 276.

g. Right of third party to require levy on other property.

A purchaser of land is generally entitled to an injunction to prevent a sale of his property under execution, where the debtor has other property liable to seizure. Welch v. James, 23 How. Pr. 474; Agricultural Bank v. Pallen, 8 Smedes & M. 367, 47 Am. Dec. 92; Edwards v. Applegate, 70 Ind. 825; Russell v. Houston, 5 Ind. 180; Sidener v. White, 46 Ind. 568.

And an injunction against a sheriff's sale will be allowed, where it is a question whether such judgment was a lien on complainant's land, or had not been released by releasing other land. Van Mater v. Holmes, 6 N. J. Eq. 575.

So, where the holder of the judgments stayed a levy on other property that could have been sold, and which he should have exhausted first. Hurd v. Eaton, 26 Ill. 122.

A purchaser of personal property is entitled to an injunction against a levy of an execution on a judgment against his vendor where an execution had been returned before the purchase "satisfied in full," which satisfaction was set aside without notice to the purchaser. Sevier v. McWhorter, 27 Miss. 443.

And an injunction will be granted where the judgment creditor had surrendered to the judgment debtor securities sufficient to pay the debt knowing complainant's rights to the property. Ingrall v. Morgan, 10 N. Y. 178.

In Masile v. Wilson, 16 Iowa, 390, it was said that a purchaser or a mortgagee was entitled to an injunction against a sale of real estate on an execution against his grantor, where the grantor has sufficient property subject to execution to satisfy the debt.

In Jones v. Jones, 13 Iowa, 276, it was said that a purchaser from a judgment debtor is entitled to an injunction against the sale of his property on a judgment against his grantor, where such grantor has property liable to levy, sufficient to satisfy the same.

A party to an action to enjoin a sheriff's sale of land on execution, until other land of the debtor is first exhausted, is entitled to a jury trial. Edwards v. Applegate, 70 Ind. 825.

But an injunction will not be granted to restrain a sale on execution where the officer has not threatened or is not about to make an illegal levy upon the property of the replevin bail before exhausting the property of the defendant. Eason v. O'Dowd, 40 Ind. 300.

A purchaser of property from the judgment debtor after the issue of an execution is not entitled to an injunction against the sale on the ground that the sheriff has permitted the execution defendant to remove other property from the state that was subject to the lien of the same. Sidener v. White, 46 Ind. 568.

h. Personal property.

The general rule is that a third party cannot obtain an injunction against the sale of his personal property on process against another person, as he has a remedy at law of trespass, trover, replevin, damages, and the like, and a fraudulent purchaser cannot obtain an injunction against the sale of his personal property on process against another.

To the general rule denying injunctions there are some exceptions, (1) as where the remedy at law is prevented or denied, or where he has no remedy at law; (2) in Louisiana; (3) the equitable owner of corporate stock; (4) where there is other property of the debtor that should be first levied upon, or where the judgment was satisfied at the time of the purchase.

For Slaves, and Wife's personal property, see infra, VIII. i, j.

For Property of peculiar value, and Merchandise, see infra, IX.

An injunction will not be granted against the sale of personal property on an execution against a third party. Garstin v. Asplin, 1 Madd. 150.

As there is a remedy at law. Jackson v. Stanhope, 10 Jur. 676, 15 L. J. Ch. N. S. 446; Hammond v. St. John, 4 Yerg. 107; Hall v. Davis, 5 J. J. Marsh. 290.

Or a remedy by action against the officer. Freeland v. Reynolds, 16 Md. 416.

Of damages. Lewis v. Levy, 18 Md. 85.

Or a remedy by writ of replevin. Bouldin v. Alexander, 7 T. B. Mon. 426; Allen v. Winsteadly, 135 Ind. 105.

Or a remedy of trespass or trover. Johnson v. Connecticut Bank, 21 Conn. 143.

Or where the remedy at law is adequate to try title. Marriott v. Givens, 8 Ala. 694.

And an injunction will not be granted where there is a remedy by action of claim of property. Ferguson v. Herring, 49 Tex. 123; George v. Dyer, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 780.

And a third party cannot enjoin an execution sale of personal property belonging to him under a judgment against another party, unless the same is of peculiar value. Allen v. Winsteadly, supra; Baker v. Binehard, 11 W. Va. 238.

In Hollins v. Hess, 27 W. Va. 570, the same was said to be the rule.

And a party intervening by third opposition, and claiming the proceeds of a sale, prevents an injunction. Jackson v. Hoffman, 81 La. Ann. 97.

Or where he has instituted a suit for the recovery of the same property in an action of claim and delivery. Richards v. Kirkpatrick, 53 Cal. 433.

Or has failed in a previous injunction suit. Wells v. Hunter, 5 Mart. N. S. 120.

And an injunction against a levy on personal property claimed by a third party should not be allowed where the claimant has not given the officer any notice of his claim so that the levy might have been abandoned. Hinkle v. Baldwin, 98 Mich. 422.

A third party cannot obtain an injunction against a sale of his personal property on execution against another person, in a proceeding by third opposition where it is not before the court rendering judgment, and where the property seized is in the parish of the court rendering judgment. Oger v. Daunoy, 7 Mart. N. S. 653.

The owner of goods is not entitled to an injunction against a judgment obtained by another party against a purchaser who bought from the latter with knowledge of title, as the purchaser should have defended against the judgment, and is still liable to the true owner. Scott v. Whitlow, 30 Ill. 310.

And an injunction should be refused unless the injury is irreparable by a clear showing of the plaintiff's right and the defendant's insolvency; although it was alleged that the sheriff was unable to respond in damages for more than a small part. More v. Ord, 15 Cal. 204.

Unless it be shown that if the property was sold the complainant would be without remedy at law, an injunction will be refused. Henderson v. Bates, 3 Blackf. 460.

An execution sale of personal property for the debt of a third person will not be restrained in West Virginia. Dunn v. Baxter, 30 W. Va. 572.

And a tenant in possession of a furnished house cannot obtain an injunction against the levy of an execution of the same on a judgment against the lessor, as there is a remedy at law and the sheriff has no right to seize. Garstin v. Asplin, 1 Madd. 150.

So, an injunction will not be granted at the instance of the debtor against the sale of a house which the debtor had built on land belonging to the creditor, as, if he could transfer his title, he cannot prevent an execution sale of the same. Augustin v. Dours, 28 La. Ann. 231.

And a third party who does not claim title in himself, is not entitled to an injunction against a judgment of detinue nor an execution of a distringas fi. fa., for on such an execution the sheriff cannot distrain the property for which the distringas issued, nor can he seize and sell it to pay the damages mentioned in the execution. Jordan v. Williams, 3 Rand. (Va.) 501.

to enjoin an execution sale of personal property at the instance of one of them on the allegation that the other had died without showing that the personal property belonged to complainant. Gothard v. Redley, 14 Tex. 461.

And neither a surety nor a principal can obtain an injunction against an execution on a forthcoming bond on the ground that the property was not that of the principals. Syme v. Montague, 4 Hen. & M. 180.

A party holding personal property under a fraudulent sale cannot defeat the rights of a seizing creditor by injunction. Mora v. Avery, 23 La. Ann. 417; Moree v. Diamant, 41 N. J. Eq. 612; Payne v. Owings, 4 T. B. Mon. 80; Hobgood v. Brown, 2 La. Ann. 323; Devonshire v. Gauthreaux, 38 La. Ann. 1122.

And a purchaser of a stock of goods from one partner, allowing the same to remain in the store and become mingled with the goods of the other partner, cannot obtain an injunction against an execution sale on a judgment rendered against the partner in possession where he fails to point out his goods to the sheriff. Chappell v. Cox, 18 Md. 513.

But where the remedy at law is prevented or unavailable, an injunction will be granted against the sale of personal property belonging to a third party.

So, an injunction will be granted against the distribution of proceeds of attached property, claimed by a third party who was not allowed to intervene in the attachment suits, and gave a forthcoming bond to the marshal and sold the goods and paid their value on his bond, where the attaching creditors are nonresidents, as he could not maintain an action of replevin, and there is no adequate remedy at law. Krippendorf v. Hyde, 110 U. S. 276, 23 L. ed. 145.

So where the state of Georgia was refused the right to intervene in a suit at law and claim the proceeds of money obtained on execution, an injunction against the disposition of the money was granted, although a remedy by appeal or error was insisted upon as a bar to the injunction. Georgia v. Brailsford, 2 U. S. 2 Dall. 402, 1 L. ed. 433.

So, fraud in procuring an execution to be levied upon property not subject to execution, and in procuring a bond for its delivery to be forfeited, refusing a trial of right of property, will be relieved against by enjoining the judgment. Nunn v. Matlock, 17 Ark. 512.

And an alias execution issued on the same judgment pending the trial of the right of property claimed by a third party will be enjoined. Huntington v. Bell, 2 Port. (Ala.) 51.

So, a surety on a delivery bond given for property levied upon may obtain an injunction against a levy of other executions before the day of sale, as there is no remedy at law. Dechard v. Edwards, 3 Sneed, 93.

A defendant in a replevin suit, having executed a forthcoming bond for the property, is entitled to an injunction against the sale of the property, on an execution against the plaintiff in the replevin suit, on the ground that the property is in the custody of the law and to prevent multiplicity of suits. Cooper v. Newell, 38 Miss. 516.

Where personal property has been converted into money by judicial sale, a claimant of the property may obtain an injunction against the payment of the money to the creditors, as he has no remedy on the property. Mann v. Flower, 26 Minn. 479.

And a purchaser of personal property leased to, and in the possession of, a lessee, may have a sale under execution against the lessor enjoined, as, not having the right of immediate possession, he has no remedy at law. Ford v. Rigby, 10 Cal. 442.

And an injunction against an execution should be granted, where the judgment was obtained against garnishees, and they appealed without supersuades and threatened to surrender to the sheriff the property held by them belonging to the plaintiff in the injunction suit, and the plaintiff in the garnishment suit is insolvent. Hitt v. Ehrlich, 89 Ga. 824.

In Bristol v. Hallyburton, 98 N. C. 384, it was said a third party would be entitled to an injunction against a sale of his personal property on an execution against another party, where the sheriff and the plaintiff in the execution are both insolvent.

And in Langton v. Horton, 1 Hare, 549, it was held that the equitable owner of a ship, obtaining possession, is entitled to an injunction against the levy of an execution on a judgment against another party, as equity will protect an equitable title.

In Kent v. Bridgman, Proc. in Ch. 228, an injunction was granted against the levy on personal property for the debt of another, notwithstanding a judgment in trover, where in such action the plaintiff had failed to prove a judgment on which he relied for title, as the matter is cognizable either in law or in equity.

In Louisiana an injunction against an execution sale of personal property belonging to a third party will be granted. Lewis v. Daniels, 23 La. Ann. 170; State v. Parlange, 26 La. Ann. 550; Arenstein v. Weber, 21 La. Ann. 199.

In Poincy v. Burke, 23 La. Ann. 673, where the plaintiff was joint owner with another in a painting, an injunction was granted against a levy and sale on the right, title, and interest of a party other than these two on a judgment against him, where he had no title, as, if the owner had stood by and permitted the sale, he might have been estopped from denying the title of the defendant in the execution, and the pretext that it was only the interest of the debtor that was seized is unsound.

And a third party acquiring property from a husband may enjoin the execution of the judgment obtained by the wife in a hypothecary action against him, on the ground that she has intermeddled with the estate of the husband and appropriated property. Matta v. Gayle, 10 La. Ann. 347.

And parties holding under a parol assignment of a lease are entitled to enjoin a sale of their personal property on the farm, on an execution against the lessor. Gay v. Nichol, 23 La. Ann. 237.

And in Coleman v. Brown, 16 La. Ann. 110, it was said that a third party may obtain an injunction against the sale of his property on an execution issued against another in a third opposition.

But, in Van Norden v. Morton, 99 U. S. 373, 25 L. ed. 452, it was held that an injunction against a seizure and sale under an execution of property on a judgment against a third party will not be granted as there is ample remedy at law by suit in trespass for damages. Although the Louisiana Code does not give a remedy of replevin, it provides a remedy similar under La. Code Pr. arts. 209-223 of sequestration, and the statutory remedy under La. Code Pr. art. 298, p. 7, providing for injunctions against sale by a sheriff, is not a chancery proceeding but a petition or motion with notice to the sheriff; and as a court of chancery the United States circuit court has no jurisdiction in this case.

The claimant of property seized on a f. fa., who obtained an injunction to stay the sale, is not entitled to the possession of the property pending the trial of his right. Lacy v. Bubler, 8 Mart. N. S. 662; State v. Judge of Tenth Dist. 6 La. Ann. 543.

Where the complaint by an intervenor for an injunction against a seizure under a judgment does not show that there is a contemplated seizure, but states that the plaintiff is about to subject the schooner or the bond to the payment of the judgment, an injunction will be refused. Taylor v. Clark, 11 La. Ann. 560.

The equitable owner of shares of stock in a company may obtain an injunction against an execution sale on a judgment against the nominal owner, the remedy at law being insufficient. Anderson v. Biddle, 10 Mo. 23; Weber v. Bullock, 19 Colo. 214. (See also Stout v. La Follette, XI. b. 1; Bargate v. Shortridge; and Hampson v. Wear, XIX. a. 1.)

It is error to render judgment against a third party and his sureties on a dissolution of an injunction against a levy of his personal property when he was not a party to the judgment, as the remedy is by damages on the injunction bond. Ferguson v. Herring, 49 Tex. 123.

An injunction against an execution sale will not be granted where all the defendants in the judgment are not made parties. Gates v. Lane, 44 Cal. 302.

1. Slaves.

Injunctions have generally been granted to prevent the sale of slaves on an execution against a third party, and this sometimes on the ground of peculiar value of slave property, or clear proof of title, or of peculiar relationship of master and slave; but in Virginia a purchaser of slaves at auction was denied an injunction on the ground of absence of such attachment. In North Carolina and Kentucky the injunction was usually denied, but allowed in peculiar cases.

A levy of an execution upon a slave owned by a third party may be enjoined, as a different rule applies in regard to slaves. Sevier v. Ross, Freem. Ch. (Miss.) 519; Levistone v. Bona, 4 Rob. (La.) 459; Stroud v. Humble, 1 La. Ann. 310; Wilson v. Butler, 3 Munf. 559; Sims v. Harrison, 4 Leigh, 343; Kelly v. Scott, 5 Gratt. 479; Randolph v. Randolph, 6 Rand. (Va.) 194; Harrison v. Sims, Id. 506; Loftin v. Espy, 4 Yerg. 84.

An execution sale of a slave, the property of complainant, upon a judgment against a third party will be enjoined, as the remedy at law of replevin is inadequate, as the purchaser would easily remove a slave beyond legal process, denying the rule announced in Lovette v. Longmire, 14 Ark. 330, where the property of a wife was levied upon for the debt of her husband. Sanders v. Sanders, 20 Ark. 610. And the same was held in Bell v. Greenwood, 21 Ark. 249.

In Lovette v. Longmire, supra, it was held that an execution levy on slaves of a wife, owned by her as separate property, will not be enjoined. In this case the debt was contracted by the husband before the married woman's act of 1846, and her property was liable for his debts, as debts contracted were exempted from the operation of the act. The authority of this case is denied in Sanders v. Sanders, supra.

But, injunctions are generally granted to protect the rights of a wife in slave property, as against a sale for the husband's debts. Smith v. Bank of Wadesborough; Calhoun v. Cozens; Stockley v. Rowley; Lawes v. Chinn; and Gerald v. McKenzie, —infra.

In Amis v. Myers, 57 U. S. 16 How. 422, 14 L. ed. 1029, an injunction was granted against an execution sale of slaves owned by a third party, although there was a remedy at law under La. Code Pr. 298, § 7. The court said: "It is not usual for this court to take an exception of this nature on its own motion and where no objection has been made by the defendant; but this case is one so clearly beyond the limits of the equitable jurisdiction of the circuit court that the fact is noticed that it may not serve as a precedent."

In Hammond v. St. John, 4 Yerg. 107, it was said that the right of a third party to enjoin a sale of slaves on execution against another is an exception to the general rule.

And applies only where the execution is against a third party, and not where it is against the debtor, as he has a remedy by motion or supersedeas. Williams v. Wright, 9 Humph. 423.

Negroes manumitted by a will are entitled to an injunction against being sold under execution on judgments against the estate, on a bill to marshal assets. Negroes Charles, etc. v. Sheriff, 12 Md. 274.

In Kentucky an execution sale of slaves owned by a party other than the defendant in the execution will not be enjoined in the absence of some peculiar ground in equity, as there is a remedy at law of trespass or trover. Kendrick v. Arnold, 4 Bibb, 235; Nesmith v. Bowler, 3 Bibb, 487.

Or replevin. Young v. Young, 9 B. Mon. 66.

And in Watkins v. Logan, 3 T. B. Mon. 20, it was held that an injunction will not be granted to restrain the sale of slaves owned by a third party and held by a trustee on seizure for debts of another, there being a remedy at law (overruling McGinty v. Haggin, 2 Bibb, 265, as to the right of trustee to obtain an injunction, as in that case a rehearing was had and the case was decided on another point not reported). This case appears only in the original edition, although indexed in the reprinted editions.

But an injunction will be granted against an execution sale of property belonging to a third person, where the title of such person is only an equitable interest. Orr v. Pickett, 3 J. J. Marsh. 269.

In North Carolina an injunction will not be granted against an execution sale of slaves on a judgment against a third party in the absence of some especial equitable ground of interference. Du Pre v. Williams, 5 Jones, Eq. 98.

In Howell v. Howell, 5 Ired. Eq. 258, where negroes were bequeathed to the plaintiff for life, and the executor assented to her taking the same, and afterwards obtained an ex parte order for their sale on false allegation of debts of the estate, an injunction was denied as there is a remedy of trespass, trover, or detinue, although plaintiff was old and infirm and in all probability her estate would terminate by her death before an action at law could be determined.

But in Smith v. Bank of Wadesborough, 4 Jones, Eq. 308, it was held that slaves the separate property of the wife would be protected by injunction against a sale for the husband's debts, as, the legal title being in the husband, there was no one who could sue for the trespass, and an equitable interest of the wife will be protected in equity.

A purchaser of slaves at auction under circumstances of fraud on the part of the vendor cannot obtain an injunction against an execution sale of the same on a judgment against his vendor, as the question of mutual attachment does not apply. Allen v. Freeland, 3 Rand. (Va.) 170.

A purchaser of slaves from a husband and wife is not entitled to an injunction against execution in detinue, in favor of the trustee holding the legal title to the slaves. Jordan v. Thomas, 34 Miss. 72, 69 Am. Dec. 387.

And a purchaser of a slave cannot enjoin a seizure under a f. fa. at the suit of a party having a superior or encumbrance, where the vendor of the complainant disclaimed ownership at the time of the attempted levy. Michel v. Her Husband, 1 La. Ann. 174.

1. Wife's personal property.

The weight of authority is in favor of protecting the wife's separate personal property from seizure and sale for her husband's debts, but this is denied in Texas, where she has adequate remedy at law, and in Maryland the later cases deny her right on the same ground.

A wife having a separate estate in slaves is entitled to an injunction against an execution sale of the same on a judgment against her husband and another party. Stookley v. Rowley, 2 Head, 493; Calhoun v. Cosens, 3 Ala. 498; Hawes v. Chinn, 4 Mart. N. S. 888; Smith v. Bank of Wadesborough, 4 Jones, Eq. 308. But see Lovette v. Longmire, 14 Ark. 389.

As Ala. Code, § 2181, authorizing a wife to maintain a suit at law in her own name, does not apply where the matters involved are her separate estate. Gerald v. McKenzie, 27 Ala. 168.

The separate estate of a married woman will be protected in equity against a sale for the husband's debts. Holthaus v. Hornbostle, 60 Mo. 439; Newlands v. Paynter, 4 Myl. & C. 408, 10 Sim. 377, 4 Jur. 232; Broussard v. Le Blanc, 44 La. Ann. 380; Lewis v. Winston, 26 La. Ann. 707.

An injunction will be granted to restrain the sale of a wife's separate personal property for the husband's debts, as she cannot sue as feme sole or give a bond, and has no remedy at law. In this case she alleged the insolvency of the sheriff and his sureties. Fairchild v. Knight, 18 Fla. 770.

And in Pawley v. Vogel, 42 Mo. 201, it was said that an execution sale of property held in trust for a wife, on a judgment against the husband, will be enjoined.

The wife is entitled to an injunction against the sale of her personal property which is of peculiar value, as against an execution sale on a judgment against her husband. Lady Arundell v. Phipps, 10 Ves. Jr. 139.

In Deville v. Hayes, 23 La. Ann. 550, it was held that where a sheriff does not take possession of personal property under an execution against the husband, the sale will be enjoined where the husband gives it to his wife in payment of a judgment she held against him. In this case the seizing creditor had intervened and opposed the wife's claim, and the property was decreed to belong to her, and that question was res judicata, and as to the other property the sheriff did not take possession of them.

But an injunction will not be granted to prevent the sale of the wife's property on an execution against her husband where the affidavit of complainant does not describe the property seized or its value. McRae v. Brown, 12 La. Ann. 181.

Nor unless she establishes her ownership with legal certainty. Goldsmith v. Michel, 19 La. Ann. 272; Erdman v. Rosenthal, 60 Md. 312; Beatty v. Smith, 2 Smedes & M. 567.

Or where the transfer to her trustee is a fraud on the husband's creditors. Ragsdale v. Gossett, 3 Lea. 729.

In Bridges v. McKenna, 14 Md. 253, an injunction was granted to prevent the sale of a wife's personal property for the debts of her husband where she held the same in her sole and separate use, under Md. act 1843, chap. 298, § 8, providing that a married woman may acquire property to the extent of $1,000; while the act of 1863, providing that it shall not hereafter be necessary to interpose a trustee in order to secure to a married woman the sole and separate use of her property, and the 2d section, providing that she may have her remedy in a court of law, as a feme sole, against the creditors of her husband unlawfully subjecting to the payment of his debts her sole and separate property, do not deprive the court of equity of its jurisdiction.

But in Frazier v. White, 49 Md. 1, an injunction was refused to protect a married woman's personal property from sale for the debts of her husband, as Md. Code Pub. Gen. Laws art. 45, giving her a separate estate in her property, and Id. § 4, providing that a married woman having no trustee may by her next friend sue in a court of law or equity in all cases for the recovery, or security, or protection of her property as if she were a feme sole, do not mean that she should sue in equity where she can sue in replevin or for damages. The previous case was not referred to.

An injunction against an attachment sale of a wife's separate personal property consisting of horses branded HX will not be granted, although the order directed a sale of horses branded HX, where she had been a party to the suit in attachment, but was dismissed before judgment, as she has an adequate remedy at law and cannot enjoin for error in dismissing her claim in the other suit. Perrin v. Stevens (Tex.): 29 S. W. Rep. 327.

The rents and profits of the wife's real estate are not protected against garnishment for the husband's debts, by Tenn. Code, § 2481, providing that the interest of a husband in his wife's real estate shall not be sold under process against him, as the rents and profits are his property at common law, and an injunction will not be granted. Lucas v. Bickerich, 1 Lea. 728.

IX. Personal property of a peculiar value.

Injunctions are sometimes granted against the sale of personal property of third parties or others on process against another, on the ground of preventing their business from being ruined, or causing irreparable damages; and injunctions have been generally granted to restrain the sale of personal property of a peculiar value, as relics, and the like, but there are some cases which deny this right.

So, a seizure of plaintiff's stock of goods, under an execution against a third person, injuring the business, will authorize an injunction, where such levy was excessive and plaintiff was excluded from his store, and replevin would not afford a remedy, as the creditor could give bond and retain the goods. Sickels v. Combs, 10 Misc. 551.

A third party owning a stock of merchandise is entitled to an injunction against a sale on execution under a judgment against another, where such sale would ruin his business, trade, and credit, and other remedies would be inadequate. McCreery v. Sutherland, 23 Md. 471, 87 Am. Dec. 578; North v. Peters, 128 U. S. 271, 34 L. ed. 938; Watson v. Sutherland, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 74, 18 L. ed. 580.

In Carrington v. Holabird, 19 Conn. 84, 17 Conn. 530, it was held that the fact that the judgment creditor is not insolvent will not prevent equitable interference against an execution sale which would destroy complainant's business as a merchant. In this case the debtor was also discharged from the debt by bankruptcy.

In Walker v. Hunt, 2 W. Va. 491, 98 Am. Dec. 779, an injunction was granted in favor of a third party against the levy of an execution on store goods of a merchant for the debts of another, and Va. Code, chap. 162, §§ 4-7, providing for an indemnifying bond to the sheriff in order to make a levy, do not prevent an injunction. (But see next case.)

But, in Baker v. Rhinehard, 11 W. Va. 238, Walker v. Hunt was in effect overruled, the court saying that in that case the court misapprehended the question and really never gave it any consideration, and did not pass upon the remedy under the 6th and 7th sections of that Code, and held that W. Va. Code, chap. 107, § 6, providing that a claimant may give a suspending bond, and § 7, providing that he may give a forthcoming bond on which he may have a trial by jury, prevent an injunction against an execution sale of property levied on for another person's debt.

Where the property is of peculiar value and belongs to the wife, an injunction will be granted to restrain a sale of the same for the debts of the husband. Lady Arundell v. Phipps, 10 Ves. Jr. 139.

An execution sale of wedding presents will be enjoined where they are of peculiar value and the damages would be irreparable, and a satisfactory bond is given for damages in injunction. Church v. Haeger, 65 N. Y. S. R. 681.

And in Allen v. Winsteadly, 185 Ind. 105; Baker v. Rhinehard, 11 W. Va. 238; Rollins v. Hess, 27 W. Va. 570; and Davidson v. Floyd, 15 Fla. 667,—the same was said to be the rule.

And in Bailey v. Wade, 24 Mo. App. 186, the same was intimated, where it was said in regard to an execution sale of a horse: "In the absence of a pre-tium affectionis there would be no difficulty in establishing his value,"—although this was property of the defendant in the execution.

But in Johnson v. Connecticut Bank, 21 Conn. 148, it was held that an executor cannot maintain a bill of injunction to prevent an execution sale of relics belonging to an heir when she is not a party to the suit,—especially when there is no offer to pay the value of the articles.

X. Trust property.

The sale of trust property will generally be enjoined, unless the same has been ordered to be sold in a suit where all parties interested are parties to the suit. But an injunction was denied where the interested party did not complain or there was adequate remedy by its pendens.

An execution sale of trust property on a judgment against the trustee individually will be restrained at the instance of the cestui que trust, where the trust depends upon parol evidence. South Presby. Ch. v. Hintze 72 Mo. 362, 5 Mo. App. 578, appx. To the same effect, Hollingsworth v. Trueblood, infra.

Or where by mistake the title was not conveyed for the use of complainant and other cestuis que trust. Simms v. Phillips, 51 Ga. 428.

And a sale of trust property under an execution issued upon a general judgment against the trustees will be enjoined, as trust property is not bound, unless the judgment specifies the property to be bound. Clinch v. Ferril, 48 Ga. 365.

And a guardian is entitled to an injunction against a judgment on a mortgage made by him, and proceedings thereon, on the ground that part of the property belongs to the ward, and an infant is not estopped by action of her guardian, in the judgment against the guardian personally. Eagan v. Bell, 18 La. Ann. 508.

So, a ward may obtain an injunction against distribution of funds belonging to her and reclaim the same from a creditor of a guardian who has acquired the same with notice of the ward's title, even though another pending petition to set aside the decree has been filed in that case. Alspaugh v. Adams, 80 Ga. 345.

And a sale of personal property on an execution from a state court will be enjoined by a state court to protect a lien under Ga. act 1799, providing for the security of orphans and trust estates, where the lien is pending in the Federal court. Read v. Dewa, R. M. Charit. (Ga.) 365.

Where the cestui que trust loaned trust money and obtained a judgment thereon in his own name, the execution and collection of the same will be enjoined at the instance of the trustee in order to protect the trust. Reeser v. Reeser (Pa.) 4 Cent. Rep. 51.

And an execution sale under a judgment against the husband, of property held in trust for the debtor and wife for life with remainder to their children will be enjoined as a cloud on the title. McCann v. Taylor, 10 Md. 418.

Or a sale of personal property held in trust for the wife, where the execution is against the husband. Pawley v. Vogel, 42 Mo. 291.

And where a widow takes the rents and profits of land under a will in trust for the children, a levy thereon under an execution against her will be enjoined. Anderson v. Crist, 113 Ind. 65.

A sale of property on an execution against a trustee individually will be enjoined at the instance of a purchaser from the trustee, where the trustee had no personal interest in the property. Hollingsworth v. Trueblood, 59 Ind. 542.

In Linton v. Mosgrove, 14 Fed. Rep. 543, it was held that a Federal court may enjoin the inequitable use of the judgment of a state court when the validity of the judgment is not thereby impaired, where complainant is the owner of the judgment under a trust, and files a bill to have the same assigned to her, and executions and levies are being made in violation of the trust and in fraud of the cestui que trust.

But a trustee attempting to enjoin a sale of trust property on execution against the trustee personally must give particulars in regard to the judgment and execution, and also sufficient particulars in regard to the nature of the title, or the injunction will be denied. Trueblood v. Hollingsworth, 48 Ind. 532.

And a trustee under a naked trust cannot enjoin an execution sale levied upon property of a cestui que trust who is not a party to the suit. Johnson v. Connecticut Bank, 21 Conn. 148.

And the remedy of filing a notice of pendency of action, to protect a trust, to prevent a disposition of property having been exercised against a solvent assignee of judgments, it is sufficient, without enjoining such judgments or foreclosure sale. Stevenson v. Fayerweather, 21 How. Pr. 449.

XL In favor of or against executors and administrators.

a. English decisions.

1. To obtain equal distribution of assets.

The English rule appears to be, that where a creditor of the estate has not obtained his judgment at law prior to the decree for distribution, he will be restrained by injunction in order to protect the assets of the estate. In a few of the cases under this classification will be found some that had not proceeded to judgment, but are here inserted to show the development of the English rule. In some of the cases the form of the judgment controls. Rouse v. Jones, 1 Phill. Ch. 464, 14 L. J. Ch. N. S. 4; Vernon v. Thellusson, 1 Phill. Ch. 468, 14 L. J. Ch. N. S. 83, 9 Jur. 145, 7 Jur. 563; Batcliffe v. Winch, 16 Beav. 576, 17 Jur. 566, 23 L. J. Ch. 915; Fielden v. Fielden, 1 Sim. & Stu. 255; Martin v. Martin, 1 Ves. Sr. 211; Kirby v. Barton, 8 Beav. 45; Price v. Evans, 4 Sim. 614; Lord v. Wormleighton, Jac. 148.

And injunctions were allowed in some cases which do not show whether the judgment at law or decree for distribution of assets was obtained first. Paxton v. Douglas, 8 Ves. Jr. 530; Kent v. Pickering, 5 Sim. 569.

After an administrator permitted an interlocutory judgment to be obtained, and had it set aside, obtained a month's time, and allowed another to go, and obtained a decree for an account, an injunction was granted against proceeding at law, but the executor was required to pay into court and place with the accountant general nearly all the assets. It does not appear whether the decree or judgment was obtained first. Paxton v. Douglas, supra.

And a bill filed in the same court by an annuitant was stayed, where a decree had been pronounced for a general administration, although the decree in chancery was not drawn up. Moore v. Prior, 2 Younge & C. Exch. 375, 6 L. J. Exch. N. S. 74, 1 Jur. 512.

Some cases hold that a showing of the condition of the assets is a condition precedent to the granting of the injunction. Macrae v. Smith, 2 Kay & J. 411; Vernon v. Thellusson and Paxton v. Douglas, supra; Gilpin v. Lady Southampton, 18 Ves. Jr. 499.

Some cases refuse an injunction prior to a final decree of distribution. Perry v. Phillips, 10 Ves. Jr. 24; Teague v. Richards, 11 Sim. 44, 9 L. J. Ch. N. S. 293; Rush v. Higga, 4 Ves. Jr. 633; Largan v. Bowen, 1 Sch. & Lef. 294.

Other cases refuse an injunction against proceedings by creditors where the decree for distribution was made after judgment had been obtained by the creditor against the executor.

So, where the decree of administration and for 30 L. R. A.

distribution is obtained after the judgment against the executor, or levy, an injunction will not be granted. Fowler v. Roberts, 2 Giff. 223, 6 Jur. N. S. 1189, 8 Week. Rep. 492; Ranken v. Harwood, 10 Jur. 794, 2 Phill. Ch. 22, S. P. 5 Hare, 215, 15 L. J. Ch. N. S. 446; Marriage v. Skiggs, 4 De G. & J. 4, 5 Jur. N. R. 325, 28 L. J. Ch. 433; Haly v. Barry, L. R. 8 Ch. 452, 37 L. J. Ch. 723, 16 Week. Rep. 654, 18 L. T. N. S. 491; Etheridge v. Womersley, L. R. 29 Ch. Div. 557, 54 L. J. Ch. 965, 53 L. T. N. S. 280, 33 Week. Rep. 936; Vincent v. Godson, 3 De G. & S. 717.

But see Egan v. Baldwin, and Clarke v. Earl Ormonde, infra.

But in Egan v. Baldwin, 2 Molloy, 532, 1 Hogan, 190, 12 Cond. Eng. Ch. 608, execution on a judgment by default against an executor de bonis propriis, was enjoined, where a decree for administration was obtained after such judgment, on the ground that by the decree the court obtained possession of the assets, and will not permit the executor to be sent to gaol for not paying them out, and it was held that the form of the judgment was of no consequence, nor whether it was before or after the decree. (The authorities on this question are not discussed.)

In Clarke v. Earl Ormonde, Jac. 106, it was held that where a decree has been obtained for payment of creditors, it is in the nature of a judgment for all; and the court, therefore, will not permit any particular creditor, by proceeding at law, to disturb that administration of the assets which the court in the execution of the judgment for all the creditors will decree; and it was said that even if the creditor has got a judgment before the decree, though he may come in and prove as such, he must not take out execution.

It will be noted that the form of the judgment at law in connection with the time of obtaining the decree for distribution is the controlling point in some of the cases where an injunction is sought to prevent one creditor from obtaining a preference, and to have the estate distributed. A judgment de bonis propriis means that it is to be satisfied from the property of the executor or administrator, as in case of a devastavit, or where he files a false plea of plene administravit, and then the judgment is de bonis testatoris, et si non, de bonis propriis. A judgment de bonis testatoris is one against the goods of the decedent.

Injunctions were refused against proceedings on judgments de bonis propriis. Brook v. Skinner, 2 Meriv. 481, note; Kent v. Pickering, 5 Sim. 569; Burles v. Popplewell, 10 Sim. 383; Lee v. Park, 1 Keen, 714, 6 L. J. Ch. N. S. 93; Etheridge v. Womersley, supra; Terrewest v. Featherby, 2 Meriv. 489.

But see Vernon v. Thellusson; Rouse v. Jones; and Morrice v. Bank of England, infra.

So an injunction will not be granted against the enforcement of a judgment of a county court by imprisonment against a sole executrix personally, where the creditor obtained such judgment previous to the administration order, but the court ordered payment to such creditor by the receiver of the estate, without prejudice to the question whether the executrix should be allowed the payment. Etheridge v. Womersley, supra.

And in Brook v. Skinner, supra, it was held that if the plaintiff at law recovered a judgment against an executor de bonis testatoris an execution would not be allowed on such a judgment; but if a judgment was recovered de bonis propriis, the court could not restrain the execution. But this case was criticised in Vernon v. Thellusson, infra.

And where the executors pleaded, in an action of law, that there was a decree for administration, instead of applying for an injunction, and the plea was bad and judgment given for plaintiff, the court restrained the use of the judgment against the assets, but not against the administrator personally, on the ground that if a judgment is recovered de bonis testatoris, et si non, de bonis propriis, the court would not protect the executor from personal liability. Burles v. Popplewell, supra.

And an injunction was granted restraining an execution against assets on a judgment de bonis testatoris, et si non, de bonis propriis, but not restraining proceedings against the executor personally, where a decree had been obtained for administration. Kent v. Pickering, supra.

And where a judgment had been obtained against an executor de bonis testatoris, et si non, de bonis propriis, by default, an injunction was refused on application of the executors, where no satisfactory account was given of the assets, although a decree was afterwards obtained for administration, but to which decree the judgment creditors were not parties, as the executors by allowing judgment by default admitted assets. Lee v. Park, supra.

In Terwest v. Featherby, supra, an injunction was refused against restraining a creditor from proceeding at law upon a verdict which would entitle him to a judgment de bonis propriis against an executor, as the judgment would be of no service if the creditor were delayed by a suit until it could be ascertained whether there are assets of the testator to answer his demands, which might not be until after all chance of recovering against the executor de bonis propriis is gone. This case was criticised and authority denied in Vernon v. Thellusson, infra.

In an action by a creditor against an heir who pleaded a false plea, an injunction was granted against an execution against the assets, at the instance of another judgment creditor, where the decree was prior to the judgment, but not from proceeding against the heir personally. Price v. Evans, 4 Sim. 514.

But in Vernon v. Thellusson, 1 Phill. Ch. 406, 14 L. J. Ch. N. S. 83, 9 Jur. 145, 7 Jur. 503, it was held that after a decree for administration an injunction will be granted against proceedings on a writ of sci. fa. against the executor, by a creditor having a judgment against decedent, although the executor had pleaded plene administravit. But a showing of the assets was required, and the authority of Terwest v. Featherby and Brook v. Skinner, supra, is denied.

And where a verdict had been obtained against an administrator on a plea of plene administravit propter and for costs de bonis propriis, and a decree for administration rendered pending the action, an injunction was granted against the creditor proceeding on the judgment on the payment of the costs by the administrator. Lord v. Wormleighton, Jac. 148.

After a decree for administration, proceedings against an heir, by a bond creditor of the estate, were enjoined, although the heir had pleaded at law riens per descent, and although, if such plea was false, the creditor would have been entitled to judgment de bonis propriis. Rouse v. Jones, 1 Phill. Ch. 464, 14 L. J. Ch. N. S. 4.

Or where the administrator had pleaded a false plea at law to gain time to apply for a decree of distribution. Fielden v. Fielden, 1 Sim. & Stu. 255.

In Morrice v. Bank of England, Cas. L. Talb. 217, affirmed in 2 Bro. P. C. 466, where several judgments had been obtained against the executrix de bonis propriis, and also decrees for the payment of certain creditors, on a bill filed to have equal distribution of assets, it was held that a decree was of the same dignity as a judgment, and that a decree creditor had priority over a creditor who had not obtained a judgment, and a judgment de bonis propriis would be restrained, for, unless enjoined, the executrix would have to pay the same out of her own pocket, and a reference of the matter was made to a master to take an account and to pay off the decrees and judgments according to their priorities.

Where the judgment is de bonis testatoris, there is some conflict of decisions as to granting injunctions against proceedings under the same.

As, where the judgment was against the executor de bonis testatoris, and a decree for administration was immediately made in a creditor's suit for administration, the judgment connotes the executor upon the question of assets, where there is no showing made of any other liability by judgment, and an injunction was refused. Vincent v. Godson, 8 De G. & S. 717.

And an injunction was refused where a fi. fa. had been issued before the debtor died, and after his death a suggestion was entered on the record entitling the creditor to an execution against the executrix, obtaining a charging order nisi upon shares belonging to the debtor, although after the order nisi was entered, and on the same day, a decree was made for the administration of the estate, as the charging order, when made absolute, operates from the making of the order nisi. Haly v. Barry, L. R. 8 Ch. 452, 37 L. J. Ch. 723, 16 Week. Rep. 654, 18 L. T. N. S. 491.

In Drewry v. Thacker, 8 Swanst. 546, it is questioned whether on a bill filed for administration of assets the court will restrain proceedings on a judgment obtained by a creditor against a personal representative who had admitted assets and confessed judgment.

But injunctions were allowed against proceedings on judgments de bonis testatoris, in Brook v. Skinner, 2 Meriv. 481, note; Burles v. Popplewell, 10 Sim. 888; Kent v. Pickering, 5 Sim. 569; Price v. Evans, 4 Sim. 514.

In Desborough v. Adlard, 2 Swanst. 234, note, an injunction was refused against a judgment at law obtained on a plea of ne unques executor because this plea must needs be contrary to his own knowledge.

In Cryer v. Goodhand, and another case, referred to in Robinson v. Bell, 2 Vern. 146, verdicts obtained against executors on pleas of ne unques executor were set aside in equity where it was shown that the only assets were goods of very little value, as chimney backs or a few pots of ale.

2. Foreign administrators and executors.

The levy of an execution on lands in the hands of a foreign administrator was enjoined at the instance of an heir where no administrator had been appointed at the place where the injunction had been applied for. Grant v. McDonald, 5 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 468.

And an injunction was granted against collecting a judgment in Scotland, against an heir, from personality in the hands of the executors, where the decedent was domiciled in England and the executors had obtained a decree in England for the administration of the assets, as it was absolutely necessary to have an account taken before the share of the heir can be ascertained. Baillie v. Baillie, L. R. 5 Eq. 175.

But in Carron Iron Co. v. MacLaren, 5 H. L. Cas. 416, reversing MacLaren v. Stainton, 15 Eng. L. & Eq. 600, 23 L. J. Ch. 274, 18 Beav. 279, an injunction was refused, where a Scotch corporation had agents in England, and a large stockholder died domiciled in England, where he was an agent for the company, leaving a will appointing executors in both countries, and the will was probated in England, and such of the executors as thought fit to apply were confirmed by the Scotch court, and an order for administration was made in England, and after such order proceedings were taken against the real and personal estate in Scotland, and it was questioned whether an injunction could have been enforced by simply giving notice to the company's agent in England.

And where a creditor in Scotland refused to discontinue his action there, on notice of a decree obtained in England for a settlement of the estate, as his debt was barred in England by limitation, but not in Scotland, but offered to submit to the injunction so far as it went to restrain execution, he was required to pay the costs of the application. Graham v. Maxwell, 1 Maon. & G. 71, 1 Hall & Tw. 427, 18 L. J. Ch. N. S. 225, 13 Jur. 217.

S. Costs.

A creditor proceeding at law against an executor, after a decree, was allowed his costs previous to the notice of the decree, but not his costs of the motion to enjoin. Anonymous, 2 Sim. & Stu. 424. To the same effect, Hayward v. Constable, 3 Younge & C. Exch. 43; Gardner v. Garrett, 20 Beav. 460. See Graham v. Maxwell, 1 Maon. & G. 71, 1 Hall & Tw. 427, 18 L. J. Ch. N. S. 225, 13 Jur. 217.

Where an administrator did not rest on the decree of administration but appeared to the action at law, the court awarded the creditor the costs at law and the costs of the motion for injunction, and required the assets to be brought into court, and then allowed the injunction. Turner v. Connor, 15 Sim. 630.

And in Jones v. Jones, 5 Sim. 673, it was held the creditor was entitled to costs of the motion made by an executor after decree, to obtain an injunction against proceeding at law.

But after notice of a decree to account, a creditor proceeding at law against an executor is in contempt, and on motion for an injunction the creditor would be refused costs of the further proceedings at law, and the costs of the application. Jones v. Brain, 2 Younge & C. Ch. Cas. 170; Curry v. Bowyer, 3 Madd. 456.

b. American decisions.

1. To obtain equal distribution of assets.

Some courts have granted injunctions to protect an equal distribution of assets, and to prevent one creditor from obtaining an undue preference, by reason of his judgment against a personal representative. Thompson v. Brown, 4 Johns. Ch. 619; Brooks v. Dent, 4 Md. Ch. 473; Haydon v. Goode, 4 Hen. & M. 460; Rogers v. King, 3 Paige, 210; Bollman v. Warner, 38 S. C. 464; Williams v. Benedict, 49 U. S. 8 How. 107, 12 L. ed. 1007; Lyles v. Halton, 6 Gill & J. 122; Miller v. Rice, 1 Rand. (Va.) 433; Pendleton v. Stuart, 5 Munf. 377; Pickett v. Stewart, 1 Rand. (Va.) 478 (Appendix); Royall v. Johnson, 1 Rand. (Va.) 421 (dictum).

In Re City Bank, 10 Paige, 378, and in McKay v. Green, 3 Johns. Ch. 55, the question was not decided.

Some of the above cases were on the ground that, after a decree for an accounting against an executor or administrator and for disclosure of assets, an injunction will be granted to prevent the collection of claims by creditors at law. Thompson v. Brown; Brooks v. Dent, and Rogers v. King,—supra.

Other cases do not make this distinction, but protect the estate, as where the sale would endanger the collection of other claims not in the judgment, where a large part of the estate has been taken from the administrator without objection, and there are other debts. Bollman v. Warner, 38 S. C. 464.

Or where the judgment did not entitle the plaintiff to a prior lien under the laws of Mississippi. Williams v. Benedict, 49 U. S. 8 How. 107, 12 L. ed. 1007.

Or where the order allowing a claim was made without notice to the executor, and he had no remedy by appeal or certiorari, where the claim is attacked as fraudulent and without consideration. Propst v. Meadows, 18 Ill. 157.

So, a judgment in favor of a distributee of an estate was enjoined in part, on the ground that a suit had been filed against the executor for a large sum, and the distributee was liable for contribution. Lyles v. Halton, 6 Gill & J. 122.

And an injunction was granted in favor of an heir who was also an administrator, against the collection of judgment on his paying out, as heir, a pro rata equal to what has already been paid to some bond creditors, and the injunction was then continued until assets were obtained sufficient, which could be shown by a scire facias. Haydon v. Goode, 4 Hen. & M. 460.

In Re City Bank, 10 Paige, 378, it was said that after final decree for distribution of a fund in the hands of personal representatives, for the benefit of all creditors, the court may enjoin a creditor from proceeding at law to enforce his claim after he has made his election to proceed in the chancery court under the decree.

In McKay v. Green, 3 Johns. Ch. 55, the question as to whether on a bill against a personal representative to account an injunction would be granted against creditors proceeding at law, is not decided.

Where judgments were confessed by an executor under the belief that there were ample assets, but owing to an unexpected depreciation the assets proved inadequate, and counsel had withdrawn from the case at the time of trial, an injunction was granted, and an account ordered of legal assets and priorities of debts. Miller v. Rice, 1 Rand. (Va.) 433. To the same effect, Pendleton v. Stuart, 5 Munf. 377.

Or where the executor was unable to plead at law owing to the state of the assets, where the judgment was obtained probably contrary to justice, without fault of the executor. Pickett v. Stewart, 1 Rand. (Va.) 478 (Appendix).

And where a showing was made that there had been sufficient assets to pay the debts, but that a large part had been taken from him by paramount title, an injunction was granted. Royall v. Johnson, 1 Rand. (Va.) 421.

But an injunction was refused against the enforcement of judgments against the administrator on the ground of depreciation of assets, which arose from the fact that the administrator had not used due diligence. Weakley v. Gurley, 60 Ala. 399.

Or for insufficiency of assets, where the judgment was entered on confession. Brenner v. Alexander, 15 Or. 349.

Or where no defense was made against the judgment. Lafon v. Desessart, 1 Mart. N. S. 71.

And anticipated further liabilities will not be sufficient to obtain an injunction in the absence of new matters arising since the judgment. Brown v. Wilson, 56 Ga. 534.

And a levy upon real estate of an estate will not be enjoined at the instance of an executor, where the time of settlement has long since expired, and where the delay would shield the property from the collection of this claim. Johnson v. Connecticut Bank, 21 Conn. 148.

And an execution sale for a mechanic's lien will not be enjoined on the ground that there are claims against the property which will depreciate the sale. Robinson v. Thompson, 30 Ga. 363.

And under Mont. Comp. Stat. 5th div. § 1379, providing that persons not made parties to a mechanics' lien action shall not be bound by such proceedings, an injunction to restrain a sale under a decree foreclosing a mechanics' lien will not lie at the suit of an administrator who claimed that the decedent was the owner and that the parties to the action never had any interest in the property. McCormick v. Riddell, 10 Mont. 467.

And an executor who had purchased land belonging to the estate is not entitled to an injunction against the sale of such land on judgments against the estate, on the ground that such judgments were irregularly obtained, as the remedy at law by writ of error prevents injunction; and it was held there was no error and the land should be sold. Eyster's Appeal, 55 Pa. 473.

lien that the property is his individually, an injunction will not be granted in favor of the former against an execution sale by the latter of property that might belong to the estate. Ray v. Ray, Coop. Ch. 284.

And an oral agreement not to hold the administrator personally will not be allowed to change the effect of subsequent judgments, or entitle the administrator to an injunction. Weakley v. Gurley, 60 Ala. 399.

4. Judgments in favor of administrators or executors.

The release of the sureties of an administratrix will not authorize an injunction against an execution on a debt of the succession, as she is entitled to collect the same until removed from office. Norris v. Fristoe, 8 La. Ann. 646.

And the heir of an estate is not entitled to an injunction against proceedings to collect a judgment which he claims belongs to the estate, and which judgment was transferred by the administratrix to another party before her final settlement, where no attempt is made to impeach the final settlement. Grayson v. Wilson, 27 Miss. 553.

5. Sale to pay debts.

An injunction will be granted against final process, or a sale of property of the estate to pay debts, where the complainant has a superior equity or such sale is unnecessary, but will not be granted where there are other remedies equally available.

A purchaser of land from heirs is entitled to an injunction against a sale under an order of the probate court to pay the debts, where the administrator had sufficient personal assets to pay all debts which were wasted. Banks v. Speers (Ala.) 16 So. Rep. 25.

And a purchaser of land at a sheriff's sale on a judgment against a decedent is entitled to an injunction against a sale subsequently ordered by the probate court of the same land on a debt against the estate barred by limitation. Moody v. Harper, 38 Miss. 599.

Or against a decree of a probate court granting the widow dower in the same land, where her claim of dower has been barred by limitation. Ibid.

And an injunction will be granted against a sale to pay debts under an order of probate court, where the administrator has been guilty of unreasonable delay for twelve years, and the right to appear and contest the order in the probate court will not prevent. Gunby v. Brown, 86 Mo. 253.

And will be granted against the sale of realty ordered by the county court, where the distributees come into chancery asking for an account, where alone it can be taken, and the propriety of the sale of the land determined and the rights of all the parties adjusted. Finger v. Finger, 64 N. C. 158.

So, the holder of a perfect deed made by decedent may have injunction against a sale of the property as the property of the vendor's succession, under an order of sale provoked by his administratrix. Thompson v. Herring, 45 La. Ann. 991.

And a sale of the estate ordered by a court of ordinary will be enjoined, where there are no debts, and the real estate can be divided in kind, although an appeal has been taken from a refusal of the ordinary to revoke the order of sale, and the appeal withdrawn on an alleged agreement to forego the sale of all but one lot, as Ga. Code, § 2216, 2443, provide that a sale of real estate shall not be ordered except when necessary to pay debts. McCook v. Pond, 72 Ga. 150.

Although an injunction will not be granted to a purchaser at a void probate sale against a suit in ejectment by the heirs, the execution of the judgment may be enjoined on the ground that his money has paid off debts of the estate, for which he should have a lien on the land. Hill v. Billingsly, 53 Miss. 111.

But an injunction will not be granted against the distribution of an estate in a county court after a sale, where such court has jurisdiction to grant relief. Parke v. Gilbert, 1 Bart. 97.

And the sale of personal property to pay debts will not be enjoined where there is a remedy at law of trespass or trover. Howell v. Howell, 5 Ired. Eq. 258.

In order to restrain the execution of an order of sale to pay debts of an estate, the heir opposing must allege and also prove that the debts do not exist. Lehman v. Worley, 40 La. Ann. 620.

And an injunction against a judgment of a court of ordinary, granting the administrator leave to make a sale, will not be allowed without alleging some special reason. Sanders v. Slaughter, 39 Ga. 34.

Damages should not be awarded against an absent defendant or curator ad hoc, acting conscientiously, where an injunction is obtained by him against a sale under a sale bond taken by an administratrix, and the injunction is dissolved. Cobb v. Richardson, 30 La. Ann. 1228.

XII. In favor of assignee for creditors.

Where the lien of the execution is prior to the right of the assignee for creditors, an injunction will not be granted to prevent a sale, or where there is an adequate remedy at law, but will be granted where such remedy is necessary to protect the property for the creditors.

So, where the title does not pass to the assignee for creditors until the recording of the assignment, an execution issued against the assignor before the recording of the assignment will not be enjoined. Forkner v. Shafer, 56 Ind. 120; New v. Kleissner, Id. 118.

And under Cal. insolvent act, § 4, authorizing an order prohibiting the payment of debts and delivery of property belonging to a debtor for his use, an injunction will not be granted against the sale under an execution which was levied before insolvency proceedings were commenced. Vermont Marble Co. v. San Francisco City & County Super. Ct. 99 Cal. 579.

And Ind. Rev. Stat. § 2911, providing that a holder of a lien on assigned property must exhaust his lien before receiving any of the fund assigned for creditors, implies his right to make a sale, and a subsequent assignee is not entitled to an injunction against the same. Ades v. Levi, 137 Ind. 506.

And an injunction against a sale on execution against the assignor was refused on the ground of a remedy at law for damages or claim and delivery. Chittenden v. Davidson, 20 Jones & S. 421.

Or a remedy at law to recover the value of the goods from the sheriff. Drewson v. American Surety Co. 22 N. Y. Week. Dig. 562.

Where a judgment was rendered the day before an assignment for creditors by the debtor, and a levy was made after the assignment and set aside as contempt of court, the judgment was reversed on the ground that a creditor has a right to contest title by levy of execution. Davis v. Michener, 106 Pa. 385.

But, where judgment was obtained against the assignor after an assignment, an execution sale was enjoined as a cloud on title at the suit of the assignee, where the creditor assented to the assignment and the levy was not made on the interest of the debtor, but upon the whole property. Wilhoit v. Cunningham, 87 Cal. 453.

And under Md. act 1805, chap. 110, § 7, providing that the trustee in insolvency shall sell the property, and pay all judgments and liens, but no lien shall attach unless levy is made prior to insolvency proceedings, an injunction will be granted against sales on execution against the debtor, in order to allow the trustee to administer the fund, and the lien will be protected. Alexander v. Ghiselin, 5 Gill, 138.

An injunction was granted against a judgment directed specifically against certain land, void because it was for a mechanic's lien, and the debtor had made an assignment for creditors before the suit was filed, and the assignee was not a party, as it will be a cloud on the title and the property is in the custody of the law. Quinby v. Slipper, 7 Wash. 473.

And sales under successive levies of executions were enjoined at the instance of an assignee for creditors where it was impossible to tell what part of the property was seized under each particular execution, as the New York statute of 1883, requiring the court to approve indemnifying bonds, which released the sheriff from all liability, rendered the remedy at law uncertain. Newcombe v. Irving Nat. Bank, 51 Hun, 220.

And a general creditor is entitled to an injunction against a levy by another creditor after the county court has acquired jurisdiction of an insolvent estate and as the county court cannot grant an injunction the circuit court may; and the statute requiring a bond as condition precedent to an injunction will not authorize a dissolution for want of a bond, as this case is not within the spirit of that statute, although it may be within the letter of the same; and failure to attach a copy of the sworn claim will not be cause for dissolution. Scarlett v. Hicks, 13 Fla. 314.

Where a judgment creditor levied on property in defiance of an assignment for creditors, and an injunction was obtained against the sale, the officer was held to be a necessary party to the injunction suit, and being a citizen of that state prevented a removal of the cause to the Federal court. Nye v. Nightingale, 6 R. I. 499.

As to injunctions in insolvency proceedings against suits in foreign states, see note to Thorndike v. Thorndike (Ill.) 21 L. R. A. 71.

XIII. In favor of or against lien creditors.

a. Mortgagees of chattels.

There is some conflict of authority as to the right of a chattel mortgagee to obtain an injunction against the sale of chattels, some cases affirming the right on the ground of preventing multiplicity of suits or to protect a trust, some denying the right where the lien is not superior to the lien of the execution, and some on the ground that there is a remedy of trespass or trover, and some deny the right on the particular statute involved.

A levy under a mortgage à fa., on certain goods not the same as those described in the mortgage was enjoined, where the power to grant an injunction in such a case was not denied. Lanier v. Adams, 72 Ga. 145.

An injunction against a sale under an attachment of chattels will be granted at the instance of a chattel mortgagee who files a suit to foreclose his mortgage where there is a dispute as to the title, as if allowed to be sold the goods would be distributed to many persons, and multiplicity of suits will be prevented by injunction, and a receiver will be appointed. Wiedemann v. Sann (N. J.) 31 Atl. Rep. 211, distinguishing Moore v. Diamant, 41 N. J. Eq. 612. In that case a party claimed under a bill of sale and an injunction was refused, and the question was as to which person had the title. A bond was given by the claimant, and it was held that the rights of the parties could be determined by virtue of the bond. In this case a bond was offered by the auditor, but he proposed to sell the goods; and it is held that such a sale by the auditor would cause a sacrifice of the goods owing to a dispute of the title. The remedy of replevin was suggested as a ground for denying the injunction, but was not discussed.

And the same rule was applied in Stratton v. Packard (N. J.) 13 Cent. Rep. 104.

An injunction in favor of a chattel mortgagee to prevent a sale of the goods to be made by an assignee for creditors of a mortgagor, under an order of another court, is not an illegal interference with the other court, where the mortgagee has priority, and the security will be impaired, as Ind. Rev. Stat., 1894, § 2911, provides that where property has been assigned to pay debts, the holder of a lien must exhaust the same before participating in the assets of the general fund, thus implying his right to disregard the assignment. Ades v. Levi, 137 Ind. 508.

But an injunction against an execution sale will not be granted where the lien of the same is superior to the chattel mortgage. Warner v. Paine, 3 Barb. Ch. 680.

And under Tex. Rev. Stat. § 2293, providing that chattels mortgaged may be levied on and sold subject to the mortgage, an execution sale of the same will not be enjoined. George v. Dyer, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 780.

And the remedy of a mortgagee by third opposition to claim the proceeds of sale, prevents an injunction against the sale for irregularities. James v. Breaux, 26 La. Ann. 245.

Or a remedy in trespass or trover. Miller v. Crews, 2 Leigh, 578.

Or where there is a remedy at law by an action of damages, although complainant might not be able to maintain replevin. La Mothe v. Fink, 3 Biss. 463.

So, a mortgagee of personal property foreclosing his mortgage and attempting to enjoin by another suit a sale on execution, or one ordered by a probate court, has a remedy at law for possession under his mortgage, in the absence of any showing of irreparable damages, and he might have had a receiver appointed in his foreclosure suit, and then obtained a restraining order against any interference, but he is not entitled to an injunction in a separate suit. Stillwell v. Oliver, 35 Ark. 184.

And an injunction will not be granted where complainant has only a lien by virtue of an encumbrance which is fraudulent, and he can require the sheriff to take an indemnifying bond. Bowyer v. Creigh, 3 Rand. (Va.) 25.

And a lien creditor cannot enjoin an execution sale of personal property where he would have a lien on the proceeds. Rollins v. Hess, 27 W. Va. 570.

b. Mortgages of real property.

An injunction will be granted to protect a mortgage on real estate against an execution sale, where extraneous evidence is necessary, or his lien is doubtful or in danger of being impaired. But where the lien of the mortgage will not be affected by the sale, or complainant is affected by notice of fraud, an injunction will not be granted.

A sale under an execution, about to be made without an appraisal as required by statute, will be enjoined at the instance of a junior mortgagee. Robertson v. Travis, 4 La. Ann. 151.

And where a creditor having a deed which is a mortgage conveyed the land back to his grantor and took a mortgage at the same time, he will not lose his lien, and a sale under the junior judgment as a cloud upon the title will be enjoined. Christie v. Hale, 46 Ill. 117.

So, if a purchase-money mortgage has a priority over a judgment lien, which can only be established by matters outside of the record, a sale under the judgment will be enjoined. Plumb v. Bay, 18 Kan. 415.

A purchase-money note under a title bond gives a vendor's lien in Mississippi, and the assignor of such note before a deed is made, is entitled to an injunction against a levy of an execution against the purchaser where a deed was afterwards made. Parker v. Kelly, 10 Smedes & M. 184.

And where a senior mortgagee takes a conveyance from the mortgagor to save costs, a sale at law of the same property under a junior judgment will be enjoined where the holder of the same claims that the lien of the former had been lost by merger, and the junior judgment creditor's lien will be restricted to the equity of redemption. Richardson v. Hockenbush, 85 Ill. 124.

And a party advancing money to a corporation to acquire title to land, and taking the title in himself for security of the money advanced, and levying upon that land for his debt, is entitled to an injunction against the payment of the proceeds to the holder of a senior execution against the company. Gist v. Davis, 2 Hill, Eq. 385, 20 Am. Dec. 89.

In Mallory v. Dauber, 58 Ky. 239, where a purchaser of land acquired a mortgage of $15,000, for $6,000, on the land and had it released, and obtained an injunction against a sale on execution which was inferior to the mortgage, he was only entitled to a lien of $6,000 as against the judgment. The injunction should not have been granted, as Ky. Civil Code, § 285, provides that an injunction can only be granted against a judgment in the court rendering judgment; but having failed to dissolve the injunction, the supreme court will not reverse for that error alone, in order to allow a recovery of nominal damages.

And a sale under attachment will be enjoined at the instance of a party claiming to have a prior mortgage on the same land, and that said mortgage had been released without authority, and that the release was void, as it would be a cloud upon his title and his rights depend upon facts which must be established by evidence outside of the record. Ivory v. Kempner, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 474.

Under N. C. act 1893, chap. 6, providing for an action against a person claiming an interest in real property adverse to plaintiff, to determine the claims, an injunction against subsequent judgment creditors selling the land will be granted at the instance of a mortgagee, where the damages by a sale of part of the land by execution and the effect upon the sale under the mortgage would be irreparable. British & American Mortg. Co. v. Long, 118 N. C. 123.

And an injunction will be granted restraining the defendant from disposing of machinery, which a creditor bought on execution sale against the mortgagor, where an appeal is taken from a judgment holding it liable to execution sale, and the complainant is foreclosing a mortgage on a factory including the machinery. Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Semple, 38 N. J. Eq. 314.

A mortgagee will be restrained from selling the equity of redemption of mortgaged premises under judgments in satisfaction of the mortgage deed, as it would deter outside debtors from purchasing, by the confusion it would occasion as to the effect of the amount of the bid upon the amount of encumbrances. Van Mater v. Conover, 18 N. J. Eq. 38; Severns v. Woolston, 4 N. J. Eq. 220.

But, an injunction should not be granted to the owners of property against a sale on execution of boilers separate from the land, which are claimed to be fixtures, where the judgment was with vendor's privilege on the boilers, and the lien on the boilers had been determined in a judgment, and they can be removed without injury to the building. Lapene v. McCann, 28 La. Ann. 749.

And an injunction will not be granted against an execution sale, where plaintiffs in the injunction had canceled their mortgage on the property, and were not the owners of the property, for if their mortgage still continued their lien remained, and if they had no lien the sale could not injure them. Smith v. Hoey, 28 La. Ann. 95.

And a mortgagee will not be enjoined at the instance of the debtor from selling property of the debtor other than that covered by the mortgage, 30 L. R. A.

on an execution issued on the judgment. Cobb v. Hynes, 4 La. Ann. 150.

And an injunction will not be granted against an execution in favor of persons who have advanced the purchase money for property, unless upon a repayment of such money. Griesinger v. Booth, 13 Lanc. L. Rev. 259.

In Louisiana a party having a mortgage or privilege against the property cannot obtain an injunction against an execution sale, as La. Code Pr. art. 300, provides that the sheriff may be enjoined from paying to the seizing creditors the proceeds of the property seized. Gill v. Her Husband, 10 Rob. (La.) 28; Vanbille v. Her Husband, 5 Rob. (La.) 496; Marrot v. Ferriere, 18 La. Ann. 665.

And privileges or liens on property seized do not entitle an injunction against the sale of the property, as the sale will be made subject to all privileges. Hebert v. Babin, 6 Mart. N. S. 614.

And the same was held under La. Code Pr. Arts. 679-683, requiring that property exposed to sale by the sheriff shall be sold subject to all privileges and mortgages. Casson v. Louisiana State Bank, 7 Mart. N. S. 377; Bludworth v. Lambeth, 9 Rob. (La.) 256.

And a mortgagee is not entitled to an injunction, on the ground that an execution sale of the mortgaged property is being made irregularly without being subdivided, as he has a remedy by third opposition to claim the proceeds of sale. James v. Breaux, 26 La. Ann. 245.

In Citizens' Bank v. Bailey, 28 La. Ann. 771, it was held that a prior mortgagee would not be affected by a sale under a junior judgment. The statement of the case is that the sale was enjoined at the instance of the bank holding a prior mortgage, and that the judgment was affirmed; but it evidently is a mistake in the statement and from the opinion it must be taken that the case was affirmed after the injunction was refused.

The holder of a deed intended to be a mortgage is not entitled to an injunction against an execution sale against his grantor on the ground that the same is not a lien against him, for if so it is not a cloud upon his title, and the purchaser can acquire only the interest of the judgment debtor. Purdy v. Irwin, 18 Cal. 860.

And a mortgagee or grantee, who is liable for contribution to pay off a prior judgment on the land, is not entitled to an injunction against the sale of his property on an execution against his grantor, until the amount to be contributed by the defendant and other purchasers shall have been ascertained. Massie v. Wilson, 16 Iowa, 390.

And a mortgagee is not entitled to enjoin a sale on an execution under a junior judgment on the ground that the holder of the same claimed that it was prior to the mortgage; and the dictum in Ruthven Bros. v. Mast, infra, refusing an injunction because it was not alleged that the owners of the judgment claimed that they had any right to sell except subject to the prior lien of the mortgagee, does not affect this case. Ramsdell v. Tama Water-Power Co., 84 Iowa, 484.

In Ruthven Bros. v. Mast, 55 Iowa, 715, a party acquiring a prior mortgage was refused an injunction against an execution sale against the mortgagor on the ground that the creditor had a right to sell the interest of the mortgagor in the property subject to the mortgage, and the complainants' lien would not be affected, and the complainants are not entitled to a decree requiring the sale to be made subject to their rights, as they do not allege that the creditors claimed to sell in any other way. See preceding case.

And one who is a party to a suit of foreclosure and a junior lienholder cannot enjoin a sale where he claims a former lien was satisfied, as he has a remedy by motion in the same court. Ketchum v. Crippen, 37 Cal. 223.

And a purchaser of the equity of redemption with notice, subject to a mortgage fraudulent as to creditors, is not entitled to an injunction against the execution of a judgment subsequently obtained against his grantor. Farmers' Bank v. Douglass, 11 Smodes & M. 469.

As to rights of purchaser under a mortgage foreclosure, see supra, XIII. d; Austin v. Bowman; Weed v. Bowman; Sharpe v. Tatnall; and Reagan v. Van Evans, infra.

c. Attachment creditors.

A party having a prior attachment is entitled to an injunction against a sale under a subsequent attachment or judgment that would deprive them of their lien. Porter v. Pico, 55 Cal. 165; Northfield Knife Co. v. Shapleigh, 24 Neb. 635; Erskine v. Staley, 12 Leigh, 406; Moore v. Holt, 10 Gratt. 284.

And attaching creditors are entitled to an injunction against a sale under a subsequent execution until the priorities are determined. Northfield Knife Co. v. Shapleigh, supra.

Illinois attachment act, § 39, providing that the court may require the proceeds obtained in attachment to be paid into court, and to make all orders concerning the same which it shall deem just, changes the rule in that state that an attaching creditor has no right to obtain an injunction before judgment, and the proceeds of execution sales attached will be retained to try the priority of attachment claims over judgment liens. Kuh, N. & F. Co. v. Oppenheim (Ill.) 9 Nat. Corp. Rep. 187, 27 Chicago Legal News, 61.

A wife is entitled to an injunction against a sale of her property on attachment against her husband, where a bond was given by the husband which dissolved the attachment, and such sale would be a cloud on her title. O'Hare v. Downing, 130 Mass. 16.

But a sale under attachment of the wife's land for the debt of her husband will not be enjoined where it would not cloud her title, and extraneous evidence would not be necessary. Rea v. Longstreet, 54 Ala. 291.

And a sale under attachment will not be enjoined at the instance of a junior attaching creditor in the absence of some grounds of equitable relief. Domee v. Stearns, 30 Cal. 114.

d. Judgment creditors.

An injunction will be granted in favor of a judgment creditor or a purchaser thereunder, against a sale by another judgment creditor, where there is danger of the lien being impaired owing to a conflict of liens, or controversy as to the property affected, or where complainant's lien is superior. But if the lien of the judgment creditor will not be affected, or if his lien is inferior, or if his lien attaches to the proceeds of the sale, he will not be entitled to an injunction.

And so a sheriff's deed will be canceled and the holders enjoined from asserting title under it, at the instance of a party holding title that is superior under another sheriff's deed. Lick v. Ray, 43 Cal. 52.

The purchaser under a foreclosure sale of a mortgage which is prior to a judgment is entitled to have an execution levy under the judgment enjoined where there was no fraud. Austin v. Bowman, 31 Iowa, 277; Weed v. Bowman, 33 Iowa, 762.

And equity will restrain a sale of land on execution where such sale creates a cloud upon the title, although no title would pass thereby, where the owner purchased under a mortgage foreclosure, which sale extinguished the lien of the defendants in the equity suit. Sharpe v. Tatnall, 5 Del. Ch. 302.

And a purchaser at an execution sale under several judgments may have an injunction against a second execution levy under one of the same judgments, which was fraudulent. Ragland v. Cantrell, 49 Ala. 294.

And in a similar case, where the holders of the executions agreed that the property should be sold at that sale and the priority of liens determined against the funds, an injunction was granted against other sales on such execution by parties to such agreement. Reilly v. Miami Exporting Co. 5 Ohio, 333.

And a cloud on title will be prevented by enjoining an execution sale, where plaintiff is the owner and in possession of land under a sale under attachment which is a prior lien over defendant's judgment. Porter v. Pico, 55 Cal. 165.

And will be granted in favor of a purchaser under a sale to enforce a prior vendor's lien, who is not a party to a subsequent suit of foreclosure; but this will not prevent the right to enforce the lien against the equity of redemption if the property is of sufficient value. Reagan v. Van Evans, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 35.

Where there is a conflict of liens of the executions arising from various levies, an injunction will be granted against a sale until the rights of all the parties can be adjusted, and priority is determined, in order to prevent a sacrifice of the property. Albright v. Albright, 33 N. C. 238.

So, an injunction will be granted in favor of a junior execution, against the removal of property under a prior execution, where no sale is made thereunder, in order to protect his lien. Edgar v. Clevenger, 2 N. J. Eq. 258.

And where it is uncertain whether the holder of an execution would take nothing or one fourth of the whole property, and there was an agreement to allow the property to be sold and paid off in a certain manner, which is violated, a sale on the judgment may be enjoined at the instance of another judgment creditor. Phillips v. Walker, 43 Ga. 55.

And an injunction will be granted against an execution sale of personal property at the instance of holders of senior executions where a levy on the latter could not be made because the constable holding the property refused to surrender the same, as a court of chancery will remove the obstacle. Carrish v. Saunders, 3 Humph. 432.

Where two judgments were rendered the same day, a purchaser under one may enjoin a subsequent sale under the other, where the holder of the latter lost his mechanic's privilege by permitting the sale without appraisal, under La. Rev. Code, §§ 3223, 3238. Hoye v. Peterman, 23 La. Ann. 290.

And an execution sale under a junior judgment will be enjoined at the instance of a purchaser of the land under a senior judgment, unless the holder of the junior judgment tenders into court the amount paid by the purchaser. Barnes v. Dodge, 7 Gill, 109.

And a purchaser under a judgment may enjoin a subsequent execution sale on a prior dormant judgment revived after his purchase on the ground of clouding his title. Norton v. Beaver, 5 Ohio, 178.

But an injunction will not be granted in behalf of a lien creditor levying on personalty, where the property is subsequently seized under a levy of another lien creditor, as the common-law remedy to obtain possession is ample, and it will be presumed that the court will protect the respective priority of the lien. Endres v. Lloyd, 53 Ga. 547.

The owner of a fi. fa., where a claim has been interposed against his levy, is not entitled to an injunction against a sale under a junior levy, on the ground that it would cloud his title; and the statement in the bill that he is too poor to bid and that the purchaser would get a good title free from complainant's lien, shows that the sale should not be enjoined, for, if complainant's judgment is a lien on the land, it is a lien on the fund. Sanders v. Foster, 63 Ga. 232.

A sale of land under execution will not be enjoined at the instance of another judgment creditor where the title is in dispute, where both creditors stand in pari statu, and complainant has no superior right, although he alleges that he is unable to redeem from the other judgment for fear that it may subsequently be held void. Union Iron Works v. Bassick Min. Co. 10 Colo. 24.

Where attorneys having a lien in a decree for attorneys' fees, bought the land on an execution against the purchaser under the decree and obtained possession and sold their title, and their vendee brought a suit to enjoin the taking of possession under the decree, the demurrer to the petition should have been sustained, as the equity of the purchaser could not be subject to levy, and the lien of the attorneys could be worked out in the old suit, but the demurrer having been overruled the purchaser under the decree was not permitted to obtain possession until he discharged the lien debts of which the complainant was the owner. Whitaker v. Cornett, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 87.

An injunction will not be granted at the instance of the execution creditors against a sale of land by the sheriff holding several executions returnable to the same court, as the liens can be determined on distribution of the funds. Wiley v. Bridgman, 1 Head, 68.

Creditors having a priority of lien have no right to an injunction against a sale under a junior f. fa. where it would not affect their prior lien. Union Bank v. Poulmey, 8 Gill & J. 324.

The right to require sales under execution to be made on certain tracts or pieces of property so as to protect the priority of liens of each creditor will be protected by injunction. But where the injunction would prejudice the rights of the seizing creditor, or where there is adequate remedy at law, an injunction will not be granted.

Where a judgment debtor sells or mortgages his lands at different times to different parties, the prior purchasers are entitled to an injunction restraining an execution sale against the several tracts except according to the priorities and respective rights of each. But a purchaser under a mortgage foreclosure sale has not the same equity that the mortgagee had,—especially where the mortgaged property was more than sufficient to pay the mortgage debt; and, where the equity of redemption in such place was not sold until after other pieces were sold to others, such equity should be subjected to the general lien of a judgment against all before other tracts are sold. Moore v. Trimmer, 32 B. C. 511.

And if a creditor has a lien on two funds, and another creditor has a lien on but one of them, the former will be compelled to proceed against that fund on which the other has no lien. Compton v. Pitman, 49 Ga. 612.

But a junior encumbrancer who attempts to enjoin a sale before other property of the debtor is sold, and does not procure an appeal, but allows the sale to be made, cannot obtain relief in equity. Baine v. Williams, 10 Smodes & M. 112.

And the right to require a creditor having a lien on some land which has been sold by the debtor, to resort to the unsold part before selling the other, will not be extended so as to interfere with his lien or cause unreasonable delay. Francis v. Herren, 101 N. C. 497.

Or where the security is doubtful. Evertson v. Booth, 19 Johns. 486.

And a junior judgment creditor purchasing land under his judgment is not entitled to an injunction against an execution sale of the same on a senior execution; on the ground that a prior levy had been made on other land on the senior execution, when such prior levy had been released and it is not shown that the debtor owned such land or had any other property subject to execution than that seized. Wood v. Rice, 68 Ind. 320.

e. Mechanic's Lien.

* Mechanic's liens will be protected by enjoining sales under other judgments where the mechanic's lien is superior and in danger of being impaired by such sale, and will be protected by refusing an injunction against a sale under the lien, where such lien has priority in time and in equity, or there is another remedy at law. But an injunction will be granted against a sale under a mechanic's lien where the same has been lost, or proper parties were not made in the suit.

So, where a mechanic's lien is settled by taking the property, assuming mortgages, and releasing the lien, an execution on a judgment in an action pending at the time of a settlement and inferior to the mechanic's lien, will be enjoined, where the holder of the same is attempting to sell the property, asserting that the conveyance made to the holder of the mechanic's lien was subject to his judgment. Bowling v. Garrett, 49 Kan. 504.

And a judgment establishing a mechanic's lien against land and the building, which has been foreclosed in the interest of mortgagees, and to give their claim superiority, will be enjoined at the instance of another mechanic's lien claimant having a judgment against the building or a surplus which might arise out of the land, where a sale under 1 N. J. Rev. p. 73, § 24, would make all the liens pro rata and on the sale the priority of complainant's lien would be destroyed. Hazelhurst v. Sea Isle City Hotel Co. (N. J.), 25 Atl. Rep. 201.

And mechanic's lien men are entitled to an injunction to restrain a junior judgment creditor from removing the building upon which they have a lien, where the owner is insolvent and security is insufficient. Barber v. Reynolds, 33 Cal. 497.

And a mechanic's lien was protected by refusing an injunction against a sale thereunder, where the administrator of the debtor urged that other claims pending against the estate would depreciate the sale. Robinson v. Thompson, 30 Ga. 933.

An execution and sale under a mechanic's lien against the owner will not be enjoined at the instance of a junior creditor having a lien on the interest of the lessee. Winn v. Henderson, 63 Ga. 365.

And an injunction was refused against a sale under a mechanic's lien, although it was claimed that the owner of the property was not a party to the suit, but Mont. Comp. Stat. 5th div. § 1379, provided that in such cases the owner would not be bound by such judgment. McCormick v. Riddle, 10 Mont. 467.

But, in Quimby v. Slipper, 7 Wash. 475, where an assignment for creditors was made prior to the filing of a suit for a mechanic's lien, and the assignee was not a party to such suit, an injunction was granted against the sale.

And the same was held where the owner of property had no notice of proceedings under a mechanic's lien against a lessee, and did not contract for improvements. Houston's Appeal, 6 W. N. C. 162.

A landlord may obtain an injunction against a sale of his property under a mechanic's lien filed against his tenant. Ibid.

A sale under a mechanic's lien will be enjoined at the instance of the owner not a party to the judgment. Gates v. Ballou, 56 Iowa, 741.

Or where the owner of the lien did not deny the allegations of the bill as to payment by the debtor. Gates v. Ballou, 54 Iowa, 435.

A mechanic losing his privilege by failure to comply with La. Rev. Code, §§ 3228, 3229, as to appraisalment, will be enjoined from enforcing a sale at the instance of a purchaser. Hoy v. Peterman, 23 La. Ann. 280.

t. Landlord's Lien.

An injunction will be granted to protect a landlord's lien against an execution sale of the same property, where there is danger of the lien being lost.

Landlords' liens will be protected by enjoining distribution of proceeds of the property attached in a subordinate court, where such lien can only be protected in equity and is in danger of being lost, and the statutory remedy of attachment is only cumulative. Carmen v. Alabama Nat. Bank, 101 Ala. 189.

And an injunction against an execution sale is a proper remedy, where a landlord has a lien by distress warrant issued subsequent to the execution, but which has a priority. Click v. Stewart, 36 Tex. 280.

And where a landlord had a claim on part of the property, and a mortgage on the balance, an injunction was granted to prevent an execution sale of the property on a judgment against the tenant and mortgagor, who had only an equitable interest in the property, as an equitable estate in personal property cannot be sold under a f. fa. Martin v. Jewell, 37 Md. 580.

XIV. In favor of general creditors.

Where the judgment is not attacked, a creditor not having a lien cannot obtain an injunction against a sale under an execution.

So, creditors of an insolvent corporation cannot enjoin an execution sale on a judgment confessed, preferring a creditor, on the ground that property would be sold to more advantage by a receiver. Fairpoint Mfg. Co. v. Philadelphia Optical & Watch Co. 161 Pa. 17.

And a factor holding a bill of lading without a privilege or special instruction cannot obtain an injunction to prevent an execution sale against the shipper, as he has a remedy against the proceeds. Chaffraix v. Harper, 26 La. Ann. 23.

And a building contractor who fails to record his contract is not entitled to an injunction against a sale under mortgage foreclosure, as he has a remedy by third opposition if he had a privilege. Van Loan v. Heffner, 30 La. Ann. 1213.

A mere ordinary creditor of an estate is not entitled to enjoin a sale under a judgment obtained against some of the heirs by others on a mortgage of their interest in the estate, as the remedy is by an action of the creditor against each of the heirs to the extent of assets received. White v. Blanchard, 19 La. Ann. 69.

General creditors of a firm are not entitled to an injunction to prevent a sale of firm property. Young v. Frier, 9 N. J. Eq. 465; Mittnacht v. Smith, 17 N. J. Eq. 259, 38 Am. Dec. 233; Harvey v. First Nat. Bank, 53 N. J. Eq. 697; Greenwood v. Bradhead, 8 Barb. 503. See supra, VII.

For Attachment creditors, see supra, XIII. c.

XV. Ejectment cases.

The possession of premises will generally be protected by injunction, where complainant was not a party or a privy to the action of ejectment, or had a superior equitable title, although there are some exceptions to this rule. The cases denying an injunction do so on the ground that complainant is not affected by the judgment in ejectment.

An injunction will be granted to prevent dispossession in ejectment where complainant was not a party or privy to such suit. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. v. Cummings, 13 Mo. App. 76; Banks v. Parker, 80 N. C. 157; Stewart v. Pace, 30 Ark. 594; Moulton v. McDermott, 35 Cal. 600.

Notwithstanding a remedy of damages against the sheriff. Williamson v. Russell, 18 W. Va. 612.

And the execution of a judgment in ejectment will be enjoined at the instance of the beneficial owner in possession, who had no notice of the suit and was not a party, as Mo. Rev. Stat. § 2247, provides that to entitle a recovery in ejectment the plaintiff must show that the defendant was in possession. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. v. Cummings, 90 Mo. 267.

So, a purchaser under a title bond complying with his contract is entitled to an injunction against a judgment in ejectment in favor of a purchaser from an assignee for creditors of his vendor. Stockton v. Briggs, 5 Jones, Eq. 309.

And a writ of possession in ejectment against the husband will be restrained at the instance of his wife, not a party to the action, who claims the land in her own right. Bushong v. Rector, 32 W. Va. 311.

And a judgment in ejectment will be enjoined at the instance of a third party where the plaintiff in execution had purchased at a judicial sale with notice of superior equity in the third party. Guthall v. Salsberry, Wright (Ohio) 127.

The purchaser of a house overlapping another lot 2 feet, which was not known at the time of the purchase, is entitled to an injunction against executing a judgment in ejectment for the 2 feet of ground, until his equities and right to the land are determined. Anglesy v. Colgan, 44 N. J. Eq. 208.

And a judgment in ejectment will be enjoined at the suit of the defendant holding the equitable title, on a bill for specific performance. Simms v. Guthrie, 18 U. S. 9 Cranch, 19, 3 L. ed. 642.

A judgment dismissing a bill of complaint for an injunction as not a cloud upon title will not be res judicata in a subsequent action of ejectment between the parties and their privies. Fulton v. Hanlow, 20 Cal. 484.

But in Jones v. Chiles, 3 T. B. Mon. 341, it was held that if a writ of possession is sued out against complainant or his tenant when they have the superior title, and are not parties to the judgment, an injunction will not be granted, as the writ could not affect him.

And in Tevis v. Ellis, 25 Cal. 515, it was held that there is no occasion to restrain a writ of possession running against parties who are not in possession.

And Pa. act June 16, 1833, providing that the writ shall be stayed by giving bond to appear and plead to any action of ejectment, prevents an injunction to protect the party in possession against a judgment in ejectment in favor of a purchaser at execution sale. Brady v. Weightman, 8 Phila. 322.

After judgment in ejectment and notice of appeal, an injunction to restrain further proceedings by plaintiff until the determination of a partition suit, in which plaintiff was not a party, will not be granted. Hammers v. Hanrick, 60 Tex. 412.

The cases in regard to injunctions to protect an occupying claimant, incidental to ejectment proceedings, are not included in this note, being regarded as special proceedings in behalf of the occupying claimant.

XVI. Summary proceedings in forcible entry and detainer.

As a general rule an injunction will not be granted to prevent dispossession by summary proceedings, unless the complainant has no other remedy, or he was not made a party to the summary proceedings; but as to this latter exception, the cases in New York refuse an injunction under the peculiar statutes of that state except in a few cases of fraud or irreparable injury, or where the complainant would be without remedy.

A suit to reform a deed is not a ground for enjoining a judgment in forcible detainer, as the question of title of land is not in controversy. Murphree v. Bishop, 79 Ala. 404.

An injunction against proceedings in an action of unlawful detainer, and to set aside an administrator's sale of land as a cloud on complainant's title as heirs on the ground of fraud and collusion, will not be granted where the party is not deceived or overreached and the fraud is not stated, and the purchaser is not insolvent, and there is a remedy at law. Cobb v. Garner (Ala.) 17 So. Rep. 47.

And a judgment for possession will not be restrained, notwithstanding complainant holds the legal title and the adverse party is insolvent. Hamilton v. Adams, 15 Ala. 598, 50 Am. Dec. 150.

And that the defendant intends to appeal, when no appeal has been taken, will not entitle him to an injunction. Curd v. Farrar, 47 Iowa, 504.

And an injunction will not be granted where the law directs the judgment to be executed notwithstanding an appeal, as an injunction will not be granted to take the place of an appeal. But it was said: "This decision must not be understood to deprive the citizen of the protection of the court, in any case where an interlocutory judgment works a grievance irreparable." State v. Pitot, 11 Mart. N. S. 535.

And where a tenant was turned out, by writ of restitution and a new tenant placed on the premises, the latter is not entitled to an injunction against an order of restitution obtained by the first tenant on a reversal of the case, as the second tenant is only an interloper. Boinay v. Coats, 17 Mich. 411.

And a remedy by supersedeas, after a tender of rent due and costs, will prevent an injunction against a judgment for possession by the landlord. Flanneken v. Wright, 64 Miss. 217.

And in an action to quiet title an injunction was refused against forcible proceedings against a tenant, where it was claimed that by fraud an improper description was inserted in the proceedings before the justice, but it was not shown how or when the substitution was made, and there is a remedy at law; besides it must be shown that there was a good defense, and that he was prevented from using the same by fraud, accident, or mistake, and was not negligent. Brick v. Burr, 47 N. J. Eq. 189.

And an injunction will not be granted against a judgment for writ of dispossession for failure to pay rent, as the payment of rent would prevent the necessity of asking for an injunction. Hartnack v. James, 8 Phila. 317.

But where the justice in a proceeding to dispossess tenants refused a recognizance to try title, the tenants were granted an injunction until the case was determined on certiorari. Snyder v. Pullinger, 3 W. N. C. 468.

And a person in quiet possession of real estate as owner may obtain an injunction to restrain others from dispossessing him by means of process, growing out of litigation to which he was not a party. Deans v. Bowden, 20 Fla. 905; Goodnough v. Shepard, 23 Ill. 81.

An injunction restraining a writ of restitution in an action of forcible detainer will protect the possession, although the writ had been executed before service of injunction, where the possession had been regained by the petitioner in injunction. Hillebrand v. Barton, 89 Tex. 599.

A judgment in forcible entry and detainer against a railroad company for the road was enjoined, where, pending the action, an agreement was made by the parties that the plaintiff was entitled to so much money under a contract for the possession of the road until paid, and which sum was tendered after the judgment and before the cause was affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States, although no fraud, accident, or mistake was shown, and after the agreement the railroad sold the same to another party who was not then a party to the suit of forcible entry and detainer. Johnson v. St. Louis, L. M. & S. R. Co. 141 U. S. 903 35 L. ed. 975.

The rule in New York.

Inasmuch as the New York cases depend entirely on the construction of the statutes and Code of Civil Procedure, these sections are given, substantially, and the dates of the decisions construing the same.

2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 516, § 47, provided that the supreme court may award a certiorari for the purpose of examining any adjudication made on any application hereby authorized; but the proceedings on any such application shall not be stayed or suspended by such writ of certiorari, or any other writ or order of any court or officer.

But that statute was changed in 1880 by the present N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2265, providing for a stay in summary proceedings only by, (1) an order on appeal; (2) an injunction order granted in an action against the petitioner; and such injunction shall not be granted before the final order in the special proceeding, except where an injunction would be granted in ejectment, brought by petitioner and upon like terms, or after the final order, —except in a case where an injunction would be granted to stay the execution of the final judgment in such action.

N. Y. Code Proc. § 219, provides that an injunction shall be granted where the plaintiff is entitled to the relief demanded, and such relief consists in preventing acts injurious to plaintiff. This is noted in the Code of 1867-8 as amended in 1849. This section is similar to N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 606 (1877), using the word "judgment" instead of "relief," and which is the same as the present code.

Under these several sections the rule in New York is, that an injunction will not be granted to prevent dispossession in summary proceedings, except in cases of fraud, surprise, or undue advantage, or where the defense is an equitable one over which the justice has no jurisdiction, the reasons being that the tenant can make a defense to the proceeding, or had a remedy by certiorari under the former act, or by appeal under the present code. Smith v. Moffat, 1 Barb. 65 (1847); Hyatt v. Burr, 8 How. Pr. 168 (1853); Bokee v. Hamersley, 16 How. Pr. 461 (1858); Dulgan v. Hogan, 16 How. Pr. 164, 1 Bosw. 645 (1858); Marks v. Wilson, 11 Abb. Pr. 87 (1860); Seeback v. McDonald, 11 Abb. Pr. 95, 21 How. Pr. 224 (1860); Ward v. Kelsey, 14 Abb. Pr. 106 (1861); Roberts v. Mathews, 18 Abb. Pr. 199 (1864); Bean v. Pettingill, 3 Abb. Pr. N. S. 58 (1866), affirmed 7 Robt. 7; McGune v. Palmer, 5 Robt. 607 (1866); Aaron v. Baum, 37 How. Pr. 237, 7 Robt. 849 (1868); Marry v. James, 37 How. Pr. 52, 2 Daly, 437 (1869); McIntyre v. Hernandez, 7 Abb. Pr. N. S. 214 (1869); Sherman v. Wright, 49 N. Y. 227 (1872); Rapp v. Williams, 1 Hun, 716 (1874); Armstrong v. Cummings, 20 Hun, 313 (1880); Jessurun v. Mackie, 24 Hun, 624 (1880); Knox v. McDonald, 25 Hun, 268 (1881); Koster v. Van Schaick, 11 Daly, 205 (1882); Hausauer v. Dahlman, 73 Hun, 607 (1892).

So, an injunction will be granted on the ground of fraud, surprise, or equitable defense. Cure v. Crawford, 5 How. Pr. 293, Code Rep. N. S. 18 (1860); Forrester v. Wilson, 1 Duer, 684 (1862); Vallotton v. Seignett, 2 Abb. Pr. 121 (1865); Griffith v. Brown, 23 How. Pr. 4 (1864); Graham v. James, 7 Robt. 468 (1868); Crawford v. Kastner, 26 Hun, 440 (1882).

And 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 516, § 47, is not repealed by N. Y. Code Proc. § 219. Dulgan v. Hogan; Hyatt v. Burr; McGune v. Palmer; and Marks v. Wilson, —supra. Contra, Cure v. Crawford, infra.

And N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2265, is only a re-enactment of 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 516, § 47, instead of certiorari providing a remedy by appeal, and subdiv. 2 only provides an injunction as in ejectment. Koster v. Van Schaick, and Knox v. McDonald, supra.

So, the remedy by certiorari, under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 516, § 47, prevents an injunction. Armstrong v. Cummings; McIntyre v. Hernandez; Ward v. Kelsey; Marks v. Wilson; Duigan v. Hogan; Smith v. Moffat; Hyatt v. Burr; and Bokee v. Hamersley,—supra.

And the remedy by appeal, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2285, will prevent injunction against dispossession under summary proceedings. Jessurun v. Mackie, and Koster v. Van Schaick, supra.

And the remedy by writ of prohibition for want of jurisdiction prevents an injunction. Ward v. Kelsey, supra.

And an injunction will not be granted on the ground that repairs were not made. Duigan v. Hogan, supra.

Or that the tenant was entitled to pay for his fixtures. Smith v. Moffat, supra.

And the landlord cannot obtain an injunction against the dispossession of his tenant by another party, where such landlord was not a party to such proceedings. Aaron v. Baum, and Marry v. James, supra.

Or, where complainant is an assignee for creditors and has not accepted the terms of the lease, an injunction will not be granted. Bokee v. Hamersley, supra.

And an injunction will not be granted after the party has been dispossessed. Roberts v. Mathews, and Seebach v. McDonald, supra.

Or, where the matters set up in the injunction suit have been fully tried in the summary proceedings. McIntyre v. Hernandez; Knox v. McDonald; and Seebach v. McDonald,—supra.

An injunction will not be granted on the ground that complainant desired to use the evidence of the city judge presiding in summary proceedings. Marry v. James, supra.

And will not be granted because of defects in preliminary papers. Bokee v. Hamersley, and Armstrong v. Cummings, supra.

Or that a guardian ad litem was not appointed. Jessurun v. Mackie, supra.

And that plaintiff is in possession under a parol lease will not justify an injunction, as such is a defense in the summary proceedings. McGuire v. Palmer, supra.

And the same applies to a defense that the lease was extended. Rapp v. Williams; Knox v. McDonald; Hausauer v. Dahlman; and Bean v. Pettigill,—supra. But see Graham v. James, infra, and cases following, as to suit for specific performance.

In Sherman v. Wright, 49 N. Y. 227 (1873), which was an injunction to prevent proceedings by a landlord to remove a tenant, it was held that 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 516, § 47, prohibited staying proceedings by any writ or order of any court or officer, and where there is no charge of fraud or want of jurisdiction as in other cases, an injunction will not be granted. In this case, which was a suit for specific performance, complainant claimed a lease made by one assuming to act as guardian, but conceded that his title was defective, and he did not show that it was to the best interest of the infant that the contract should be specifically enforced, and his legal right must be determined in the proceedings to remove him.

But in Graham v. James, 7 Robt. 468 (1868), it was held that a tenant could not defend an action of summary proceedings on the equitable ground that he was entitled to a new lease, and on such claim, asserted in an action for specific performance, an injunction was granted against removal of the tenant by summary proceedings. But see Rapp v. Williams, supra, and cases following, as to defense simply that the lease was extended.

injunction was granted against dispossession of a tenant, where he brought suit for specific performance of a lease for a term of four years with the privilege of six years more, as equitable defenses are not available before a justice, and the question of the right of extension was an issue of law which the justice was not competent to determine for want of jurisdiction. (The provisions of the code are not referred to.)

And under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 512, art. 2, providing for forfeiture and summary dispossession on desertion of premises by the tenant, and allowing no defense if any rent is unpaid, a tenant, who has been compelled to abandon the premises owing to its dilapidated condition and the failure of the landlord to keep his covenant to repair, may obtain an injunction against such judgment in an action of specific performance to compel the landlord to repair, and to set off the damages for breach of such covenant against the rent; and 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 47-49, relating to certiorari, does not give an adequate remedy in a case of this kind. Valloton v. Beignett, 2 Abb. Pr. 121 (1855).

Where time was not given the tenant to resist application for judgment of ejectment under summary proceedings by the officer delaying service of summons until too late to prevent issuance of a warrant, an injunction was granted where diligence was shown, and this on the ground of fraud or surprise. Griffith v. Brown, 28 How. Pr. 4 (1864).

In Cure v. Crawford, 5 How. Pr. 238, Code Rep. N. S. 18, the same was substantially held to be the rule under similar circumstances. But this case also held that N. Y. Code Proc. § 219, providing for an injunction in any case which would produce injury to the plaintiff, repeals 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 516, § 47, as to this effect of the code section. This case is in direct conflict with the other New York cases—Duigan v. Hogan, supra, and cases following.

In Forrester v. Wilson, 1 Duer, 624 (1852), an injunction was granted against a warrant of dispossession on the ground of surprise and equitable set-off, on the tenant tendering all the rent due, and it was granted on the ground that the magistrate by the issuing of the warrant was functus officio, and that the plaintiff had no other remedy.

English cases of landlord and tenant.

Where a landlord neglected to defend in ejectment and his tenant attorned to the plaintiff in that judgment, an injunction was granted in favor of the landlord to prevent his former tenant from setting up his lease from his former landlord as a defense in an action of ejectment to be brought by his landlord in order to prevent a recovery of possession. Baker v. Mellish, 10 Ves. Jr. 544.

In Beasley v. Darcy, 2 Sch. & Lef. 408, note, an injunction was granted against a judgment in ejectment where the defendant brought an action of account and had an offset against the rent, although the rent had not been tendered under 4 Geo. I., chap. 5, as the amount was not ascertained.

But in O'Mahoney v. Dickson, 2 Sch. & Lef. 400, it was held that after an act of ejectment by the landlord, the tenant cannot bring an action for injunction or to regain possession, and for an accounting without a tender of the rent as required by 4 Geo. I., chap. 5, providing that a bill must be filed in six months, and a tender of the rent made, distinguishing Beasley v. Darcy, supra, on the ground that in that case it was not a question as to how much rent was due, but a collateral demand nearly equal to the rent which could not be set up in ejectment, but was ground for equitable relief; but in this case the whole question was, What was due for rent?

A waiver of forfeiture on the part of the landlord as to his lessee is not such a waiver to the sub-lessee as will authorize an injunction against a judgment in ejectment against a sublessee. Hillier v. Parkinson, 9 L. J. Ch. 166.

XVII. Jurisdiction of courts.

a. To protect third party.

In the absence of a prohibitory statute it has been generally held that a court of another county or a court of concurrent jurisdiction has the power to enjoin a sale of property upon an execution against a third party, although this is regarded as an exception to the rule that one court should not enjoin proceedings on a judgment of another court. Where the statute prohibiting the exercise of such jurisdiction is mandatory, it must be followed. But in Louisiana where the levy is made in the same parish in which the judgment was rendered, the remedy should be sought in the same court in which judgment was rendered.

A court of concurrent jurisdiction or a court of another county may enjoin a sale of property of a third party, on process against another person. Pixley v. Huggins, 15 Cal. 127; Lawes v. Chinn, 4 Mart. N. S. 838; Stroud v. Humble, 1 La. Ann. 810; Arenstein v. Weber, 21 La. Ann. 199; Hobgood v. Brown, 2 La. Ann. 828.

Although the plaintiff in the execution does not live in the parish of the injunction suit. Coleman v. Brown, 16 La. Ann. 110.

In Van Ratoliff v. Call, 72 Tex. 491, it was held that Tex. Rev. Stat. subd. 15, arts. 1198, 2880, providing that suits to enjoin judgments must be in the county where judgment was rendered, and that injunction writs in such cases shall be returnable to the court rendering judgment, does not apply to injunctions to protect the property of a third person. In this case a transcript of the judgment was recorded in the county where the land was situated and was an apparent cloud on the title. It was said that where the execution of the judgment generally is sought to be prevented, or where the writ is granted to stay—that is to stop—the execution of a judgment, the statute is imperative, and is susceptible of but one construction; that is, that the writ should be returned or the suit brought in the county where the judgment was rendered. But the statute does not apply to cases where a levy was made on property of a third party.

But in George v. Dyer, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 780, under the same sections it was held that an injunction against an execution issued from a county court of another county was properly granted by the county court in the county where it is sought to be enforced, but should be returnable to the county from whence the execution issued. This was a suit by a chattel mortgagee.

And a bill filed by a third party for an injunction against the execution of a writ of possession on foreclosure suit issued from another county, which is void by lapse of time because the return day had passed, is not defective in that it is an injunction against the execution of a judgment, but it is an injunction against a trespass by the sheriff and is not an attack on the judgment. Reagan v. Van Evans, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 35.

In Davis v. Clark, 26 Ind. 426, 39 Am. Dec. 471, it was held that where it is not sought to enjoin the prosecution of an action in the court of common pleas nor the execution of a judgment in that court, nor to determine the validity or enjoin the execution of final process issued thereon, but simply to enjoin the sheriff from selling the lands of the plaintiff under an execution against another party to which it is claimed they are not subject, and to prevent a cloud being thereby cast upon the plaintiff's title, the circuit court has jurisdiction to enjoin a sale on a judgment in the court of common pleas; distinguishing Indiana & L. R. Co. v. Williams, 22 Ind. 198, as in that case the suit was one attacking the execution of a judgment and to protect the sale of one kind of property before another kind had been sold, and was a suit by one of the defendants.

Davis v. Clark, supra, was distinguished in Plunkett v. Black, 117 Ind. 14, as in the former case it was a cloud on the title of land of a third person not a party to the suit, and it was not a suit to enjoin the judgment or process, but the levy.

An injunction may be granted by one court against an assignee for creditors making a sale under the order of another court of chattels which are mortgaged, and the statute in regard to assignments recognizes the priority of the mortgage lien, as the statute does not impose on the court where the assignment was made exclusive jurisdiction, and the lien will be protected as though it were an execution sale. Ades v. Levi, 187 Ind. 506.

In Davis v. Bonar, 15 Iowa, 171, it was held that the district court may enjoin an execution sale levied upon real property at the instance of a purchaser, where the execution is issued from the supreme court, where a proper showing is made, although the supreme court is in another county, as the proceedings are not pending in another county. See Lockwood v. Kitteringham, infra.

But in Oger v. Daunoy, 7 Mart. N. S. 656, where the injunction was sought in the same parish from which the execution issued to enjoin the levy on the property of a third person, it was held that, being in the same parish, it would not be enjoined, as the exception to the general rule which allows an injunction against an execution levy in another county is where a necessity exists to prevent an immediate injury and where such relief could not be had in the court issuing the execution, and therefore it was refused; but the court had jurisdiction to retain the case on the prayer on the alternative judgment for the property or its value.

And in Borne v. Porter, 4 Rob. (La.) 57, it was held that the district court was without authority to arrest by injunction process issued from the parish court, but the defendants levying under different writs were entitled to a severance of their defense. The case does not show whether the district and parish courts were in the same parish or not, or what was the cause of action in the injunction suit.

In Lockwood v. Kitteringham, 42 Iowa, 257, it was held that, to restrain the enforcement of a judgment, the remedy by injunction must be pursued in the county and court where the judgment was rendered, when it is sought to restrain the sale of property of a third person.

In this case the judgment was made a special lien against specific property to enforce a mechanic's lien, and the injunction was to restrain the enforcement of the judgment by special execution and is not like a case under a general execution, where property of a third party is seized, as in such cases the injunction is not against the judgment. See Davis v. Bonar, supra.

As to injunction from other courts, see Mallory v. Dauber, infra.

b. Exempt property.

The court of one county may enjoin a sale of exempt property, on an execution issued from another county, but not where the decree is attacked, nor, in Missouri, where there is a simple remedy by statute available in the court rendering judgment.

An injunction may be granted in any county in Kansas where an execution is attempted to be levied upon exempt property. Naill v. Kansas Farmer's F. Ins. Co., 47 Kan. 223.

And the district court of Texas may enjoin a sale on execution of exempt property under a judgment from a justice's court without regard to the amount involved; and having obtained jurisdiction, it is authorized to retain cognizance of the suit for all necessary purposes. Stein v. Frieberg, 64 Tex. 271.

And a county court of Texas may enjoin a sale of exempt property under an execution issued from the district court under Tex. Const. 1876, art. 5, § 16, giving the county court jurisdiction to issue injunctions, and giving concurrent jurisdiction with the district court where the amount in controversy does not exceed $1,000. Anderson v. Larremore, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) § 947.

Where an injunction stays the process of a sale of homestead property and also questions the validity and regularity of the writ, which was specific, the writ of injunction must be returned to the court from which the order of sale issued, and not to the court of any other county granting the injunction. Seligson v. Collins, 64 Tex. 314.

But the statute in such a case was held not to apply to an injunction granted in favor of a purchaser of a homestead from the debtor where the judgment was not attacked. Van Ratscliff v. Call, 12 Tex. 491.

But where a husband and wife brought a suit to enjoin a decree of foreclosure of a homestead on the ground that the wife was not a party to such decree where she died pending the injunction suit, it was held that the suit to enjoin should have been in the court rendering the decree, and that although the mortgage was void, the homestead right did not vest in the husband, and the injunction was refused. Bevalk v. Kraemer, 8 Cal. 66, 68 Am. Dec. 804.

And in Missouri an injunction cannot be issued by one court to prevent a levy on exempt homestead property, on an execution issued from another court, as Mo. Rev. Stat. § 2405, provides that the writ may be set aside or quashed by the court which issued it. Mellier v. Bartlett, 39 Mo. 184.

c. Other cases.

An injunction, at the instance of the defendant, against an execution sale or final process, is seldom granted except in the court in which the judgment was rendered.

The court of one county should not grant an injunction against an execution issued from another county, unless the complainant is a third party, and in this case the objections to the execution as to discharge in bankruptcy and delay in issuing execution could only be tried by the record. Winnie v. Grayson, 3 Tex. 429.

A county court cannot enjoin a sale on an execution against complainant from a justice amounting to $125, although the property levied on is worth $400, as the original amount in controversy determines the jurisdiction of the county court. Wheeler & Wilson Mfg. Co. v. Whitener, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) § 5.

In Wheeler & Wilson Mfg. Co. v. Collins, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) § 132, where "a justice of the peace of H. county rendered a judgment and issued execution thereon to W. county, and the county judge of the latter county granted an injunction restraining the collection of the execution, . . . he had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and no authority to grant the injunction." The case does not state the cause for injunction.

And an inferior court has no jurisdiction to enjoin an execution against complainant issued from a superior court, or to enjoin a judgment of another circuit court of concurrent jurisdiction. (The cause of action in the injunction suit is not stated.) Rosbell v. Maxwell, Hempst. 25.

2 Ind. Rev. Stat. (Garvin & Hord, pp. 23, 181), providing that injunctions may be granted by the circuit court and courts of the common pleas in their respective counties, simply confers jurisdiction, and does not allow one of these courts to enjoin proceedings or process of the other at the suit of the defendant, and a sale on a vendi. exp. 30 L. R. A.

should not be enjoined on the ground that real estate was being sold instead of personally. Indiana & I. R. Co. v. Williams, 23 Ind. 193.

And under Ky. Civ. Code, § 225, providing that an injunction to stay proceedings on a judgment shall not be granted in any other court than that in which the judgment was rendered, a circuit court has no jurisdiction to enjoin the sale under an execution issued from a justice of the peace; and this section controls, although the injunction was only asked to prevent the levy on that particular property, but, was a suit by the defendant in the judgment. Chesapeake, O. & S. W. R. Co. v. Reazor, 34 Ky. 389; McConnell v. Rawe (Ky.) 18 W. Rep. 582.

And this section applies to all parties, whether they were parties to the judgment or not. Mallory v. Dauber, 33 Ky. 399.

In Arthurs v. Villere, 43 La. Ann. 414, it was held that no doubt there exist exceptional cases in which an injunction may be granted by a court, not that which rendered the judgment about to be executed; but in none of these cases has the defendant in the suit ever been recognized the right to claim such relief from a forum, which was not that which exercised jurisdiction over him, and condemned him. He cannot be sentenced by one jurisdiction and be absolved by another. It is useless to enumerate those exceptional cases. It is enough to observe that injunctions in such instances have been allowed, as a rule, only to third parties, not connected with the suit and residing within the jurisdiction of the sister court issuing the process. And La. Code Pr. art. 617, provides that the execution of a judgment belongs to the courts by which the cause has been tried, and La. Code Pr. art. 629, provides that it is for the court which has rendered judgment to take cognizance of the manner of its execution. But see next case.

But in Copley v. Edwards, 5 La. Ann. 647, it was held that where the execution contains erroneous taxation of costs, and complainant pleads partial payment, the court of the parish where an execution is sought to be enforced may enjoin the same.

And in Brown v. Brown, 30 La. Ann. 506, it was held that a parish court in which a succession has been opened, having control of the property, has jurisdiction to enjoin a nominal administrator from collecting a judgment belonging to the estate under a judgment of the district court, as the attack is not on the validity of the judgment, but the right and power to act as an administrator, on the ground that there was no order, advertisement, commission, oath, or inventory. This injunction proceeding seems to have been sued out in aid of a suit for amotion or destitution, as it is called by the plaintiff, if such it can be styled, and to prevent the defendant from attempting to possess himself of a large amount of property until he shall have given bond as administrator.

In Wood v. Hughes (Ind.) 32 N. E. Rep. 594, it was held that the jurisdiction of an appeal from an order enjoining the levy of an execution upon real estate is not to the appellate court, but to the supreme court of Indiana. The case does not show what was the cause assigned for injunction.

d. Federal and state courts.

It is a well-recognized rule that state courts will not enjoin sales under process from the Federal courts and vice versa; but where a suit is brought in the state court and removed to the Federal court, this rule does not apply. But in one case a territorial court enjoined an execution from a Federal court attempted to be enforced beyond the jurisdiction of the Federal court.

The Federal courts cannot enjoin a sale of the property of one person on an execution issued out of a state court against the property of another. Daly v. The Sheriff, 1 Woods, C. C. 175. To the same effect, Hamilton v. Walsh, 23 Fed.

Rep. 420; Domestic & Foreign Missionary Soc. v. Hineman, 13 Fed. Rep. 161.

And the same rule was applied where bondholders of a railroad attempted to enjoin a sale of rolling stock on an execution from a state court. Ruggles v. Simonton, 3 Blm. 325.

And in American Asso. v. Hurst, 7 C. C. A. 506, 59 Fed. Rep. 1, it was held that a sale of land under an execution issued from a court of equity in Kentucky on a sale bond is a "proceeding," under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 720, prohibiting an injunction in the Federal court against a proceeding in the state court; denying the authority of Cropper v. Coburn, infra, as such case was in effect overruled by Freeman v. Howe, 65 U. S. 24 How. 458, 16 L. ed. 750.

So, a Federal court has no power to enjoin a levy made on lands which are situated in the foreign state and beyond its territorial jurisdiction, on the ground that it has appointed a receiver of such property under insolvency proceedings, and the statute does not prohibit a citizen from obtaining a preference in another state, and the person so enjoined is not a party or privy to the litigation in which the receiver was appointed. Schindelholz v. Cullum, 55 Fed. Rep. 885.

And a third party cannot obtain an injunction in a state court against the sale of his property on an execution issued from a Federal court. Brooks v. Montgomery, 23 La. Ann. 450.

Where an injunction is granted in a state court against an execution or attachment sale, and is transferred to the Federal court, the injunction remains in force, as U. S. Rev. Stat. § 646, provides that an injunction granted before a removal of a cause shall continue in force. Perry v. Sharpe, 8 Fed. Rep. 15.

Prior to this statute, in Diggs v. Wolcott, 8 U. S. 4 Cranch, 179, 2 L. ed. 597, it was held that where a suit to enjoin proceedings in a state court was removed to a Federal court, the latter could not grant an injunction.

After an injunction preventing the disposition of property in a foreign state, a subsequent injunction against another person, not a party to the original action, from enforcing a sale under execution in a foreign country (Mexico), cannot be obtained after an execution sale and purchase by a third party. Mexican Ore Co. v. Mexican Guadalupe Min. Co. 47 Fed. Rep. 861.

In Cropper v. Coburn, 2 Curt. C. C. 465, it was held that the act of Congress March 2, 1793, providing that an injunction will not be granted to stay proceedings in a state court, does not apply to an injunction against the sale of the property of a third person on an attachment against another, as the attachment on meane process is not a proceeding.

But the authority of this case has been denied in Daly v. The Sheriff, 1 Woods, C. C. 176, and American Asso. v. Hurst, supra, and in effect was overruled in Freeman v. Howe, 65 U. S. 24 How. 458, 16 L. ed. 750, which was a suit in replevin followed by Covell v. Heyman, 111 U. S. 176, 28 L. ed. 890.

And in Needles v. Frost (Okla.) 35 Pac. Rep. 574, it was held that the levy and sale under execution from the Federal court for the Indian territory will be enjoined by a territorial court, where the levy is made in Oklahoma and the Federal court issuing such execution had no jurisdiction in Oklahoma; and this is not an interference with the process of the Federal court, as such execution is void, as judgments have no extraterritorial force.

And the Federal court may enjoin the inequitable use of judgments and executions in a state court, at the instance of a cestui que trust, who files a bill claiming that such judgments are trust property and asking that the same be assigned to her; and this does not conflict with U. S. Rev. Stat. § 720, prohibiting the Federal court from enjoining proceedings in a state court. Linton v. Mosgrove, 14 Fed. Rep. 542.

And in Watson v. Jones, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 679, 20 L. ed. 686, which was a suit to prevent interference with possession of a church, the defendants pleaded that they claimed possession under a decree of a state court, and that the marshal of the state court was in charge of the property. It was held that the Federal decisions are conclusive against any injunction from the Federal court forbidding the defendants to take possession of property which the unexecuted decree of the chancery court requires the marshal to deliver to them. Yet as the bill prays for other and further relief, which the circuit court could render for the protection of the right of the plaintiffs, and which did not enjoin the defendants from taking possession of the church property, and which did not disturb the possession of the marshal of the Louisville chancery court, the Federal court had a right to hear the case and grant that relief. The possession of the marshal is a substitute for the possession of the defendants, and the decree recognizes the right of the defendants under the marshal; and while they are not enjoined from receiving that possession from the marshal, and he is not restrained from obeying the decree of the chancery court by delivering it, and while there is no order made on the marshal at all to interfere with his possession, the defendants are required by the decree to respect the rights of the plaintiffs, and to so use the possession and control to which they may be restored as not to hinder or obstruct the true uses of the trust, which that possession is intended to protect.

A levy and sale under process from the state court will be enjoined by the state court where there was a levy previously made on the same property under a judgment in the Federal court. Hall v. Boyd, 62 Ga. 454.

XVIII. Remedy at law.

a. Personal property.

It is well recognized that where there is a plain and adequate remedy at law, courts of equity will not interfere, by injunction, to prevent a sale on execution of personal property or proceedings on final process. There are exceptions to this rule, however, for which see supra, I. Exempt personal property; VI. Railroad and quasi public corporation property; VII. Partnership property; VIII. Property owned by third parties; b. Personal property; I. Slaves; j. Wife's personal property.

So, the remedy at law against an unlawful seizure of the personal property of a third person under an execution prevents an injunction against the same. Hall v. Davis, 5 J. J. Marsh. 290; Hammond v. St. John, 4 Yerg. 107.

Unless it be of a peculiar character, as slaves. Beatty v. Smith, 28 Medes & M. 567.

The remedy by third opposition in Louisiana (which is similar to interposition of claim by third party) prevents an injunction against a foreclosure sale of land. Van Loan v. Heffner, 30 La. Ann. 1213.

And the remedy at law of action of claim and delivery will prevent an injunction against an execution sale. Richards v. Kirkpatrick, 53 Cal. 433; Chittenden v. Davidson, 20 Jones & S. 421.

And the right of trial of claim of title under Ala. Code, § 2567-2569, prevents an injunction against an execution sale of personal property. Gerald v. McKenzie, 27 Ala. 166.

And the remedy at law under N. C. C. P. § 177, subsec. 4, to try claim of title, prevents an injunction. Baxter v. Baxter, 77 N. C. 118.

And the remedy of affidavit and claim bond prevents an injunction. Ferguson v. Herring, 40 Tex. 126.

But this rule does not apply to a mortgagee, George v. Dyer, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 470.

In Baker v. Rinehard, 11 W. Va. 238, it was held that the statutory remedy by giving a suspending bond or a forthcoming bond by the claimant and a trial by jury thereon prevents an injunction against an execution sale of personal property belonging to a third party. But see Cropper v. Coburn, 2 Curt. C. C. 466.

The remedy by an action of damages for unlawful seizure of goods will prevent an injunction. Chittenden v. Davidson, supra; Lewis v. Levy, 16 Md. 55; Freeland v. Reynolds, 16 Md. 416; Drewson v. American Surety Co. 23 N. Y. Week. Dig. 522; Frazier v. White, 49 Md. 1.

In Bowyer v. Craigh, 3 Rand. (Va.) 25, it was held that the remedy at law by requiring the sheriff to take an indemnifying bond before a sale of personal property on which there is a lien or suit for the specific property will prevent an injunction in favor of a lienholder. But see Daly v. The Sheriff, infra.

And a remedy at law giving a lien on the proceeds of an execution sale, in favor of a senior execution, will prevent an injunction against a sale of land under a junior execution. Sanders v. Foster, 66 Ga. 222; Wiley v. Bridgman, 1 Head, 68.

So, the remedy of motion to quash prevents an injunction against an execution sale. Nelson v. Griffey, 131 Pa. 273, Reversing 37 Pittsb. L. J. 65; Beard v. Foreman, 1 Ill. 385, 12 Am. Dec. 197; Palmer v. Gardiner, 77 Ill. 143; Williams v. Wright, 9 Humph. 493; Jacks v. Bigham, 36 Ark. 481; Robinson v. Chesseldine, 5 Ill. 332.

And Mo. Rev. Stat. § 2406, providing that the judge of the court out of which the execution issued may quash the same prevents an injunction. Meiller v. Bartlett, 80 Mo. 134.

And Gantt's (Ark.) Dig. § 2619, providing for quashing an execution, gives a remedy at law against an execution issued against a person individually when it should be as administrator, and will bar an injunction against an execution levy. King v. Clay, 34 Ark. 291.

And the remedy at law to set aside a sale and stay the proceedings prevents an injunction against the sale. Fabs v. Roberts, 54 Ill. 122; Robinson v. Chesseldine, supra; Walker v. Gurley, 83 N. C. 429; La Crosse & M. Packet Co. v. Reynolds, 12 Minn. 213; Logan v. Lucas, 59 Ill. 287; Luco v. Brown, 73 Cal. 3; Jacks v. Bigham, supra. But contra was held in Buffum v. Foster, 77 Hun. 27.

The remedy in the court rendering the judgment, to stay the sale,—prevents a court of chancery from granting the same relief. Piggott v. Addicks, 3 G. Greene, 427, 56 Am. Dec. 547; Beard v. Foreman, 1 Ill. 385, 12 Am. Dec. 197.

An administrator's sale will not be restrained for insufficiency of advertisement as there is a remedy in the orphans' court to have the proceedings corrected. Parker v. Allen (N. J.) 3 Cent. Rep. 476.

And the remedy by a motion, before the justice of the peace, to correct an execution to make it conform to the judgment, will prevent an injunction against an execution sale. Martin v. Pifer, 56 Ind. 245.

And the better practice is to file a motion in the case in which judgment is rendered for a return of the execution, where a judgment is superseded on error, before the sale, rather than to enjoin the sale. Jaedicke v. Patrie, 15 Kan. 257.

And the remedy of supersedeas prevents an injunction. Williams v. Wright, 9 Humph. 493.

And in Robinson v. Yon, 8 Fla. 250, it was held that the remedy in the court rendering judgment, to recall an execution, precludes enjoining an execution sale made at a time unauthorized. But see Krinke v. Parish, infra.

And the remedy by suit for possession of personal property analogous to replevin, trover, debt, trespass, or case, bars an injunction against an execution sale. Stillwell v. Oliver, 35 Ark. 184; Endres v. Lloyd, 56 Ga. 547; Lovette v. Longmire, 14 Ark. 389.

The remedy of trespass, trover, detinue, or replevin after sale, prevents an injunction against an execution sale of personal property. Du Pre v. Williams, 5 Jones, Eq. 96.

And the remedy at law of trespass or trover will prevent an injunction against an execution sale of personal property. Davidson v. Floyd, 15 Fla. 697; Miller v. Crews, 3 Leigh, 578; Kendrick v. Arnold, 4 Bibb, 235; Howell v. Howell, 5 Ired. Eq. 258; Johnson v. Connecticut Bank, 21 Conn. 143. But see Cropper v. Coburn, infra.

And in Kentucky the remedy of trover, or trespass, or detinue, will prevent an injunction against an execution sale of slaves owned by a third person. Neameth v. Bowler, 3 Bibb, 487.

And in Allen v. Freeland, 3 Rand. (Va.) 170, it was held that the remedy of detinue prevents an injunction against a sale of slaves on the execution against a third party,—especially where the title of the claimant is fraudulent. But see supra, VIII. 1.

So, the remedy at law, of replevin, prevents an injunction against an execution sale of personal property. Frazier v. White, 49 Md. 1; Bouldin v. Alexander, 7 T. B. Mon. 426; Young v. Young, 9 B. Mon. 66; Allen v. Winsteadly, 135 Ind. 105; Bryan v. Long, 14 Fla. 366. But see Central Trust Co. v. Moran, infra.

But in Amis v. Myers, 37 U. S. 16 How. 422, 14 L. ed. 1029, it was held that a clear and adequate remedy at law was held not to defeat the remedy of an injunction against a levy of execution on slaves, and the court says this is an exceptional case, and is not to be a precedent.

And a remedy at law under Mass. Rev. Stat. chap. 90, §§ 73-75, by giving bond to an officer to prevent a levy of an attachment, does not apply to a levy against firm property on a writ against an individual member of the firm. Cropper v. Coburn, 2 Curt. C. C. 466.

And in Daly v. The Sheriff, 1 Woods, C. C. 175, it was said that an action on an indemnifying bond given to the sheriff under a state statute, or an action of trespass against the sheriff, is not such an adequate and complete remedy at law as would oust the Federal court of equity of jurisdiction to restrain the sale of the property of a third person under an execution. But the Federal court cannot restrain the execution of process from a state court; denying authority of Cropper v. Coburn, supra, on the last proposition.

And a remedy at law to have an execution recalled will not bar an injunction against levy and sale on an execution issued on a dormant judgment. Krinke v. Parish, 9 Ohio, C. C. 141, 2 Ohio Dec. 85.

And the remedy of trespass or trover is not adequate where partnership property is levied on for a debt of one of the firm. Cropper v. Coburn, supra.

And the remedy of replevin or damages is inadequate to protect mortgagees of the rolling stock of a railroad from an execution sale, where the statute prevents a severance of the property, and the mortgagees are not entitled to the possession. Central Trust Co. v. Moran, 56 Minn. 183, 29 L. R. A. 212.

b. Real property.

In regard to the remedies at law preventing an injunction against the sale of real property on execution, the cases below suggesting such remedies must be examined in connection with the long line of authorities for and against injunctions supra, VIII. b, c, and X, and XV., as the cases given below are simply suggestive rather than declaratory as to the uniformity in denying injunctions where another remedy exists. In fact it may be said that nearly all the cases that deny injunctive relief against execution sales of real property do so on the ground that where complainant has a good title the sale will not prejudice him, and the remedy of defending an action of ejectment in such cases bars the right of injunction.

The remedy of an action to quiet title prevents an injunction against an execution sale that is void. Drake v. Jones, 27 Mo. 428.

And the failure to exercise the remedy at law by caveat against a grant of title, and by redemption, prevents an injunction against proceedings to complete a void sheriff's sale. Lafferty v. Conn, 3 Sneed, 221.

And the remedy at law by setting up ownership and right to redeem prevents an injunction against a judgment to recover possession. York Mfg. Co. v. Cutts, 18 Me. 204.

And a remedy at law to contest title prevents an injunction against a sale under mechanic's lien. Coughron v. Swift, 13 Ill. 414.

And the remedy by ejectment bars an injunction in favor of an executor against an execution sale of real estate for the debts of an heir. Johnson v. Connecticut Bank, 21 Conn. 148.

In Roman Catholic Archbishop v. Shipman, 60 Cal. 580, where an injunction was refused against the sale of real property belonging to a third party, as extrinsic evidence was not necessary to protect the title, it was suggested that there was a remedy against the enforcement of the judgment by asking the court rendering judgment to refuse a writ of fi. fa., or by superseding it, or by an original action to enjoin for matters subsequent to the judgment, or to have adverse claim determined under Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 738.

But in Williamson v. Russell, 18 Va. 612, it was held that the remedy at law of damages against a sheriff for ejecting a person not a party to a suit under a writ of fi. fa. will not prevent an injunction against execution of a writ.

XIX. Irregularities.

a. Execution.

1. Condition precedent.

Irregularities in the proceedings prior to the issuing of the execution will not be ground for injunction, unless a mandatory statute is violated.

So, where a defendant fails to appeal, or join in the appeal taken by the plaintiff, and thereby acquiesces in the judgment, he cannot after affirmation obtain an injunction, although a fi. fa. was issued before the judgment of the supreme court was recorded in the court below. Savolè v. Thibodaux, 20 La. Ann. 51.

And irregularity in quashing a forthcoming bond will not be ground for enjoining an execution on the original judgment against the surety who did not sign the forthcoming bond, as there is a remedy in the court issuing the execution to supersede the same. Thomas v. Tappan, Freem. Ch. (Miss.) 472.

And an injunction will not be granted against an execution sale on an execution sale bond, for irregularities in the affidavit on which execution issued, where the judgment was destroyed by burning the court-house, as La. act March 18, 1880, authorizing an injunction in certain cases, does not apply to an injunction against an execution on a twelve-months' bond. Wafer v. Wafer, 7 La. Ann. 542.

And the remedy at law to restrain an execution for irregularities in the proceedings will prevent an injunction against the same at the instance of a purchaser. Wagner v. Pegues, 10 S. C. N. S. 259.

An order of seizure and sale issued without the production of the complete evidence required by law will not authorize an injunction, as this is §0 L. R. A.

not one of the grounds, under La. Code Pr. art. 739, providing eight grounds for arresting the sale under a seizure; and there is also a remedy by appeal. Dupre v. Anderson, 45 La. Ann. 1134.

And that an execution on a forfeited fi. fa. bond was issued without the sanction of the court is not ground for enjoining the same. Bryan v. Knight, 1 Tex. 180.

And a fi. fa. on a replevin bond will not be enjoined on the ground that the same was issued without precept where the creditor has ratified the act of the clerk. Clarkson v. White, 4 J. J. Marsh. 529, 20 Am. Dec. 229. But see Berry v. Nichols, infra.

In Berry v. Nichols, 96 Ind. 287, the bill of complaint alleging that the writ of vendi. exp. issued without a precept was sufficient to set aside the sale, as Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 741, provides that a vendi. exp. can only issue on a precept; but a sale should not be perpetually enjoined; and the real estate should not be released from the lien of the judgment.

And in Bryan v. Knight, supra, it was said that if a bond in fi. fa. was not taken in conformity to the law, and was not such an one as an execution could issue upon, it might be ground for injunction.

2. Form.

An injunction will not be granted against an execution sale on account of the form of the execution, or variance in the same, as the remedy in the court issuing the same is generally adequate and sufficient. (See further, Party, infra.)

So, an irregularity in the form of an execution will not be ground for an injunction, as there is a remedy in the court issuing the execution. Trieste v. Enslin (Ala.) 17 So. Rep. 356.

And the variance between the names in the execution and judgment, where the names are stated in the judgment roll, will not authorize an injunction against the judgment or execution levy on land at the instance of a third party. Hill v. Gordon, 45 Fed. Rep. 276.

And that the execution did not conform to the judgment will not be ground for enjoining the sale, as there is a remedy in the court issuing execution by motion for correction. Martin v. Piter, 96 Ind. 245.

In an action by defendant to quiet title after an execution sale, and to enjoin the purchasers, on the ground that the order of sale was not a true copy of the original and that the real estate was not sold on a fi. fa. issued on the judgment, it was held, under 2 Ind. Rev. Stat. 1876, p. 223, providing that a sheriff's return entered on the execution docket shall be a record, that the truth of such record cannot be impeached without a direct proceeding against the officer. Fry v. Gallaspie, 61 Ind. 478.

And executions will not be adjudged void which are valid upon their face, where no attempt has been made to set aside or quash the same. Beard v. Foreman, 1 Ill. 308, 12 Am. Dec. 197.

A sale on execution of personal property of the surety on a coast bond will not be enjoined, although the execution is void on its face, and although the justice had no authority to issue the same, as there is a remedy at law to compel the justice to try the question made by affidavit of illegality, and the justice can be compelled to hear and try such claim. Wordehoff v. Evers, 18 Fla. 389.

And an execution not under seal will not be ground for enjoining the same. Jlisaun v. Stebbins, 41 Wis. 235.

3. Time.

Injunctions will not be granted on account of premature issuance of a writ of seizure, execution, or delay in issuing the same.

So, premature issuance of a writ of seizure and sale will not authorize an injunction, as a new writ will immediately lie under the same order. Williams v. Douglass, 47 La. Ann. 1377; Dayton v. Commercial Bank, 6 Rob. (La.) 17.

So, an injunction will not be granted against an execution as having prematurely issued under the stay law, where complainant does not bring himself within the terms of the stay law. Windisch v. Gussett, 30 Tex. 744.

And delay in issuing an execution will not be ground for enjoining an execution sale, as against a purchaser for value, as no one but the defendant can object to irregularity in an execution. Wagner v. Pegues, 10 S. C. N. S. 259.

4. Party.

Injunctions have been granted where execution is improperly issued against stockholders, and sometimes the death of the plaintiff has been cause for injunctions where the executions ignored that fact; but on this point there is some conflict of authority. To obtain an injunction for irregularity as to the party named in the execution, the complainant must be in danger of injury, or else it will not be granted.

An injunction was granted to prevent a creditor having a judgment against a banking company from enforcing it as against an alleged shareholder whose relation as such to the company had long ceased to exist, though technically he was still a shareholder. Bargate v. Shortridge, 5 H. L. Cas. 297, 24 L. J. Ch. 457.

Where an execution was issued against stockholders individually on a judgment against the corporation, and there is no adjudication that certain persons were members, the same will be enjoined, as the execution should follow the judgment and run against the corporation, with a clause that it be levied on the property of the members and leave it to the officer to determine if they are members. Hampson v. Weara, 4 Iowa, 18, 66 Am. Dec. 116. See also Stout v. La Follette, 64 Ind. 365, supra, XI. b. 1, as to levy on stock; Weber v. Bullock, 19 Colo. 214; and Anderson v. Riddle, 10 Mo. 23, supra, VIII. b.

Where the plaintiff named in execution is dead the sale should be enjoined. Dailey v. Wynn, 33 Tex. 614.

So, where there is no indorsement on the execution as required by Iowa Rev. § 8264, providing that after death of the plaintiff an execution may be issued, but the clerk must indorse the death and the names of the personal representatives on the execution, an injunction will be granted. Meek v. Bunker, 38 Iowa, 169.

But in Rooks v. Williams, 13 La. Ann. 374, an injunction was refused where a fi. fa. was issued in the name of the decedent instead of in the name of the administrator, as relief could be obtained by paying the debt to the administrator.

And where an execution was issued in the name of an executor of the deceased partner instead of in the name of the surviving partner, proceedings thereon will not be enjoined at the instance of the debtor who does not tender into court the money, where he claims that a third party is asserting an attachment against the same. Hastings v. Cropper, 3 Del. Ch. 165.

An assignment of the right in a seizure to a third party, without notice to the defendant, will not be ground for enjoining the sale, where no tender is made of the amount due. Walker v. Gillavaso, 26 La. Ann. 42.

But the assignor of a mortgage and judgment will be restrained at the instance of his assignee, from issuing process thereon for the use of his assignee, where such assignor has not the authority to take such proceedings, although he may have the power of attorney to collect the same to be paid by him to his assignee, but not the power to sue out process, where the sale would destroy the lien of complainant. Lealey v. Shock, 3 Houst. (Del.) 180.

A defendant who does not appeal cannot obtain an injunction against the execution on the ground that it also included in it the names of the parties and their sureties appealing. Kendrick v. Rice, 18 Tex. 254.

Fees paid to counsel in prosecuting an injunction against an illegal seizure because the defendant was dead when suit was filed and was named in the writ cannot be recovered by the plaintiff of the defendant where the injunction is allowed. Hill v. Noe, 4 La. Ann. 304.

5. Excessive.

There is some difference in the cases in regard to injunctions for excessive executions owing to the facts in each case. It seems that an injunction will not be generally granted against the excess unless the balance is tendered, or where the excess is small, or where there is a remedy in the court issuing execution, and will not be granted on account of there being several executions issued.

Where a credit was allowed in the judgment, but not in the body of the fi. fa., but was indorsed on the back of it, with a certificate by the clerk under a seal of court, an injunction should not be granted against the sale or the execution. Howly v. Kemp, 2 La. Ann. 340.

And that an execution is excessive in the amount of $10 will not be ground for enjoining the same. Jilson v. Stebbins, 41 Wis. 235.

And an execution against a surety on a claim bond in excess of the penalty will not be enjoined as there is a remedy in the court from which the execution is issued. Trieste v. Enslin (Ala.) 17 So. Rep. 356.

An execution issued for more than the amount due will not authorize an injunction against the whole of the execution. Rowly v. Kemp, supra.

And under La. act 1855, § 4, p. 324, limiting an injunction against a fi. fa. for subsequent payment to the amount pleaded, the same rule applies to mistake in issuing writs of fi. fa., and the right to enjoin is limited to the amount occasioned by the error of the officer, and does not extend to the whole judgment. Barrow v. Robichaux, 14 La. Ann. 203.

And an execution for a greater amount than due will not be enjoined, where the amount admitted to be due is not tendered. Eaton v. Markley, 123 Ind. 123.

But in Harper v. Terry, 16 La. Ann. 216, it was said that if a fi. fa. issues for more than is due upon the judgment, the remedy is by injunction against the sale, under La. Rev. Stat. p. 246, §§ 3, 4.

A sale will not be enjoined because made under several writs, or because several writs on the same judgment are issued at the same time.

The improper issue of a second execution will not authorize an injunction against the sale, as the remedy is in the court issuing it. Gregory v. Ford, 14 Cal. 138, 73 Am. Dec. 639.

And the same was held where two executions were issued for the same debt to different counties at the same time. Elliott v. Elmore, 16 Ohio, 27.

And was refused against an execution sale made under three different writs, two in the name of different parties, one being a writ of fi. fa., as the objection is without force. Walker v. Villavaso, 26 La. Ann. 43.

b. Levy.

1. Excessive.

That a levy is excessive will not be ground for enjoining the sale, and that hard times will prevent a fair sale will not be ground for injunction, although an injunction was allowed in one case.

An injunction will not be granted against excessive levy, where the bill is filed by unsecured creditors, and the judgments are not attacked. Dodd v. Solomons, 98 Ga. 314.

Or where the property did not bring the amount of the judgment and the sale was fair. Allarood v. Cook, 92 Ga. 670.

And an injunction will not be granted for excessive levy, as La. Code Pr. arts. 652, 653, provide a remedy by reduction. Dabbs v. Hemken, 3 Rob. (La.) 123; Lambeth v. Sentell, 83 La. Ann. 691; Hefner v. Hesse, 29 La. Ann. 149.

And an excessive levy of an execution upon realty will not be enjoined, as there is a remedy by motion to quash the same, if any injury could result. Palmer v. Gardiner, 77 Ill. 143.

So, an excessive levy on real property is not of itself a cause for injunction against the sale,—especially where the debtor does not offer personal property to the officer sufficient to satisfy the execution. Cook v. De la Garza, 13 Tex. 431.

And a levy will not be enjoined as excessive, and as made without noticing growing crops of great value, where such levy was made in small divisions so as to sell in parcels, and complainant had gathered and pocketed proceeds of the growing crop. Saffold v. Foster, 75 Ga. 238.

And that the levy was excessive, and the property capable of being subdivided, where the evidence is conflicting, will not be cause for injunction. Brunner v. Royal, 89 Ga. 776.

Hard times is not a ground for enjoining execution and sale, as this is no reason why it should not be sold for what it would bring to pay a debt justly due, and reduced to judgment and proceeding under final process. Winn v. Henderson, 63 Ga. 385; Poullain v. English, 57 Ga. 492. But see Ex parte Grimbail, infra.

In Ex parte Grimbail, T. U. P. Charit. (Ga.) 183, an injunction was granted to stay an execution sale for five months, on depositing with the sheriff sufficient property, the valuation to be ascertained by the price three months preceding the embargo act, as such act produced a national calamity of depression and it would have been ruinous and against conscience to allow a sale to be forced at that time, and a hardship and oppressive. The later cases immediately supra overrule this decision in effect, but do not refer to it.

2. Mode, manner, and description.

Irregularities in the mode of levy, or description of the property seized, have generally been held insufficient grounds for injunction, where the description is sufficiently accurate to easily identify the land. Bogges v. Lowrey, 78 Ga. 539.

And so with personal property levied upon, where the defendant knew what property was seized. Deville v. Hayes, 23 La. Ann. 550.

And the failure of the sheriff to take personal property into his possession will not authorize the debtor to enjoin the sale, as, if not seized, the debtor would have no ground of complaint. Ibid.; Gusman v. De Poret, 88 La. Ann. 333.

And an injunction against the sale of slaves was not granted on the ground that one of the slaves was not in the county or in the possession of the sheriff, and that such a sale would be at a ruinous price, where it was the fault of the plaintiff that the sheriff had not taken possession. Calderwood v. Trent, 9 Rob. (La.) 227.

And a surety on a forthcoming bond cannot obtain an injunction against an execution thereon on the ground of irregularity in the levy of the execution for which the bond was given, where the levy was made by the sheriff coming into a store with the execution, and the debtor supposed that both parties considered that the levy was made on the goods, and the debtor recognized the levy. Baine v. Williams, 10 Smedes & M. 113.

3. Notice.

If no notice of the levy is given as required by statute, an injunction will be granted, but if the objection is that the notice was defective on account of time, an injunction will not be granted.

A temporary injunction was granted where the plaintiff in the injunction had no notice of any levy until after the sale. Brunner v. Royal, 89 Ga. 776.

And under La. Code Pr. arts. 654, 655, requiring notice of seizure to be given to the defendant in execution three days prior to the advertisement, the failure to give such notice will render the sale void, and an injunction will be granted against making the sale. Lapene v. McCan, 28 La. Ann. 749.

And under La. Code Pr. arts. 575, 624, providing for notice of judgment to be served on the defendant, an execution of a writ of f. fa. will be enjoined, where such notice is not given. Greene v. Johnson, 21 La. Ann. 484.

And an injunction will be granted against a mortgage sale, where the notice of order of seizure and sale was not served upon the tutrix before she was confirmed, she being a necessary party in executory proceedings on the mortgage. O'Hara v. Folwell, 28 La. Ann. 370.

But irregularity in giving plaintiff three days' notice of seizure of his land, instead of five as required by law, will not authorize an injunction, where another seizure can be made immediately by taking out an alias order. Morgan v. Whitesides Curator, 14 La. 277.

c. Sale.

1. Notice and advertisement.

Irregularities in notices and advertisements seldom entitle the complainant to an injunction, as such irregularities usually are not prejudicial, and there is a remedy in the court from which the process or order of sale issued. But an injunction was granted where the advertisement was published in a Sunday paper.

Irregularities in the proceeding of the sheriff in not giving proper notice of the sale will not authorize an injunction preventing a writ of possession. Wilson v. Miller, 30 Md. 82, 96 Am. Dec. 568.

And where a waiver of an advertisement is made by the debtor, an attempt to withdraw such waiver will not authorize an injunction, where the advertisement is dispensed with. Borron v. Solibellos, 28 La. Ann. 365.

And that a sale of property seized on an execution was advertised before the expiration of the three days allowed for a notice of seizure, will not authorize an injunction against the sale, where more than the necessary delay between the seizure and sale was allowed. Dabbs v. Hemken, 3 Rob. (La.) 123.

So, an execution sale will not be enjoined, because the advertisements were all posted in the same village, and not in three different points in the parish, where the ground for injunction is that they were not made by a duly authorized officer, and that the description was indefinite. Dorsey v. Hills, 4 La. Ann. 103.

And a sale made under an order of the orphans' court to pay debts of deceased will not be enjoined on the ground that the advertisements are uncertain or insufficient, and the orphans' court has full power to correct the same. Parker v. Allen (N. J.) 3 Cent. Rep. 475.

And a slight variance between the description of the property advertised, and that in the notice of seizure, which is not misleading, will not authorize an injunction against the sale. Dabbs v. Hemken, 3 Rob. (La.) 123.

So, the error in advertising a sale for cash, having been corrected in a subsequent advertisement, will act authorize an injunction against the sale. McMicken v. Morgan, 9 La. Ann. 208.

Insufficiency in description in an execution sale of the interest of the debtor in the land will not authorize an injunction, as, if the description is insufficient, there will be no sale, and the party complaining will not be prejudiced, and if there is a good sale, it should not be enjoined. Henderson v. Hoy, 26 La. Ann. 159.

And insufficiency of advertisement will not authorize an injunction against an administrator's sale, as there is a remedy in the court where the proceedings are pending. Parker v. Allen (N. J.) 3 Cent. Rep. 476.

And an injunction will not be granted to restrain an execution sale on account of insufficiency in advertising the quality of animals, where the proof does not establish this fact. Dorsey v. Hills, 4 La. Ann. 106.

And an assignor of a mortgage cannot enjoin a judgment against him or set aside the sale in favor of the assignee for the deficiency, where the master failed to give the assignee personal notice of the sale as he had promised, and he was thereby prevented from bidding on the property, as the negligence of the master acting as his agent is not sufficient reason to deprive the purchaser of the benefit of his purchase. Crumpton v. Baldwin, 42 Ill. 168.

A sale under foreclosure will not be enjoined at the instance of defendant on the assumption that the sheriff and district court will subsequently misinterpret a new statute in regard to redemption. Gordon v. Bodwell (Kan.) 36 Pac. Rep. 1044.

But under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2000, prohibiting labor on Sunday, an advertisement of sheriff's sale in a Sunday newspaper is void, and such sale may be enjoined. Shaw v. Williams, 67 Ind. 153, 44 Am. Rep. 766.

In Clement v. Oakley, 2 Rob. (La.) 90, it was said that an injunction is the proper remedy to arrest an order of seizure, for alteration in the property by subdivision and changes in names of streets and squares, on the ground that the seizure notices and advertisements were defective.

On dissolution of an injunction against the execution of a deed under a fl. fa. on account of the advertisement of the sale, a judgment should not be rendered against the complainant for the amount of the judgment at law. McDonald v. Cook, 11 Mo. 633.

2. Appraisement.

The failure to make an appraisement required by law will generally be sufficient ground for an injunction; but this was refused where the defendant was not prejudiced and had a remedy in the court rendering judgment.

A sale "without appraisement" will be enjoined where the clerk improperly indorsed on the execution "without appraisement," when the indorsement should have been the reverse. Robinson v. Perry, 4 Tex. 373.

And a junior mortgagee may have an injunction against the execution of a fl. fa. on the ground that the sheriff was about to sell the mortgaged property without an appraisement as required by law, which would cause loss to the mortgagee. Robertson v. Travis, 4 La. Ann. 151.

So, where no notice to appoint appraisers or appraisement was ever made, as contemplated by law, and the said property was adjudicated for a sum below two thirds of its value. Drouet v. LaCroix, 28 La. Ann. 123.

But in Walker v. Villavaso, 28 La. Ann. 43, it was held that where no legal notice of appraisement was made or served, but the plaintiff had the benefit of this objection, if it existed, and it could be remedied in future proceedings, an injunction against the sale was denied. (This was the fourth injunction against the sale.)

And the same was held in Robinson v. Chessel-dine, 5 Ill. 334, as there was a remedy by motion to set aside or quash the execution, and if complainant was entitled to have an appraisement, the court on proper application could have an order to that effect indorsed on the execution.

3. Costs.

An injunction was allowed against a resale by an administrator for failure to pay the bid and costs, where the purchaser contested the commissions and expenses only, but offered to submit the same to the county court which ordered the sale and offered to pay all that would be required. Huddleston v. Kempner, 87 Tex. 372, affirming 28 S. W. Rep. 236.

In an injunction against an execution because containing erroneous costs, it is error to enjoin any that are not attacked, and it is error to refer the taxing to an auditor, as this is the province of the court; and judgment damages, and interest should not be rendered in the injunction suit as the statute relating to damages excludes costs. Lockart v. Stuckler, 49 Tex. 763.

4. Time, place, and manner.

Irregularities as to time, place, and manner of making a sale have usually been held insufficient to entitle an injunction.

An injunction will not be granted to restrain a sale not made upon one of the particular days designated by statute, as Fla. act 1844 provides for relief in the court rendering judgment to stay the same and control process. Robinson v. Yon, 8 Fla. 350.

An order for injunction against a sale under execution is not effectual until the execution of the bond required by the order, where it was claimed that the sheriff had agreed to an adjournment of the sale while an injunction was being obtained against the sale of an equity of redemption, but such sale could not have been prevented on account of other executions. Pell v. Lander, 8 B. Mon. 554.

And an injunction will not be granted against a sale of fixtures at the court-house, under a mortgage foreclosure, as La. Code Pr. art. 603, providing for the sale of movables at the place where seized, does not apply. Walker v. Villavaso, 28 La. Ann. 42.

And an injunction against completion of a sheriff's sale on the ground that the sale was made in entirety will not be granted on conflicting evidence; besides, the sheriff has discrimination as regards the mode of making sales. Holmes v. Steele, 28 N. J. Eq. 173.

Or where different lots of land have been sold en masse greatly below their value. Ballance v. Loomis, 23 Ill. 83.

And the same was held under Colo. Gen. Laws, chap. 63, § 1416, providing that property if susceptible of division shall be sold in such quantities as shall be necessary to satisfy the execution and costs, where the property was sold four different times during the year and in no instance did it bring more than the debt and costs, and there was an offer to sell the property separately and no bids were received. White v. Crow, 110 U. S. 163, 23 L. ed. 113.

A sale of land specifically pledged for the debt in judgment will not be enjoined in order to have it surveyed and subdivided, where the debtor had ample time to have the same done before judgment so as to sell each tract separately. Reeves v. Boiles, 95 Ga. 402.

And the failure of the debtor to resist the manner of sale will prevent an injunction against permitting the purchaser to use the property pending an action to annul the sale, where pews in a church are sold as ground rents in a lump. City Bank v. McIntyre, 8 Rob. (La.) 467.

An execution sale of the undivided one half of a plantation will not be enjoined for failure to divide the same into lots, as provided for in the Constitution, where it could not be divided into lots. Borron v. Solibello, 28 La. Ann. 868.

And an injunction will not be granted against the completion of a sheriff's sale on the ground of misunderstanding in reference to a matter of law on the part of the bystanders as to whether or not a building on the ground must come down, or that the sheriff refused to adjourn the sale, or that the bidder was an agent of the buyer and thus bought the property at a lower price. Skilman v. Holcomb, 12 N. J. Eq. 131.

5. Officer.

Irregularities in regard to the authority of the officer making the sale are generally regarded as insufficient to obtain an injunction.

That a new court commissioner was not reappointed on division of the state of Virginia to complete a sale made in West Virginia, under a decree in force when the state was formed, will not be ground for enjoining the sale, as such commissioners are not public officers. Shields v. McClung, 6 W. Va. 79.

And an injunction will not be granted against a sale of land under execution, on the ground that the party making the sale is a deputy of a sheriff who has absconded, but the fact has not been judicially determined. Ballance v. Loomis, 22 Ill. 82.

And an heir is not a proper party to object that a second master in foreclosure to make a sale was appointed without notice to the administrator, when such an heir is not a party, or necessary party, in the foreclosure proceedings. Merritt v. Daffin, 24 Fla. 320.

And an execution sale will not be enjoined on the ground that the officer levying styles himself a special-deputy sheriff. Miller v. Clements, 54 Tex. 351.

As to making officer a party, see infra, XX. c.

XX. Effect of injunction on executions, sales, and final process.

a. Release of errors.

An injunction against a sale under execution which does not attack a judgment is not a release of errors. Fahs v. Roberts, 54 Ill. 192.

In matters prior to and including the judgment. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. v. Todd, 40 Ill. 89.

b. Release of lien.

As to the effect of injunctions on execution sales and final process some of the cases base the decision on the question of the return of the officer, and hold that a return "stayed by injunction" releases the levy and lien. Blabee v. Hall, 8 Ohio, 448; Taggart v. Hill, infra; Keith v. Wilson, 3 Met. (Ky.) 201.

And the same was said to be the rule in Eldridge v. Chambers, 8 B. Mon. 411; Davies v. Myers, 13 B. Mon. 511; Newlin v. Murray, infra.

Where there are several executions in the hands of the officer, and the senior execution is stayed by injunction, and he sells on the junior execution, he must apply the money to that execution. Newlin v. Murray, 63 N. C. 566; Conway v. Jett, 3 Yerg. 481, 24 Am. Dec. 590.

But not where the injunction is dissolved before the day of the sale. Duckett v. Dalrymple, 1 Rich. L. 148.

But where the kind of property levied upon is discussed in the opinion, the weight of authority is that an injunction releases the lien of a levy upon personal property. Overton v. Perkins, Mart. & Y. 387.

And in McCamy v. Lawson, 3 Head, 256; Rocco v. Parczyk, 9 Lea, 388; Miller v. Estill, 8 Yerg. 452; and Porter v. Cooke, Peck (Tenn.) 30,—it was said that an injunction releases the lien of a levy of a f. fa. on personal property.

And the plaintiff has no claim on the sheriff for 30 L. R. A.

releasing goods, where there is an injunction against the sale. Taggart v. Hill, 2 Hayw. (N. C.) 81, N. C. Conf. Rep. 164.

In Ross v. Poythress, 1 Wash. (Va.) 120, the court declined to express an opinion as to the effect of an injunction obtained upon an execution against goods and chattels after seizure, saying that it was probably settled by Va. act 1791, which, directing a restitution of the money levied, would seem to include inferior cases, and to extend, by an equitable construction, to the restitution of goods seized on execution, and not sold.

But in Pettingill v. Moss, 3 Minn. 222, it was held that where a levy on personal property has been enjoined, the sheriff may complete the sale after dissolution of the injunction.

And in Flowers v. Fletcher, Sneed (Ky.) 225, it was said that where an execution has been levied, or even the money made, but not paid to the plaintiff, if the defendant obtains an injunction, the property is to be restored or the money returned to the defendant by the sheriff. The distinction as to the kind of property levied on is not discussed.

If an injunction is obtained after execution executed, and the goods are in the hands of the sheriff, and he sells them without process, he will be ordered to pay the proceeds into court. Franklyn v. Thomas, 3 Meriv. 225.

And in Hawshaw v. Parkins, 2 Swanst. 539, it was said that after an execution issued against the goods and an injunction then issued, the sheriff might proceed to sell; but the court will in special cases stay the money in his hands.

And in Conway v. Jett, 3 Yerg. 481, 24 Am. Dec. 590, where the sheriff was sought to be held liable for not selling under other executions that came to his hands after an injunction was granted against an execution levied on negroes, it was held that the injunction does not release the levy so as to subject the property to other executions, unless the order of the judge requires security to be given in the injunction suit.

And where personal property had been levied on, it was held that under Miss. act 1824, giving to judgment creditors a lien from the time of entry of judgment, an injunction against an execution levy does not displace the lien, but its execution is simply restrained until dissolution of the injunction. Smith v. Everly, 4 How. (Miss.) 178.

Where the question as to the effect of the injunction on the lien was discussed with reference to the kind of property, the weight of authority is that, where the property levied on is real estate, the lien is not divested by the injunction. Overton v. Perkins, Mart. & Y. 387; Porter v. Cooke, Peck (Tenn.) 30; Miller v. Estill, 8 Yerg. 452 (Haywood, J.); Pettingill v. Moss, 3 Minn. 222; Knox v. Randall, 24 Minn. 479; Lynn v. Gridley, Walk. (Miss.) 548, 12 Am. Dec. 591; Anderson v. Tydings, 8 Md. 427; Gibbes v. Mitchell, 2 Bay, 120; Boyd v. Harris, 1 Md. Ch. 466.

In Rocco v. Parczyk, 9 Lea, 388, and McCamy v. Lawson, 3 Head, 256, it was said that the lien of a levy on real estate was not discharged by an injunction.

There are some cases in regard to the effect of an injunction on final process, which do not discuss the distinction as to a levy on real or personal property, and some of the cases do not disclose the kind of property levied upon, and there is such a conflict that it is difficult to state clearly a rule that should control in such cases.

A sci. fa. is not necessary to obtain a writ of h. fa. where the execution of the same has been stayed by injunction, and not more than a year has elapsed since the affirmance by the court of appeals of the decree of dissolution. Nolan v. Seekright, 6 Munf. 185.

And in Gibbes v. Mitchell, 2 Bay, 120, it was held that an injunction does not release the lien of a levy, and after dissolution the sheriff may proceed to sell after a year and a day without a sci. fa., or even after he is out of office. (The levy in this case was on negroes.)

And in Hefner v. Hesse, 29 La. Ann. 149, it was said that the injunction merely suspended the executions, and it may be that they have as much force on dissolution as they had on the day they were issued. This case does not refer to Dugat v. Babin, infra.

And where the defendant had caused the delay by an injunction, an execution will not be set aside because sued out above a year after the judgment without a sci. fa. to revive it. Micbel v. Cue, 2 Burr. 660. But the converse was held in Booth v. Booth, 1 Salk. 323.

And in Miller v. Estill, 8 Yerg. 452, it was said that the general lien of a judgment is defeated when enjoined and a levy is not made in twelve months, as against a purchaser.

And in Lockridge v. Biggerstaff, 2 Duv. 281, 87 Am. Dec. 496, it was held that an injunction arrests the execution of a fi. fa. though levied, and discharges the lien notwithstanding the injunction is wrongfully sued out. The creditor should sue out a new fi. fa. on dissolution of the injunction and not a vendi. exp. (The kind of property is not stated.)

Under La. Code Pr. art. 700, providing that so long as the injunction continues the limit for making returns does not affect the right enjoined, as it is doubtful whether a sheriff can make a sale on the writ after the injunction against the same has been dissolved. Dugat v. Babin, 8 Mart. N. S. 391. But see Hefner v. Hesse, 29 La. Ann. 149.

A sale under an execution cannot be made after the return day of the same, although the sale has been prevented by an injunction which has been dissolved, as Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 7, providing that the time that an officer is restrained from making a sale shall not be considered, does not apply to § 8 of the same chapter which provides that executions shall be returnable ninety days after date. Welker v. Hinze, 16 Ill. App. 323.

And under Miss. act Feb. 24, 1844, Hutch. Code, 232, providing that the lien of a judgment shall cease within two years from the passage of the act, where an execution levied on land was restrained for more than two years after the passage of that act on a judgment rendered prior thereto, there being no saving clause in the act, the lien of the judgment was gone. Kilpatrick v. Byme, 25 Miss. 571.

An order of sale differs from an ordinary execution, and an injunction against the sale under the latter where the validity of process is not questioned does not suspend the process, but the sheriff may sell other property; but he cannot do this under an order of sale which is enjoined. Seligson v. Collins, 64 Tex. 314.

The execution of an order of sale cannot be arrested except by injunction. State v. Judge of 2d Dist. Ct. 30 La. Ann. 238.

In Anonymous, 6 Mod. 120, where the holder for a term of years was kept out of possession by reason of his judgment and execution in ejectment having been enjoined, a motion to renew the term on account of the injunction was denied. (Holt, Ch. J., said he considered there wanted a clock over against the hall-gate.)

Md. act 1799, chap. 79, § 10, requiring the sheriff to restore possession of property levied upon where the sale is enjoined, does not require him to return the money instead of the property, where the sale was completed before the injunction issued; and the county court cannot require such return before the injunction is made perpetual. Dail v. Travessa, 8 Gill, 41.

c. Officer.

An officer who disregards the injunction and proceeds with the sale is a trespasser, if he has knowledge that an injunction has been granted. There is some conflict of authorities as to whether he should be made a party defendant in the injunction suit.

An officer is a trespasser if he has knowledge of an injunction against a sale, and proceeds to make the sale, even if not served with notice. Turner v. Gatewood, 8 B. Mon. 613; Buffandeau v. Edmondson, 17 Cal. 436, 79 Am. Dec. 139; Stinson v. McMurray, 8 Humph. 330.

And where an injunction had been granted against proceedings at law, and exception was taken to special bail, and the sheriff ruled to produce the body of the defendant, it was a contempt of the injunction. Bullen v. Ovey, 16 Ves. Jr. 141.

But where a sheriff's sale was restrained until the further order of the court in a collateral case, and the report of the referee dismissed the complaint for the injunction, and the sheriff made the sale, it was held that the sheriff was entitled to fees, as the report of the referee under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1223, stands as a decision of the court. Van Gelder v. Van Gelder, 26 Hun, 356.

Some cases hold that the sheriff need not be made a party in a suit to enjoin an execution sale of property of a third party. Holmes v. Chester, 23 N. J. Eq. 79. See this case infra.

And the same was held in a suit to enjoin proceedings on a judgment. Ashton v. Parkinson, 8 Phila. 338.

And the same was held where it was claimed that the sale was unfair. Brooks v. Lewis, 13 N. J. Eq. 214.

And the same was held in a suit to enjoin the sale of exempt property. Stout v. McNeill, 95 N. C. 1; Montgomery v. Whitworth, 1 Tenn. Ch. 174.

But in North v. Peters, 138 U. S. 271, 34 L. ed. 936; Olin v. Hungerford, 10 Ohio, 268; and Blanton v. Hall, 2 Helsk. 424,—which were suits to enjoin the sale of property of a third party, it was held that the sheriff was a necessary party.

And in Burpee v. Smith, Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 327; Edney v. King, 4 Ired. Eq. 466; and Lackay v. Curtis, 6 Ired. Eq. 199,—which suits attacked the judgments and executions, it was held that the sheriff was a necessary party.

And in Spotswood v. Higgenbotham, 6 Munf. 314, where the sheriff took a bail bond and to this non est factum was pleaded, it was held that the sheriff was a necessary party to a suit to enjoin proceedings on the same.

Holmes v. Chester, supra, states that a sheriff is not a necessary party; citing Vernon v. Blackerly, 2 Atk. 147; Farquharson v. Pitcher, 2 Russ. Ch. 87; Joy v. Wirtz, 1 Wash. C. C. 517.

But in Farquharson v. Pitcher the bill for injunction was against the creditor and the sheriff, and the bill was demurred to as multifarious and the demurrer was overruled,—the object of the bill being to prevent the defendants in the equity suit from proceeding against the sheriff, and also to prevent the sheriff from paying the money to the defendants in the equity suit.

In Joy v. Wirtz, supra, the suit was not for injunction, and there was no question about the sheriff; the suit was to set aside a release.

And Vernon v. Blackerly, supra, was a suit for an annuity, and the question was whether the commissioner for building the church should be made a party.

In North v. Peters, supra, the court says: "In a case where the officer has exceeded his authority, he may be proceeded against either by an action for damages, if such remedy be sufficient, or by a writ of injunction to restrain the continued wrongdoing; and it is not essential that the plaintiffs in the writs be joined as parties defendant, where, as in this case, it does not appear, either from the pleadings or the proofs, that they advised or directed the sheriff to seize the particular property, as the property of their judgment debtor." This seems to be the true rule.

In Buffandeau v. Edmondson, supra, where the sheriff was sued for damages in making a sale that was enjoined, and the sheriff was not a party to the injunction suit, it was said: "Being a mere ministerial office with no interest in the subject in controversy, and acting in the execution of the process as the agent of the plaintiff in the writ, we are by no means convinced that he was a necessary party to the proceedings."

And in Nye v. Nightingale, 6 R. I. 420, it was held that where the injunction was against the sheriff and the levying creditor, and a petition for the removal of the cause to the Federal court was filed, the sheriff was such a necessary party that his citizenship prevented a removal of the case.

And in Buffandeau v. Edmondson, 17 Cal. 436, 79 Am. Dec. 130, as to whether it is necessary to make a sheriff a party in a suit to enjoin an execution sale is not determined.

Plaintiffs in an execution need not answer the bill in a suit to enjoin the officer from making a sale, where they do not participate in the acts of the officer, and his answer of justification is sufficient. Beard v. Foreman, 1 Ill. 303, 12 Am. Dec. 197.

Where a levy is made on property of a third person, which property is not described in the writ or order of sale, the sheriff assumes responsibility; and it would seem that in such a case he should be made a party defendant in the injunction suit. But if the property is described in the order of sale an injunction against the plaintiff therein with notice to the sheriff ought to be effectual without making him a party defendant in an injunction suit. This distinction does not appear to be clearly made in these cases—and the text-books do not solve the question nor fully show the conflict in the decisions.

d. Limitation.

While there seems to be some conflict of authorities as to the injunction suspending the statute of limitations, the plaintiff in the action at law is entitled to an injunction to prevent the defendant from pleading the statute as a bar to further proceedings.

A party obtaining an injunction against an execution sale cannot thereafter claim that the lien of the judgment is barred by the statute of limitations when the loss of the lien is occasioned by injunction. Work v. Harper, 31 F. Mis. 109, 66 Am. Dec. 549; Wilkinson v. Flowers, 37 Mis. 579.

Where a judgment has been enjoined until the bar of the statute of limitations applies, an injunction will be granted to restrain the defendant at law from pleading the statute of limitations. Marshall v. Minter, 43 Mis. 606; Sugg v. Thrasher, 30 Mis. 136; Davis v. Hoopes, 33 Mis. 173.

In Robertson v. Alford, 13 Smedes & M. 503, it was held that an injunction against suits at law, under a statute providing for such injunction in a suit of quo warranto against a bank does not suspend the statute of limitations. It was suggested that no punishment for contempt would be imposed by a chancellor if it was necessary to sue to prevent a statutory bar.

In Barker v. Millard, 16 Wend. 572, it was said that an injunction against proceedings at law does not suspend the statute, but the contrary is implied, as the party to a suit in chancery has often applied to that court to restrain the defendant from setting up the statute in an action at law.

XXI. Effect of time upon injunctions, executions, and judgments.

a. Injunctions and executions.

Hart, (Tex.) Dir. art. 1599, limiting the time within which an injunction may be had against judgments to six months, does not apply to injunctions against executions. Clegg v. Varnell, 18 Tex. 294.

Or where the cause arises after judgment. Williams v. Bradbury, 9 Tex. 487; Beardley v. Hall, Id. 119.

And an injunction will be granted against a sale on an execution which issued after more than twelve months from the date of a previous execution. Watson v. Newsham, 17 Tex. 487.

But will not be enjoined in such a case where there is no showing that an intervening execution had not issued. Jordan v. Corley, 42 Tex. 234.

And an execution will not be enjoined after six months' time where delay is not excused in such a case. Pillow v. Thompson, 20 Tex. 206; Doss v. Miller, 6 Tex. 383.

Tex. Rev. Stat. art. 2375, providing for enjoining judgments after a year has elapsed, where delay has been caused by fraud, does not apply to a judgment taken in a foreclosure upon a homestead after a release thereof had been placed on record on account of mistake in the mortgage, where there was no act done or promise made at the time of or after the judgment, but complainant is entitled to a reformation of the judgment omitting the homestead. Williams v. Lumpkin, 36 Tex. 641.

Under Minn. Gen. Stat. chap. 63, § 202, prohibiting an execution from issuing more than ten years from entry of judgment, such an execution is void and will not be enjoined, as it is not a cloud on title. Hanson v. Johnson, 20 Minn. 194. To the same effect, Givens v. Campbell, 20 Iowa, 79.

A defense made on an answer to a summons issued to renew an execution, that notice in the ordinary case had never been served, and an appearance was unauthorized, will prevent an injunction against the execution and judgment. Jackson v. Patrick, 10 S. C. N. S. 197.

But under Ill. Rev. Laws 1833, § 370, providing that if an execution is taken out within one year the judgment shall be a lien on land for seven years, where a purchaser bought after judgment, and an execution was levied four years after the judgment, and a vend. exp. was issued more than eleven years after the judgment, it ceased to be a lien, and a sale thereunder was enjoined at the instance of the purchaser. Riggin v. Mulligan, 9 Ill. 50.

And the defendant in a judgment of foreclosure is entitled to injunction against proceedings upon the execution where no process to enforce the decree was issued until more than five years after its entry. And California Pr. act, § 300, prohibiting an execution after five years, applies to foreclosures. Stout v. Maoy, 22 Cal. 647.

b. Dormant judgments.

Generally injunctions will be granted against executions on dormant judgments, if complainant shows that he is prejudiced thereby. Krinke v. Parish, 9 Ohio C. C. 141, 2 Ohio Dec. 85; Horner v. Marshall, 5 Munf. 406; Davison v. Mackay, 22 Or. 247; Trevino v. Stillman, 48 Tex. 561; Bule v. Crouch, 37 Tex. 53; North v. Swing, 24 Tex. 193. But see Seymour v. Hill, infra.

In Krinke v. Parish, supra, an execution issued on a dormant judgment was enjoined, although such execution might have been recalled on motion.

But injunctions were refused in other cases on questions of pleading and practice, as where the plaintiffs in the judgment are not made parties. Howell v. Foster, 122 Ill. 276.

Or where complainant does not show that he has any property. Tittsworth v. Cook, 49 Ill. App. 307. Or where there is a remedy by motion. Mayo v. Bryte, 47 Cal. 685.

In Seymour v. Hill, 67 Tex. 385, under Tex. Rev. Stat. art. 2874, no injunction shall be granted to stay a judgment, except so much as complainant may show himself equitably entitled to be relieved against and costs; it was held error to enjoin an execution on a dormant judgment which is unpaid. (This case says that this question was not made in the prior Texas cases.)

In Coward v. Chastain, 99 N. C. 443, it was held that an execution sale under a dormant judgment, which is also barred by lapse of time, will not be enjoined, as the sale would pass no title; but it was said that if the evidence of the lapse of time had been before the lower court, an injunction would have been granted by it.

And in Pursell v. Deal, 16 Or. 295, a purchaser of land against which was a dormant judgment, was refused an injunction against an execution which issued under leave of court obtained under Or. Code, § 56, providing for publication service if a cause of action exists, or the defendant is a proper party to an action relating to real property; and the creditor took advantage of the first clause of this section. An injunction will not be granted for irregularity in the exercise of process.

A judgment for slander will be enjoined where, at the time of the alleged slander and at the time of the judgment, the defendant was insane, where such judgment had lain dormant for eight years and the plaintiff had declared his intention never to demand the judgment, although no written release was executed. Horner v. Marshall, 5 Munf. 465.

An execution on a dormant judgment will be enjoined, but the same may be revived in the injunction suit. Trevino v. Stillman, 45 Tex. 561; North v. Swing, 24 Tex. 196. I. T.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

GILLIS et al., Piffs. in Err.,
v.

John GILLIS et al.

(.....Ga.....)

*1. Construing together sections 2414 and 2415 of the Code, which relate to the execution and attestation of wills, the true meaning of the phrase "provided he can swear to the same," as used in section 2415, with reference to the competency of an illiterate or infirm witness, is that such a witness is competent to attest by his mark if, at the time of attesting, he is under no legal disability to testify as a witness; and it is not essential to his competency as an attesting witness to a will that he should be able to swear to or identify his mark at the time the will is offered for probate.

2. Where, upon the trial of an issue of devisavit vel non, a subscribing witness to the will, from want of memory or other cause, is unable or unwilling to testify to its attestation by himself or by the other subscribing witnesses, or to the execution of the will by the testator, or to the fact that the testator was mentally capable of making a will, or where a subscribing witness in his evidence denies the existence of any of these facts, the same may be proved by any competent witness having knowledge thereof, although the latter was not a subscribing witness to the will.

3. The law of mutual wills was not involved in the present case; the evidence warranted the verdict; and there was no error in denying a new trial.

(March 11, 1896.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Emanuel County to review a judgment admitting to probate the will of Sarah Gillis, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

*Headnotes by LUMPKIN, J.

NOTE.—For signature by mark in general, see note to Re Guilfoyle (Cal.) 23 L. R. A. 370, 80 L. R. A.

Messrs. Williams & Smith, Hines & Felder, and A. H. Davis for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Cain & Polbill, A. Herrington, T. M. Saffold, H. R. Daniel, and Evans & Evans for defendants in error.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The nominated executors of the alleged last will of Sarah Gillis propounded the same for probate, and a caveat was filed by some of her heirs at law. On the trial in the superior court, to which court the case had been carried by appeal, there was a verdict for the propounders, and the caveators bring up for review a judgment overruling their motion for a new trial. Besides the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence, and that the court erred in refusing to grant a nonsuit, the motion contained special grounds raising certain questions, the nature of which is disclosed by the headnotes and this opinion.

The paper purporting to be the will was executed by the testatrix on the 13th day of March, 1878. It bears the names of four witnesses, but it was conceded that the last of them signed his name some time after the execution of the paper by the testatrix and its attestation by other witnesses, and it does not appear that he signed in her presence. The appearance, therefore, of the name of this witness upon the paper counts for nothing in determining the question of the legality of its execution. Accordingly, the fact that he signed will be ignored altogether and it will be understood that, in speaking of the subscribing witnesses to the paper, reference to the other three only is intended. One of these signed by making her mark. Another died before the testatrix. The usual and formal attestation clause was used. The paper was offered for probate soon after the death of the testatrix, and about twenty years after its execution and attestation. At the time of probate the two subscribing witnesses then in life were produced. The one who wrote his own name proved the due execution of the paper as a will. The signature of the deceased witness was shown to be in his handwriting. The illiterate witness testified that she had no recollection of attesting the will, and could not swear to the making of her mark. At the same time, however, she did not expressly swear that she did not attest by her mark the paper pro-

1. The first and leading question is, Was the paper legally attested as a will? The execution and attestation of written wills in this state, as to both real and personal property, is provided for in sections 2414 and 2415 of the Code. Section 2414 reads as follows: "All wills (except nuncupative wills) disposing of realty or personalty, must be in writing, signed by the party making the same, or by some other person in his presence, and by his express directions, and shall be attested and subscribed in the presence of the testator by three or more competent witnesses." Section 2415 declares that "a witness may attest by his mark, provided he can swear to the same; but one witness cannot subscribe the name of another, even in his presence and by his direction." Section 2414 was codified from 29 Car. II. chap. 8, § 5, known as the "Statute of Frauds," in reference to devises of real property (Cobb's Dig. p. 1128; Huff v. Huff, 41 Ga. 701), and from an act of January 21, 1852 (Acts 1851-52, p. 104), which prescribes that wills bequeathing personal property shall be executed as are wills devising real property. The statute of frauds and our own act of 1852 each uses the word "credible," and section 2414 of the Code uses the word "competent," as to the three or more witnesses required to attest a will. These two words are, as here used, synonymous. Hall v. Hall, 18 Ga. 40. They mean, in this connection, witnesses who are competent at the time of attestation to testify in a court of justice. Thus, in one of the earlier English decisions, it was said: "The true time for his credibility is the time of attestation; otherwise, a subsequent infamy, which the testator knows nothing of, would avoid his will." Holdfast v. Dowling, 2 Strange, 1253. In Sears v. Dillingham, 12 Mass. 358, the court, after stating that an executor was not a competent witness to prove the execution of a will, said: "But a will to which such an executor is a subscribing witness may be proved by the testimony of the other witnesses; he having been a credible witness, within the statute, at the time of his attestation, and having become incompetent only by accepting the trust." In Patten v. Tallman, 27 Me. 17, it was said: "The competency of an attesting witness to a will is not to be determined upon the state of facts existing at the time when the will is presented for probate, but upon those existing at the time of the attestation." So very pertinent, in this connection, is the text of Schouler on Wills, that we make an extended extract: "Upon common-law principle, the qualification or disqualification of a witness is usually raised with reference to the time when he is called upon to testify. Nor is competency at that date to be left unconsidered; as where, for instance, a witness who subscribed while in sound mind has become insane by the time the probate of the will is at issue, in which case, of course, his testimony cannot be taken. But his incompetency at this latter date does not defeat the will, whose attestation and subscription was a sort of testifying, such as the peculiar transaction called for. To surround himself with a specified number of witnesses at that time competent, was all that any testator could do, in compliance with the statute requirements; and, what was then a proper execution in all respects taking place, a will was produced whose validity could never be impeached for informality. Hence the rule, which reason should now pronounce the universal one, so far as the question remains a material one at all, that the competency of witnesses, like that of the testator, is tested by one's status at the time when the will was executed. If, therefore, a sufficient number of witnesses attest and subscribe properly who at that date are competent, the will remains valid, although death or supervening disability may render any or all of them incapable in fact of testifying by the time the will is offered for probate. In other words, the inconvenience of this last situation is purely casual and incidental, and without direct prejudice to the will itself, which might, indeed, be established on mere proof of handwriting, where the instrument appeared on its face genuine and formal." Section 851. See also section 350, and Jarman, Wills (Rand. & T.'s ed.) p. 225; Higgins v. Carlton, 28 Md. 115, 93 Am. Dec. 666, and note on page 680; Hawes v. Humphrey, 9 Pick. 850, 20 Am. Dec. 481, and note on page 488; Amory v. Fellowes, 5 Mass. 219; Carlton v. Carlton, 40 N. H. 14; Re Holt's Will, 56 Minn. 33, 23 L. R. A. 481.

A witness who signs by his mark, if so capable of testifying, is just as competent a witness under the statute of frauds, our act of 1852, and section 2414 of the Code, as one likewise capable of testifying who writes his own name. This is settled by an unbroken line of authorities. Harrison v. Harrison, 8 Ves. Jr. 185; Addy v. Griz, Id. 504; Davies v. Davies, 9 Q. B. 648; Bailey v. Bailey, 35 Ala. 687; Garrett v. Heslin, 93 Ala. 615; Horton v. Johnson, 18 Ga. 397; Montgomery v. Perkins, 2 Met. (Ky.) 448, 74 Am. Dec. 419; Lord v. Lord, 58 N. H. 7, 42 Am. Rep. 565; Compton v. Milton, 12 N. J. L. 81; Morris v. Kniffin, 37 Barb. 336; Pridgen v. Pridgen, 13 Ired. L. 260; Simmons v. Leonard, 91 Tenn. 183; Jesse v. Parker, 6 Gratt. 57, 53 Am. Dec. 102; 4 Kent, Com. 8th ed. 575; 10 Bacon, Abr. 491; Wms. Exrs. 3d Am. ed. 79; Beach, Wills, § 41; 1 Jarman, Wills (Rand. & T.'s ed.) 212, 214; Schouler, Wills, 331; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 941. And, indeed, our code expressly declares that 'signature' or 'subscription' includes the mark of an illiterate or infirm person." Section 5. The mark is the signature of the witness. Century, Dict. word Signature, 14 Am. & Eng. Enc.

Law, p. 457, word Mark; Anderson, Law Dict. words Mark and Signature.

The subscription of a witness, whether in his own handwriting or by his mark, does not, of course, ipso facto make such witness incompetent because at the time of attestation he may be disqualified by law from testifying in a court of justice on account of infancy, imbecility, crime, or for other causes. But for the proviso in section 2415 of our Code, it cannot be reasonably doubted that the true test for determining the competency of any witness to the execution of a will in this state would certainly be whether or not the witness, at the time of attestation, would be disqualified from testifying in a court of justice. The rule as to witnesses generally, unless changed by that proviso, is beyond question applicable to "markmen." Did the words "provided he can swear to the same," referring to a witness unable to write his name, and who attests by his mark, change the rule? Omitting from the section the words just quoted, the mark of the witness, he being legally capable of testifying when he made it, would be good without any further condition. Suppose he should die or become blind or insane; corruptly refuse to testify to what he knew; forget or be inaccessible; and, for any of these reasons, did not, at the time of probate, in fact swear to the mark, but the other two witnesses did swear that he made it, and proved all other essential facts. Must the will fail? The proviso is new. After very diligent search and inquiry, we have been unable to discover even a trace of it in any book other than our Code, where it appears for the first and only time. Can it be possible that it was intended to revolutionize the law on the subject, and make the validity of a will depend upon the life, the eyesight, the continued sanity, the integrity, the memory, or the accessibility of witnesses? No court should so hold unless constrained by the plainest language to do so. We do not feel so constrained in the present instance. To construe section 2415 as contended for would be to open the door for endangering or destroying all wills. It would be contrary to the old law, and not in harmony with the spirit of the Code. Such an unwise and dangerous innovation should come in language able to withstand the severest verbal criticism. If it be expressed in doubtful phrase, construction may turn aside the danger. See Walker v. Hunter, 17 Ga. 409; Deupree v. Deupree, 45 Ga. 441-448. If the test of the legal competency of the witnesses is to be applied only at the time of probate, a will might be defeated in many ways. If the witness had died before that time, he could not possibly swear to his mark. If he had become blind he could not see the mark, and therefore could not swear to it. He might remember all the circumstances and know that he did make his mark to a will which was properly executed, but, without the aid of his lost vision, he could not swear to it. If he had lost his mind, he could swear to nothing. If he falsely testified that he could not swear to the mark, he would thus defeat the will, and with small risk, for it is always difficult to convict any person of perjury, and hardly possible to do so when the alleged false evidence relates to a mental state of the witness himself. If he had honestly forgotten or could not really identify the mark as his own, the same result would follow. If he was inaccessible or his whereabouts unknown, the mark would remain unsworn to by him.

Surely, neither the original codifiers nor the general assembly can be supposed ever to have contemplated the defeat of a will in any of these ways. If the time for applying the test of competency as to an illiterate witness is when the will is offered for probate, it necessarily follows that, in order to make the subscription of such a witness valid, he must then swear to his mark, or else he does not count at all as a witness to the will. Accordingly, counsel for the plaintiffs in error contended that as the illiterate witness in this case, on account of her failure of memory, could not and did not swear to her mark, her attestation amounted to nothing, and consequently there were but two legal witnesses to the will, and it was therefore void. We cannot think this contention is sound. It goes beyond even the letter of the section under construction. It assumes that the compilers of our Code made a new law, and did not codify an old law. It "builds, like the martlet, on the outward wall." It leads to patent absurdities. It ignores the fact that sections 2414 and 2415 are in pari materia, and must be construed together. It adopts, from two constructions, the one that defeats, rather than the one that upholds, the real purpose of the law. It overlooks the rule that, if the language of any part of section 2415 is devoid of sense, it may be eliminated by the court altogether. It makes the competency of the witness at the time of attestation dependent on his memory or will, or other contingency, at the time of probate. It departs from established authorities, which are laws themselves, the overturning of which would unsettle property rights. It would enable a contestant to defeat a will by successfully tampering with a witness before the trial. And it does not include or suppose the possibility of an illiterate or infirm witness, if in existence, being voluntarily beyond the process of the court, or his whereabouts being unknown, at the time of probate, nor of the death or insanity of such witness before that time. "The presumption against absurdity in the provision of a legislative enactment is probably a more powerful guide to its construction than even the presumption against unreason, inconvenience, or injustice. The legislature may be supposed to intend all of these, but it can scarcely be supposed to intend its own stultification. Accordingly, it has been said that, when to follow the words of an enactment would lead to an absurdity as its consequences, that constitutes sufficient authority to the interpreter to depart from them." Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 264. And see also section 295. Moreover, "in making it requisite to the validity of a will that there should be attesting witnesses who shall subscribe their names to the writing, the law has a threefold purpose: The identification of the paper, the protection of the testator from deception and fraud, and the ascertainment of his testamentary capacity." Beach, Wills, § 89. The three reasons here specified are fulfilled by having three competent witnesses who are not disqualified at the time of attestation from testifying in a court of justice. Therefore, if an illiterate or infirm person, who is requested by a testator to attest his will, is not so disqualified, he is a competent witness to the will, because he is then competent to testify on the three points mentioned, as well as on any others relating to the factum or validity of the will. Whatever evils may exist in having illiterate or infirm persons, who are otherwise competent, attest wills by their marks, it is shown by a uniform current of decisions, and by the opinion of all text-writers, that the sages of the law, from the earliest times to the present, have upheld the attestation of wills by such witnesses making marks for their signatures, and they have never set forth a reason for any change in the law. In the well-considered case of Pridgen v. Pridgen, supra, Nash, J., delivering the opinion of the court, says: To subscribe is to set one's hand to a writing. If, then, the statute is on the part of the testator, in this particular, complied with by making his mark, why is it not satisfied by the witnesses' making their mark? The inconvenience and danger of defeating wills by allowing witnesses to attest whom who cannot write have been strongly urged in the argument. On the other hand, many evils might grow out of a rule confining the attestation to those only who can write." A fortiori, how many evils would exist, as already shown, if the contention of the caveators in this case should be upheld.

There is no act of our legislature or decision of our supreme court before the adoption of our Code that ever changed, or attempted to change, the old law as to witnesses attesting wills by their marks; and there is at least one case decided by this court before the Code went into effect which is in harmony with and upholds the law. See Horton v. Johnson, 18 Ga. 397. How, then, can it be said that the compilers of our Code intended to incorporate into it any other than the prevailing rule of law? It is not to be presumed that they, learned in the law, would, except in rare instances, themselves make a rule of law, when they were only empowered to codify existing laws of force in this state. See act Dec. 9, 1858; Mechanics' Bank v. Heard, 37 Ga. 412; Phillips v. Solomon, 42 Ga. 195, 196; Gardner v. Moore, 51 Ga. 269; Atlanta v. Gate City Gaslight Co. 71 Ga. 106, 119, 120; McDaniel v. Gate City Gaslight Co. 79 Ga. 55. At any rate, "the Code is not to be construed as changing the old law, unless the change be very apparent" (Gardner v. Moore, and Atlanta v. Gate City Gaslight Co. supra); or, "unless the intent to change be clear," as stated in Phillips v. Solomon, supra. It is therefore reasonable to conclude that the codifiers did not intend to create a new rule in Georgia as to the attestation of wills by illiterate or infirm persons, which would, in the manner above pointed out, so seriously affect the validity of wills so attested. It is hardly probable that they would have inserted the words "provided he can swear to the same" if they had supposed they would receive the construction now contended for by the plaintiffs in error. In our opinion, the true interpretation of section 2415 is found by construing it with section 2414. They are in pari materia. Indeed, they cannot be separated, because they relate to the same subject-matter. The rule of law applying to statutes that are in pari materia is that, "where there are earlier acts relating to the same subject, the survey must extend to them; for all are, for the purposes of construction, considered as forming one homogeneous and consistent body of law, and each of them may explain and elucidate every other part of the common system to which it belongs." Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 48, and note thereto, where many authorities are collated. This rule applies with peculiar force to sections of our Code relating to the same subject-matter, and which were codified at the same time, because they must be construed, if possible, to harmonize with each other. Bealle v. Southern Bank, 57 Ga. 274; Thomason v. Fannin, 54 Ga. 363. As was said in the latter case: "If a fair construction can be adopted to prevent such a contradiction by one section of the other, it should be done." Section 2415, read with section 2414, shows that an illiterate or infirm person may attest a will by his mark. Standing by itself, it does not show what the witness is to attest. The whole section is evidently codified from the case of Horton v. Johnson, 18 Ga. 396, which holds that, if another witness signs the name of an illiterate witness, it is an illegal subscription, unless the illiterate witness affixes his mark; and from the case of Hall v. Hall, id. 40, in which it was decided that any witness to a will is competent, provided at the time of attestation he is not disqualified from testifying in a court of justice. This is made plain when section 2415 is construed with section 2414, which, as already stated, is codified from section 5 of the statute of frauds and our act of 1852, which place all witnesses, learned and unlearned, vigorous or infirm, upon the same footing, and render them competent witnesses to a will if by law they are not, at the time of attestation, disqualified from testifying in a court of justice.

It was argued that as section 2414 of the Code distinctly declared, in effect, that all the witnesses to a will must be "competent,"—i. e. capable of testifying,—and by its terms necessarily embraced witnesses who could not write their names, the words "provided he can swear to the same," used in the next section with reference to a witness attesting by his mark, would be merely tautological, if regarded simply as repeating the necessity for competency already plainly and unequivocally required. The force of this position cannot fairly be ignored. In it lies the main strength of the argument on the other side of the question, for it gives much plausibility to the contention that the purpose of the words last quoted was to limit, to some extent, the competency of infirm or illiterate witnesses, by requiring that they should possess at least one other qualification than mere legal capacity to testify, viz., the ability to swear to their marks. It would be unreasonable, if not absurd, to construe the words "can swear" as meaning that the witnesses must have the requisite memory and the keen physical perception which would enable him, after the lapse of weeks, months, and years, to distinguish and identify a mere cross mark or other ordinary device representing his signature. This would certainly be very difficult, if not altogether impossible, if the mark had no peculiarities. It is much more reasonable to refer the question of ability to swear to the mark, not to recollection or accuracy of vision, but to legal capacity to testify. Synonymous with the word "can," in the connection in which it is used in the proviso under consideration, are the expressions "is able to," "has the power to," "has the ability to," "is competent to," "has the capacity to;" or, negatively speaking, "is not unable to," "has not the lack of power to," "has not the inability to," "is not incompetent to," "lacks not the capacity to." Surely, something must be supplied to this proviso by inference in order to give it sense or meaning. We must thus supply the means from which the witness "can" swear, etc. Is it by reason of his retentive memory or any other inherent power, or by reason of a power which does not spring from his own physical or mental capacities as a person in a natural state, but is conferred upon him by law as a member of society? It would not be straining to substitute the synonymous phrase "is competent to" for the word "can," so that the proviso would read: "Provided he is competent to swear to the same." Had the codifiers used this language, certainly it could not be said that the competency they had in view was his ability by reason of memory, rather than his ability to stand the tests which the law applies to all persons alike in passing upon their fitness to testify as witnesses. It is because of the overwhelming and destructive force of natural laws that the only requirement which human law can exact is that the witness must, at the time of attesting, be able to stand the test of competency prescribed in all cases; and it matters not whether he afterwards loses that competency or not. Illiterate or infirm witnesses simply stand upon the same footing as all others. Illiteracy or infirmity will not count against them, but they must, in other respects, come up to the legal standard of competency by which those who wield the pen are measured. We do not mean to insist that the suggestions just made eliminate the tautology. They cannot, for it is there if the words "provided he can swear to the same" mean what we think they do. But granting they are tautological, or even meaningless and utterly useless, if the foregoing argument is worth anything at all, it establishes the conclusion that it is safer and better to thus treat them than to give them a meaning not only out of harmony with all the law, but leading to consequences which the codifiers—we may almost say with certainty—did not anticipate.

In the argument here, our attention was called to the case of Thompson v. Davitte, 59 Ga. 472, as somewhat in point, because it there appeared that an attesting witness, when called upon to prove the execution of a will, stated his unwillingness to swear positively to a mark purporting to be made by him, although he said he thought he made it. That case has, however, afforded us no aid in reaching our present decision, for the only point there was whether a mere statement by a witness of his belief could be regarded as affirmative evidence, and no construction of section 2415 of the Code was then attempted. Indeed, so far as we have been able to ascertain, this court has never before been called upon to construe that section. The correctness of the views upon this question we have above expressed are, we think, confirmed by other considerations, which belong more properly to the next division of this opinion.

2. Error was assigned upon the admission in evidence of the paper propounded, over the objection that there was not sufficient evidence from the subscribing witnesses as to its execution, and also upon admitting the testimony of Mary Gillie as to the execution of the paper by the testatrix and its attestation by the subscribing witnesses, over the objection that she, not being herself a subscribing witness, was incompetent to testify as to these matters. It is well settled that the subscribing witnesses to a will must, if practicable, be called and examined, but the fate of a will does not depend entirely upon their testimony. Upon the trial of an application to prove a will in solemn form, they are, all of them, unless accounted for, indispensably necessary witnesses; but the testimony, even as to the factum of execution, is not confined to them. The fact to be established is the proper execution of the will. If that is proved by competent testimony, it is sufficient, no matter from what quarter the testimony comes, provided the attesting witnesses are among those who bear testimony, or their absence is explained. The inquiry, as in other cases, is whether, taking all the testimony together, the fact is duly established. It is not required that any one or more of the essential facts should be proved by all or any number of the attesting witnesses. The right is simply to have the attesting witnesses examined, no matter what their testimony may be. The law does not allow proof of the valid execution and attestation of a will to be defeated at the time of probate by the failure of the memory on the part of any of the subscribing witnesses (Deupree v. Deupree, 45 Ga. 442, 448; Jackson v. Le Grange, 19 Johns. 386, 10 Am. Dec. 237; Dewey v. Dewey, 1 Met. 349, 35 Am. Dec. 667; Remsen v. Brinckerhoff, 26 Wend. 825, 37 Am. Dec. 260, note; Jauncey v. Thorne, 2 Barb. Ch. 40, 45 Am. Dec. 442, and note; Greenough v. Greenough, 11 Pa. 489, 51 Am. Dec. 567; Lawyer v. Smith, 8 Mich. 411, 77 Am. Dec. 460; Brown v. Clark, 77 N. Y. 369; Beach, Wills, § 39, and cases cited in note 19); or by their even denying their signatures to the will altogether, when such denial is overcome by other competent evidence (Pear- son v. Wightman, 1 Mill, Const. 886, 19 Am. Dec. 686; Re Higgins, 94 N. Y. 554; Hall v. Hall, 18 Ga. 45; Gardner v. Grannis, 57 Ga. 555).

In Deupree v. Deupree, supra, decided in the year 1873, McCay, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "There is no question as to the general rule that on the death of the witnesses, or on the failure of their memory, the proof of the fact of execution begets a presumption that all the details of the fact were such as the law requires." And, on page 448, he says: "How many wills do not come up for probate until many years after the execution of them. Sometimes the witnesses can only recognize their own handwriting; sometimes they only remember the fact that the testator signed, and perhaps only that they signed. Who was present, and all other details, have passed from memory. To say that under such circumstances the will is not to be probated would be a death blow to wills." And in Pearson v. Wightman, cited above, Cheves, J., said: "Where subscribing witnesses cannot be produced [or, if found] they deny their signatures, or otherwise fail to prove the due execution of the will, circumstantial evidence may be adduced to supply this deficiency. . . . It would be of terrible consequence if such evidence were not admissible, for how often and how easily might witnesses be tampered with to deny their own attestation?" The facts in the case of Pate v. Joe, 8 J. J. Marsh. 118, which are sufficiently stated in the case of Jauncey v. Thorne, supra, are very similar to the facts in the case at bar. In that case one of the witnesses (a woman) did not write her own name. As the decision says: "She was examined as a witness several years after the occurrence, but could recollect nothing of the circumstances except that Pate was sick, and rode in their [her and her husband's] wagon, and was left on the road." But her negative evidence was overcome by the affirmative testimony of the other subscribing witnesses, and the court held that the will was duly executed and attested. "The most liberal presumptions in favor of the due execution of wills are sanctioned by courts of justice where, from lapse of time or otherwise, it might be impossible to give any positive evidence on the subject." Jauncey v. Thorne, supra. And see Peck v. Cary, 87 N. Y. 9, 84 Am. Dec. 220, and note; Higgins v. Carlton, 28 Md. 115, 93 Am. Dec. 666.

There is nothing in section 2424 of the Code, upon the probate of wills in solemn form, which, rightly construed, conflicts with the law as declared in this opinion. This section does not require that the subscribing witnesses "in existence and within the jurisdiction of the court" shall each swear, at the time of probate, to their own subscriptions, and to the signature and testamentary capacity of the testator, in order to make a will valid; for thus construing the section would lead to obvious and glaring wrongs and absurdities. It simply means that they must be produced for the purpose of testifying to these facts, if competent. This section of the Code must be taken, not literally, but in accordance with common sense and the usual rules of construction, as was done by this court in Kitchens v. Kitchens, 89 Ga. 171-178, 99 Am. Dec. 453, in construing section 2896 of the Code then in force, which was the same as section 2481 of the present Code. There it is plainly declared that, in the case of a lost will, the copy must be clearly proved by the subscribing witness; yet the court held that, while the subscribing witness must prove the execution of the lost will, other witnesses might prove its contents. The main reason of the rule for calling all witnesses in a proceeding for probate in solemn form is to give the other party an opportunity of cross-examining them; and, while the law requires a will to be attested by three witnesses, it does not necessarily mean that all three must concur in their testimony to prove it on probate. To do this would make the validity of the will depend upon the memory and good faith of the witnesses, and not upon that reasonable proof the law demands in other cases. Nelson v. McGiffert, 8 Barb. Ch. 158, 49 Am. Dec. 170, 174, note; Jesse v. Parker, 6 Gratt. 57, 52 Am. Dec. 103; Montgomery v. Perkins, 2 Met. (Ky.) 448, 74 Am. Dec. 419. Section 2424 does not, when considered in connection with the well-established law on the subject of the attestation and proof of wills, as already shown, prevent the probate of a will on account of defect of memory, or even perjury, of a subscribing witness, when the deficiency is supplied by other evidence, because the general rules of evidence and the force and effect of legal evidence were not intended to be disregarded in probating wills even in solemn form. This is shown by construing together the act of December 18, 1859 (Acts 1859, pp. 83-85), and the cases of Brown v. Anderson, 18 Ga. 177, and Hall v. Hall, 18 Ga. 40, from which section 2424 is evidently codified, and by considering the fact that, when a will is propounded for proof in solemn form, "the issue, and the only issue, is devisavit vel non,"—did he devise or not? Wetter v. Habersham, 60 Ga. 194. If each subscribing witness were compelled to testify alike, there might be no issue to pass upon.

8. The only remaining question to be disposed of requires very brief mention or notice. The motion for a new trial complains that the court erred "in not charging the jury the law in regard to mutual wills," and alleges that the verdict is "contrary to the law and evidence in this, to wit: the evidence showed that the will offered for probate was one of several mutual wills, and there was no evidence to show that the other mutual wills were not revoked or destroyed." Although there was some evidence of an agreement between the testatrix and others to make mutual wills, it does not appear that it was ever insisted upon or carried out, or that the caveators had any concern in it. Moreover, it was incumbent on them to show affirmatively the revocation of the dependent wills, if any there were. Code, § 2897. So the law of mutual wills was not involved in this case.

Judgment affirmed.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

Granville P. AIKMAN

v.

W. C. EDWARDS, Secretary of State.

*1. The legislature of this state has the power, under the Constitution, to transfer all of the counties comprising a judicial district into another, and thereby to abolish such district before the expiration of the term of office of the judge of the district so abolished.

2. Chapter 106 of the Laws of 1895, entitled "An Act Relating to Judicial Districts, Defining the Boundaries of the 5th, 8th, 9th, 13th, 19th, 24th, 31st, and 32d Judicial Districts, and Providing for Holding Terms of Court therein, and Defining Certain Duties of the Trial Court in the 19th Judicial District, and Repealing All Acts and Parts of Acts in Conflict with This Act," does not violate section 16 of article 2 of the Constitution. It does not include more than one subject, the title expresses the subject of the act, and it does not amend sections of prior acts not contained in the new act.

3. A two-thirds vote of the members of each House of the legislature is not required on the passage of an act to abolish a judicial district. The vote of a constitutional majority is sufficient.

4. A failure on the part of the presiding officers to sign a bill within two days after its passage does not defeat the act, nor in any manner impair its validity, if it be thereafter duly authenticated and approved by the governor.

While this law practically amends or modifies prior laws in reference to certain judicial districts, yet it is an independent statute, complete in itself, and as such does not violate the provisions of the last subdivision of section 16, article 3, of the Constitution.

Where the constitutional question is raised, though it may be legitimately presented by the record, yet if the record presents some other and clear ground upon which the court may rest its judgment and thereby render the constitutional question immaterial to the case, that course will be adopted, and the question of constitutional power will be left for consideration until a case arises which cannot be disposed of without considering it.

The power given by the Constitution to the legislature to increase the number of judicial districts would also include the power to abolish.

There can be no question that the Constitution does not, either directly or impliedly, prohibit the legislature from so doing, and such being the case, they have the power.

The fact that the legislature passed this act is a conclusive presumption, so far as this court is concerned, of the wisdom and need of such a law.

The fact that this law passed by the legislature in response to the demands of the people, that the number of judicial districts be diminished, results incidentally in lessening the term of some judges for a short time and their salary by such law being reserved to them for the full term, will not be sufficient reason for declaring such law unconstitutional.

State v. Ranson, 78 Mo. 78; State v. McGowey, 92 Mo. 423; Hagerty v. Arnold, supra.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is alleged in the alternative writ of mandamus issued in this case that the plaintiff was, on the 17th day of September, 1895, duly and legally nominated to the office of district judge by the Republican judicial convention held at the city of Eldorado, in Butler county, for the 26th judicial district, including the counties of Butler and Greenwood; that a certificate of such nomination in due form was signed by the chairman and secretary of said convention, and presented to the defendant, secretary of state, with the request that he file the same; that the defendant refused to comply with this request on the ground that Butler and Greenwood counties were, by act of the last legislature, transferred to the 18th judicial district. The writ commands the secretary of state to file the certificate of nomination or show cause. The attorney general appears on behalf of the defendant, and moves to quash the writ, because it does not state a cause of action against the defendant.

Chapter 106 of the Laws of 1895, entitled "An Act Relating to Judicial Districts, Defining the Boundaries of the 5th, 8th, 9th, 18th, 19th, 24th, 31st, and 32d Judicial Districts, and Providing for Holding Terms of Court therein, and Defining Certain Duties of the Trial Court in the 19th Judicial District, and Repealing All Acts and Parts of Acts in Conflict with This Act," provides in section 7 that "the counties of Chautauqua, Elk, Greenwood, and Butler shall constitute the 18th judicial district." Prior to the passage of this act the 26th judicial district included only the counties of Butler and Greenwood, and by transferring these to the 18th district the 26th is abolished because it is left without territory. By changes in the boundaries of other districts the 25th, 27th, and 28th districts are also abolished. Chapter 99 of the Laws of 1895 abolishes the 14th district in the same manner, and at the same session of the legislature the Shawnee county circuit court was also abolished.

1. The validity of chapter 106 is challenged by the plaintiff on various grounds. First. It is contended with great earnestness that the office of judge of the district court is a constitutional office, which it is beyond the power of the legislature to abolish; that this act, by its terms, takes effect on the 15th day of October, 1895, while the term of office of the Honorable O. W. Shinn, the present judge of the 26th judicial district, will not expire until the second Monday in January, 1896; that the Constitution protects the district judge in his office for the full term of four years, and that the legislature cannot directly abridge his term, nor indirectly accomplish the same result by destroying his district. It is contended that the judicial department is co-ordinate with and independent of the legislative, and that, if the right of the legislature to destroy a judicial district, and thereby legislate a judge out of office, is recognized, the independence of the judiciary is destroyed, and the legislative will become dominant over the judicial department of the government. In support of this contention it must be conceded that cases closely in point, decided by eminent courts, are cited. Among the strongest may be mentioned Com. v. Gamble, 62 Pa. 343, 1 Am. Rep. 422; State v. Friedley, 185 Ind. 119, 21 L. R. A. 634; People v. Dubois, 23 Ill. 547; and State v. Mesmore, 14 Wis. 177. We have carefully weighed and considered these authorities, and recognize their full force. While the reasoning of the courts in these cases is applicable to the one now under consideration, we may remark that in each of the cases mentioned the court had under consideration an act of the legislature which would deprive a single judge only of his office, if valid. In this case the legislature had under consideration the rearrangement of the judicial districts covering a large part of the state. Notwithstanding our great respect for the tribunals by which these cases were decided, and the force of the reasoning by which their decisions are supported, we are constrained to give a different construction to the provisions of our own Constitution. The provisions in article 8 of that instrument, so far as they affect the matter under consideration, are as follows:

"Sec. 1. The judicial power of this state shall be vested in a supreme court, distract courts, probate courts, justices of the peace, and such other courts inferior to the supreme court as may be provided by law. And all courts of record shall have a seal to be used in the authentication of all process."

"Sec. 5. The state shall be divided into five judicial districts, in each of which there shall be elected by the electors thereof a district judge who shall hold his office for the term of four years. District courts shall be held at such times and places as may be provided by law.

"Sec. 6. The district courts shall have such jurisdiction in their respective districts as may be provided by law.

"Sec. 7. There shall be elected in each organized county a clerk of the district court, who shall hold his office two years, and whose duties shall be prescribed by law.

"Sec. 8. There shall be a probate court in each county, which shall be a court of record, and have such probate jurisdiction and care of estates of deceased persons, minors, and persons of unsound mind, as may be prescribed by law, and shall have jurisdiction in cases of habeas corpus. This court shall consist of one judge who shall be elected by the qualified voters of the county, and hold his office two years. He shall be his own clerk, and shall hold court at such times, and receive for compensation such fees, as may be prescribed by law.

"Sec. 9. Two justices of the peace shall be elected in each township, whose term of office shall be two years, and whose powers and duties shall be prescribed by law. The number of justices of the peace may be increased in any township by law."

"Sec. 14. Provision may be made by law for the increase of the number of judicial districts whenever two thirds of the members of each House shall concur. Such districts shall be formed of compact territory and bounded by county lines, and such increase shall not vacate the office of any judge.

"Sec. 15. Justices of the supreme court and judges of the district courts may be removed from office by resolution of both Houses if two thirds of the members of each house concur, but no such removal shall be made except upon complaint, the substance of which shall be entered upon the journal, nor until the party charged shall have had notice and opportunity to be heard."

The legislature of 1887 created the 25th, 26th, 27th, 28th, and 29th judicial districts, and the legislature of 1889 created the 30th, 31st, 32d, 33rd, 34th, and 35th districts. The acts creating these districts were passed at a time when the development of the resources of the state and the increase in its population were expected to continue with the same rapidity as in the preceding years. Subsequent events have shown that this increase was extravagant and unnecessary, and there came an exceptionally strong demand from the people that some of these needless offices be abolished. The act of the legislature of 1895 now under consideration was passed in compliance with this demand. The question we now have to consider is whether this purpose has been accomplished without any violation of constitutional restrictions. The argument on behalf of the plaintiff, and the reasoning of the courts in the authorities sustaining his contention, may, perhaps, be divided into two main propositions: One, that it was the general purpose of the framers of the Constitution to protect the judicial department from legislative interference; the other, that they intended to insure to the judge a tenure of office for the full term for which he was elected; the one being necessary for the preservation of the independence and integrity of the judicial branch of the government in the administration of justice between litigants, and the other to preserve the individual right of the judge to his office. That the Constitution intends to secure the judiciary as an independent co-ordinate branch of the government is conceded on all hands, and that the district courts are an important part of the judicial system is beyond question. It is contended that, because the Constitution provides for district courts, and fixes the term of the judges, and prescribes the mode of their removal from office, their position is fixed, and is as safe from legislative interference as that of the justices of this court; that both are constitutional officers, in exactly the same sense, and to exactly the same extent. But it will be noticed that under the provisions of the Constitution above quoted the judicial power is vested, not merely in supreme and district courts, but in probate courts, justices of the peace, and such other courts, inferior to the supreme court, as the legislature may see fit to create. Probate judges and justices of the peace are constitutional officers, whose terms are fixed at two years by that instrument. The only provision of the Constitution which can be construed as giving superior protection to district judges over probate judges and justices of the peace is that providing for the removal from office of justices of the supreme court and judges of the district courts. The number of the justices of the supreme court, as well as the duration of their terms of office, is definitely fixed by the terms of the Constitution. Their original jurisdiction is fixed by the Constitution itself, and is coextensive with the state. Their appellate jurisdiction alone is subject to legislative discretion. The case of district judges and justices of the peace is different in this important particular: that the number of judicial districts, and therefore the number of district judges, as well as the number of counties and townships, and of probate judges and justices of the peace, depend on legislative discretion. The Constitution requires a probate judge in each county, but leaves the number of counties into which the state shall be divided to be determined by the legislature, with the single restriction that no county shall include an area of less than 482 square miles. It provides that two justices of the peace shall be elected in each township, but leaves the establishment of townships entirely to the legislature. If the contention of the plaintiff is sound, it follows as a logical sequence that the legislature cannot abolish a township or county at a time when it will have the effect to shorten the term of office of a justice of the peace, a probate judge, or, indeed, a clerk of the district court.

We think prior decisions of this court have construed our Constitution and announced the principles decisive of this case. In the case of Division of Howard County, 15 Kan. 94, it was held that "the legislature has the power to abolish counties and county organizations whenever it becomes necessary for them to do so in changing county lines or in creating new counties." Re Hinkle, 81 Kan. 712, decides: "The legislature has the power to abolish or destroy a municipal township, and when the township is abolished or destroyed, the township officers must go with it." The doctrine of this case is reaffirmed in Re Wood, 84 Kan. 645. In the case of State v. Hamilton, 40 Kan. 323, it was said: "There is no constitutional restriction upon the power of the legislature to abolish municipal and county organizations, and the existence of the power is not disputed and cannot be doubted." The Constitution provides for five judicial districts. It is clear that the legislature cannot reduce the number of districts below five. Section 14, above quoted, provides for an increase of the number, and the concluding sentence of the section is, "and such increase shall not vacate the office of any judge." It is argued that the word "increase" should be interpreted to include alteration or diminution, and that the real intent of the framers of the Constitution was to absolutely protect every district judge against the abolition of his office by the legislature. If so, the framers of the Constitution were singularly careless in their selection of words. This we cannot assume without most cogent reasons. If it had been intended to prohibit the vacation of the office of a judge by the abolition of his district, it would have required but very few words to say so. To vacate the office of a district judge already elected by the people and serving, by an act increasing the number of judges, would clearly be, in effect, the removal of a judge from office when his office was not destroyed. To allow the legislature, while making one new district, to legislate the judge of an old district out of office, and provide for the appointment or election of two new judges, would clearly be vicious in principle, and this is the class of legislation which falls within the constitutional inhibition. But to prohibit the legislature from abolishing a district which had been improvidently established, and thereby vacate the office of a judge, is another and altogether different thing, which the Constitution does not, in express terms, prohibit. While the independence and integrity of courts in the exercise of all the powers confided in them by the Constitution should be firmly maintained, jealousy of encroachments on judicial power must not blind us to the just power of the legislature in determining within constitutional limits the number of courts required by the public exigencies, and the kind and extent of the jurisdiction and functions to be discharged by each. We think the legislature has the power to abolish as well as to create, to diminish as well as to increase, the number of judicial districts. We might say, in this connection, that the plaintiff in this case does not claim any vested right in an office, and that no question is presented by the record before us as to the right of the legislature to deprive a district judge of the compensation allowed him by law. In the act under consideration the legislature has seen fit to provide that the act shall not be construed to deprive any judge of his salary for the full term for which he was elected. The claim of the plaintiff in this case rests on the broad proposition that the act in its entirety is void. The conclusion we have reached is not wholly without support from authorities in other states. Van Buren County Supers. v. Mattoz, 30 Ark. 566; State v. Gaines, 2 Lea, 316; Crozier v. Lyons, 72 Iowa, 401.

If the contention that a judge, when once elected, is entitled not only to the emoluments of his office, but to exercise the functions of his office in the territory for which he was elected, be sound, does his right extend over the whole district, or only over a part of it, and can there be a sound distinction between the right to take away a part of his district and the right to take away the whole? It has never been contended, so far as we are aware, that the legislature is without power to change the boundaries of judicial districts by detaching counties from one and adding them to another; nor has it been doubted that the legislature might do this during the continuance in office of any judge. That this has the effect of placing the people of the county so transferred from one district to another away from the jurisdiction of a judge in whose selection they have taken part, and under the jurisdiction of another judge in whose election they have had no voice, is clear. The great fallacy, as we view the case, in the argument in favor of the plaintiff, and in the cases cited by him, is that the rights of the particular individual who chances to be elected judge are looked upon as paramount and superior to the rights of the public. The correct view is that a public officer, no matter what the department of the government in which he serves, is a public servant. A district judge is provided to aid in the administration of the laws. While it is right that the public should deal justly with him, his individual rights are by no means of primary importance. The most substantial objection that can be urged against such a transfer as is made by this act is that the people are placed in a district under a judge in whose selection they have had no voice, and who might not have been chosen if all the people in the enlarged district had been permitted to vote at the time of his election. The reasons apply against the transfer of one county with just the same force as against the transfer of all the counties included within a district. Acts of the legislature transferring a county from one district to another have very frequently been passed during the history of the state, and their validity has never been questioned. The only ground on which it can be urged that the legislature might transfer Greenwood county into the 18th district, but not Butler, is that the judge of the 26th district resides in Butler county. This ground is purely personal to the judge. It has no weight whatever affecting the interests of the public.

We need not discuss the question, argued at some length in the brief, whether there can be a judge without a district, or without a court over which to preside, as the plaintiff in this case has no interest in that question. Nor shall we attempt to answer the list of questions asked under this head in the brief. It is sufficient for us to say that the legislature had power to transfer Greenwood and Butler counties into the 18th judicial district in the manner provided in the act under consideration.

2. It appears that on the final passage of the act two thirds of the senators voted for it; that in the House it received eighty-three votes, being one short of two thirds of the members. It is contended that the Constitution requires the concurrence of two thirds of the members of each House to increase the number of judicial districts, and that there is an implied inhibition on the reduction of the number of districts without the concurrence of an equal number. The general rule is that laws may be enacted by the vote of a majority of all the members elected to each House. The concurrence of a larger number is only required in cases mentioned in the Constitution itself. It is not apparent that the same reasons exist for a two-thirds majority in order to abolish a judicial district, or to change its boundaries, that do for creating one. One of the worst tendencies to be provided against in our system of government is that of constantly creating new offices to be filled, and increasing the salaries of old ones. Those desiring lucrative positions, or public favors of any kind, are constantly pressing their claims on the members of the law-making body, and it was thought wise to require the concurrence of two thirds of the members of each House as a safeguard against this tendency. Any one who has observed the obstacles which are invariably thrown in the way of every attempt at the abolition of an office, or reduction of a salary, or the taking away of a special privilege, must be fully aware that no necessity exists for unusual constitutional restrictions on the power to reduce the number of officers, or deprive any person of a salary or a privilege held to the detriment of the public. When the people are not vigilant, their rights are often easily lost, and regained only with utmost labor. Facilis descensus Averno. Noctes atque dies patet atri janua Ditis; sed revocare gradum, superasque evadere ad auras, hoc opus, hic labor est.

3. It is urged that the act is void because it violates section 16 of article 2 of the Constitution; that the title is defective because it does not clearly express the purpose of the act, does not mention the judicial districts abolished, and includes more than one subject. The first part of the title, "An Act Relating to Judicial Districts," is very broad and comprehensive. Whatever changes are made by the act are effected by so extending the boundaries of the districts named as to include within them the territory of the old

25th, 26th, and 28th districts. There is no abolition of these districts by express words, but any person reading the title of the act would be informed that changes of boundaries were made, and of course a change in the boundary of one district could not be effected without also changing the boundary of another. The contention that, because a clause is inserted in the act, making it "the duty of the trial court of the 19th judicial district in assigning the docket to so group cases arising in Arkansas City and cases controlled by Arkansas City attorneys, so they can, on motion, be tried in succession," it contains more than one subject, is not good. While this matter is perhaps a little remote from the general purpose of the act, it still is connected with judicial districts. This is not a matter of very great importance, and to hold this whole act void on this ground would seem extremely technical and hypercritical. Nor do we think that greater force should be given to the objection to the last clause of section 4, relating to summoning juries in Dickinson and Morris counties. All these matters relate to judicial districts. It is contended that the construction we have given to the act under consideration makes it amendatory legislation, and therefore void, within the rule followed in State v. Guinney (Kan.) 40 Pac. Rep. 928. Every act changing the law is not necessarily amendatory because previous legislation existed on the same subject. An amendment properly is a correction of one or more existing defects. It looks to particulars, without disturbing the general framework of the law. But where the legislature has under consideration not merely minor particulars, but the whole subject-matter of the law, it may wholly annul all former legislation on the subject, and pass an act covering the entire field, without specifically naming or attempting to amend particular provisions in prior statutes. The new act then becomes a substitute for all former legislation on the subject, and may repeal, either in express terms or by necessary implication, all former sections of the law inconsistent with the new enactment. Were we to hold the act under consideration amendatory of former statutes, and void because the sections amended are not contained in the new act, and apply the same rule to former statutes, it is very difficult to tell in what judicial districts the various counties named in the act would be found. By referring to chapter 147 of the Laws of 1887, by which the 26th judicial district was created, we find that it does not in terms amend any former law, nor contain even a general repealing clause. It merely creates judicial districts, and fixes the terms of court therein; the 26th district being composed of the counties of Butler and Greenwood. Prior to the passage of that act, Butler county was in the 18th district, created by chapter 102 of the Laws of 1883, and Greenwood county was in the 5th. Prior to that time, Butler county had been in the 18th district, created by chapter 112 of the Laws of 1872, and prior to that time in the 9th. Greenwood county was attached for judicial purposes to Woodson county, which was included in the 5th distract in 1861. None of the acts creating the various judicial districts in which Butler county has been included have ever complied with the constitutional requirements of an amendatory statute, and, if the act under consideration is void for that reason, the act creating the 26th judicial district is void also, and no 26th district has ever existed. It is clear that the statute is not void for this reason.

4. A final objection is that the act was not signed by the presiding officers of the respective Houses within two days after its passage, as required by section 14 of article 2 of the Constitution. If the contention of the plaintiff is sound, then a veto power rests in the presiding officers of the two Houses, which has remained undiscovered from the organization of the state government to this time. It would undoubtedly be a very great surprise to the general public if it were to be declared by this court that the lieutenant governor and the speaker of the House, by merely delaying for more than two days to attach their signatures to it, could effectually kill a law duly passed by the Senate and House. In the case of Leavenworth County Comrs. v. Higginbotham, 17 Kan. 62, it was held that the failure of the presiding officer of the Senate to sign a bill did not invalidate the law, and that the act then under consideration was a law, although never authenticated as such by him.

The motion to quash the writ is sustained.

v.

NATIONAL BANK OF ILLINOIS.

(158 Ill. 532.)

1. A bank which guaranteed the payment of the checks of another bank that was not a member of a clearing-house association, in order to clear its checks, and, after the latter bank had made an assignment for creditors and a check thereon which had been certified for the drawers had been refused at the clearing-house, paid the check in pursuance of the guaranty,—did not do this as agent of the other bank, but became an assignee of the check, with the right to recover thereon against the drawers.
2. Even if a guaranty by one bank to another for clearing-house purposes is ultra vires this fact will not avail the drawers of a certified check who are not parties to the guaranty, when charged with liability to the bank, which in compliance with its guaranty has paid the check and become an assignee thereof after the drawee has become insolvent.
3. A bank which pays a check in pursuance of a guaranty, even if that was ultra vires, is not a mere volunteer so as to be precluded from claiming the rights of the person to whom payment was made, by subrogation.

(October, 11, 1895.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of a check of which defendants were drawers after it had been dishonored by the drawee and taken up by plaintiff under its guaranty. Affirmed.

Statement by Baker, J. :

This cause is brought to this court by appeal, on a certificate of importance from the Appellate Court for the First District.

On and for some time prior to June 3, 1893, there was in the city of Chicago an association known as the "Chicago Clearing-House." The membership of that association comprised certain of the Chicago banks, and its purpose was to facilitate the daily settlement between those banks. The National Bank of Illinois, appellee, and the First National Bank of Chicago, were both members of that association. On and for some time prior to June 2, 1893, Herman Schaffner & Co. were engaged in business as private bankers in the city of Chicago. They were not in the clearing-house association, but, through an arrangement between them and appellee, checks drawn upon the former were cleared by the latter. In order to make this arrangement effective, so that checks drawn upon Herman Schaffner & Co., and certified, would be received by the clearing-house banks, it became necessary for appellee to guarantee the payment of such checks.

On June 2, 1893, the First National Bank held for collection a draft for $581.03, drawn upon appellants, F. L. Voltz & Co., and by them accepted. On that day, appellants, who then had funds on general deposit with Herman Schaffner & Co., drew a check upon the latter for the sum of $581.03, had it certified, and delivered it to the First National Bank in payment of the draft. That check was received by the First National Bank between eleven and twelve o'clock on June 2, and too late to be put through the clearing-house on that day. At about 8:30 A. M. of June 3, 1893, Herman Schaffner & Co. made a voluntary assignment for the benefit of their creditors. They then ceased doing business and are still insolvent. On June 8, 1893, the First National Bank presented said check, through the clearing-house, to the National Bank of Illinois. The payment of it was refused on account of the insolvency of Herman Schaffner & Co. The cashier of the First National thereupon called the attention of appellee to the guaranty in evidence, and appellee issued its cashier's check for the amount, and the check in suit was indorsed "without recourse," by the First National Bank, and delivered to appellee.

The amount of the check was charged by appellee as an overdraft of Herman Schaffner & Co.'s account, and it subsequently filed a claim for the amount so paid against the estate of Herman Schaffner & Co. The following is a copy of the check as it was offered in evidence:

"No. 1076. Chicago, June 2, 1893.

"To Herman Schaffner & Co., Bankers:

"Pay to the order of First National $581⁰⁰/₁₀₀ five hundred eighty-one and ⁰⁰/₁₀₀ dollars.

"F. L. Voltz & Co."

"Certified June 2, 1893.

"Herman Schaffner & Co.

"A Swartz, Teller."

Indorsed on back: "First National Bank.—Without recourse.—R. J. Street, Cash."

"Pay through Chicago clearing-house only."

"Paid June 3, 1893." The indorsement,

"Paid June 3, 1893," is the clearing-house stamp, put there on June 2, and dated a day ahead, by the First National Bank, in anticipation of payment through the clearing of the next day, as was the usage among the members of the clearing-house.

The following is a copy of the guaranty given by appellee to the First National Bank:

"Chicago, Feb. 3, 1886.

"L. J. Gage, Esq., Vice-president, City:

"Dear Sir:—This bank hereby holds itself accountable for payment, on presentation, in the regular course to it, of any and all checks or drafts drawn upon the banks and bankers below named, or either of them, and properly certified by them. This obligation, however, to apply only to such drafts and checks as may be received by you in the course of your business in payment of collections or discounted items. . . . Herman Schaffner & Co. Truly yours, Wm. A. Hammond, Cashier."

The suit is assumpsit, by appellee, as assignee of the check, against appellants, as makers. The declaration also contains the common counts. The issues joined were submitted to the circuit court without a jury, and the finding and the judgment were for appellee for $607.66 damages, and thereafter the judgment was affirmed in the appellate court.

At the trial appellants submitted certain written propositions to be held as law. The court held proposition 1, as follows:

"The court finds, as matter of law, that the relationship between Herman Schaffner & Co. and the plaintiff herein, whereby the latter represented the former in the clearing-house in the city of Chicago, was that of principal and agent."

But the court refused to hold propositions from 2 to 9 inclusive, which were as follows:

"2. The court finds, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff herein came into possession of the check sued on herein, for and as the agent of Herman Schaffner & Co., and that the payment made therefor by it to the First National Bank was, in law, a payment by Herman Schaffner & Co., and an extinguishment of the drawer's liability.

"3. The court finds, as a matter of law, that as the National Bank of Illinois was not liable upon its guaranty to the First National Bank, the payment by it was made by it as volunteer, and it is not entitled to be subrogated, as against the defendants, to the rights of the First National Bank.

"4. The court finds, as a matter of law, that the contract executed by the National Bank of Illinois in 1886 was ultra vires and void, and that the First National Bank could not have maintained any recovery thereon for the check in question.

"5. The court finds, as a matter of law, that the contract of guaranty executed by the National Bank of Illinois to the First National Bank in 1886 is void, as rendering the National Bank of Illinois liable for an amount in excess of the capital stock of the company actually paid in, and that the First National Bank could not have maintained any action thereon for the recovery of the amount of the check in suit.

"6. The court finds, as a matter of law, that the contract of guaranty executed by the National Bank of Illinois to the First National Bank in 1886 is void, as being against public policy, and that the First National Bank could not have maintained any action thereon for the recovery of the amount of the check in suit.

"7. The court finds, as a matter of law, that the defendants are not liable to the plaintiff upon the check sued on herein.

"8. The court finds, as a matter of law, that the First National Bank was bound to know the ultra vires character of the contract of guaranty executed to it by the National Bank of Illinois in 1886, by reason of itself being a national bank.

"9. The court finds, as a matter of law, that Herman Schaffner & Co. would have no right of action upon the check in question if it had paid it, and that the National Bank of Illinois cannot, by virtue of the payments made by it in the course of its agency for Herman Schaffner & Co., acquire any greater rights, as against the defendants herein, than Herman Schaffner & Co. would have had, had such payment been made by them."

Messrs. Moses, Pam, & Kennedy for appellants.

Messrs. Moran, Kraus, & Mayer, for appellee:

The certification having been thus procured by the drawers of the check, their primary liability, the check not having been paid by Schaffner & Co., upon whom it was drawn, continued.

Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Jones, 137 Ill. 634, 12 L. R. A. 492.

Under the circumstances there can be no difference between an uncertified and a certified check. Nonpayment of either by the bank leaves the drawer primarily liable.

Bickford v. First Nat. Bank, 42 Ill. 238, 89 Am. Dec 486.

The fact that appellee had given a guaranty to the First National Bank in no way impairs or affects its right to have recourse against the drawers of the check. Appellee did not guarantee the payment of the check to appellants and appellants could, therefore, under no circumstances, have sued appellee upon the guaranty.

Bishop v. Rowe, 71 Me. 268; Pacific Bank v. Mitchell, 9 Met. 297; McGregory v. McGregor, 107 Mass. 548; Pinney v. McGregor, 102 Mass. 186; Swope v. Leffingwell, 72 Mo. 848.

Even if there had been no transfer of the check by indorsement from the First National Bank to appellee, the latter, by taking up this check under the guaranty in evidence, stood in the position of an indorsee thereon.

2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1774.

A guarantor of a note or check who, upon nonpayment of the same becomes immediately liable to an action upon that note or check, cannot be a "mere volunteer."

Bishop v. Rowe, supra; Babcock v. Blanchard, 86 Ill. 165; Sheldon, Subrogation, 2d ed. § 186; Hamilton v. Johnston, 82 Ill. 89.

There is an implied assumpsit on the part of the appellants to pay appellee the amount of the check, and the count for money paid to their use sustains the judgment below.

Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty (1878) §§ 178, 179.

Baker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There was no real inconsistency in the rulings of the trial court upon the written propositions submitted to it, in holding proposition 1 and refusing to hold propositions 2, 7, and 9 as law in the decision of the case. Assuming it to be true that, while appellee represented Herman Schaffner & Co. in the clearing-house, the relation that existed between them was that of principal and agent yet that relation ceased to exist early on the morning of June 8, 1893, when Herman Schaffner & Co. made a general assignment for the benefit of their creditors and ceased doing business, and appellee refused longer to represent them in the clearing-house, and threw out and returned their clearings, amounting to $8,976.01. The evidence is, that in the forenoon of June 8 appellee refused longer to pay checks certified by them, and that the check in question was not paid through the clearing-house. The testimony of Moll, who was assistant cashier of appellee, is explicit, that the check was paid by appellee on account of the guaranty in writing held by the First National Bank. And Street, cashier of the First National Bank, testifies in chief: "This check was shown to me by our note teller, and I remembered the fact that we had a guaranty from the National Bank of Illinois, and I held them to their guaranty, simply, and they took the check up." And he testifies on cross-examination: "When that check was not paid through the clearing-house, our bank, either on June 8 or June 5, demanded that the National Bank of Illinois should give us the face of it." And also says that he indorsed the check by way of transfer to the National Bank of Illinois, but to protect his own bank made the indorsement "without recourse."

In holding proposition 1, the trial court did not, either in terms or by necessary implication, find, as matter of fact, that appellee, in paying the check, did so as agent of Herman Schaffner & Co., and when that proposition is read in the light of the refusal to hold propositions 2, 7, and 9 it is manifest that court must have found that appellee did not pay or come into possession of the check "for and as the agent" of Herman Schaffner & Co. Therefore the doctrine that payment by the agent of the maker of a note or drawee and acceptor of a check is a payment of the note or check, and an extinguishment of the liability of the indorser of such note or drawer of such check, has no application to the case, and the authorities cited by appellants upon this branch of the controversy,—i. e., Mechem, Agency, § 487; Burton v. Slaughter, 26 Gratt. 914, and Johnson v. Glover, 121 Ill. 283,—are not in point.

In our opinion, the conclusion here must be, that when appellee gave to the First National Bank its cashier's check for the face of the F. L. Voltz & Co. check, and took an assignment of the latter check, it did so, not as the agent of Herman Schaffner & Co., but as guarantor of said check; and it follows, since appellee did not pay the check as agent, that by the indorsement it took the legal title to the check, and has a legal right, as assignee, to recover the money therein specified from appellants, the drawers of the check, the said Herman Schaffner & Co. having failed and refused to make payment,—and this, wholly regardless of the considerations that may have induced it to make the payment and take the assignment. Appellants, the drawers, procured the certification of the check prior to its delivery to the payee, and they are primarily liable to such payee or its assignee. Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Jones, 137 Ill. 684, 12 L. R. A. 492; Brown v. Leckie, 43 Ill. 497; Bickford v. First Nat. Bank, 42 Ill. 288, 89 Am. Dec. 436; Rounds v. Smith, 42 Ill. 245.

It is claimed in some of the refused propositions that were submitted to the court, and also in the argument of appellants, that the contract of guaranty given by appellee to the First National Bank was ultra vires and void; that it was also void as rendering appellee liable for an amount in excess of its capital stock actually paid in, and void as being against public policy; and that therefore the First National Bank could not have maintained any action thereon against appellee for the recovery of the amount of the check in suit, and consequently the payment made by appellee was made as a volunteer, and it is not entitled to be subrogated, as against appellants, to the rights of the First National Bank. Even if all these claims should be conceded, yet if we are right in the conclusions we have announced above, appellee, as assignee of the check, has a complete legal right of recovery, and it is wholly immaterial even if it has not the equitable right to be subrogated to the position of the First National Bank.

But the determination of the question whether the guaranty contract is ultra vires and void, or void as being otherwise contrary to the statute under which appellee was organized, or against public policy, depends upon the interpretation that is to be placed upon the national bank act and the effect to be given its provisions. It may be that if a statute of this state was involved, then the rule that no right of action can spring out of an illegal contract (held in Penn v. Bornman, 102 Ill. 528, and in other cases), would apply. But in the very case just cited the paramount authority of the Supreme Court of the United States to construe all Federal statutes, including the national bank act, is fully conceded. The doctrine of the Federal courts, as applied to this case, is that, even if the guaranty which appellee gave to the First National Bank was ultra vires, or given in violation of the national bank act, yet appellee could not urge that defense after the First National Bank, in reliance upon that guaranty, had taken the certified check in payment of the acceptance of F. L. Voltz & Co., and that the power to redress the wrong committed by the appellee bank was in the government only, by a proceeding to forfeit the charter of the bank. Union Nat. Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621, 25 L. ed. 188; National Bank v. Whitney, 108 U. S. 99, 26 L. ed. 448; Weber v. Spokane Nat. Bank, 64 Fed. Rep. 208.

It would seem that, under the decisions of the Federal courts, appellee could not have availed itself of the defense of ultra vires in an action brought on the guaranty. But even if it could have done so, it did not, but paid the check in accordance with its guaranty, and the question of the validity of such guaranty was one in which appellants had no interest, and it is a matter of indifference to them whether they pay the First National Bank or appellee, and therefore they cannot be heard to say that appellee shall not have the benefit of the doctrine of subrogation. (Slack v. Kirk, 87 Pa. 890, 5 Am. Rep. 438; 2 Morse, Banks & Banking, § 728). Here the guaranty was not indorsed on the check, but was written on a separate paper, and that paper was addressed only to the First National Bank, and upon the face of the guaranty there was an express restriction that the obligation assumed should "apply only to such drafts and checks as may be received by you, in the course of your business, in payment of collections or discounted items." And the rule is that a guaranty so given and addressed to a particular person or corporation only is not negotiable, and is a mere personal contract. (2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1774). And it results from this rule, that appellants, the drawers of the check, are total strangers to this contract of guaranty, and it does not inure to their benefit or invest them with any right.

Appellee being legally liable, or, at the very least, under moral obligations for the payment of the certified check to the First National Bank, it cannot be said that it was a mere volunteer when it paid the money and took up the check. A person who, though not obliged to do an act, yet has an interest in doing it, is not to be regarded as necessarily and simply a volunteer. Wright v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 252; Holmes v. North Eastern R. Co. L. R. 4 Exch. 254, L. R. 6 Exch. 128. And where one guarantees payment of a note or check, and on default of payment by the principal debtor pays the same to the holder, the law will imply a promise to repay on the part of the persons primarily liable, and the guarantor will be subrogated to the rights of the holder to whom he makes payment, and may maintain assumpsit against such persons. Babcock v. Blanchard, 86 Ill. 165; Hamilton v. Johnston, 82 Ill. 59; Sheldon, Subrogation, 2d ed. § 186, p. 285.

We think there was no substantial error in the rulings of the circuit court upon the written propositions that were submitted to it.

The judgment of affirmance rendered by the Appellate Court is affirmed.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.,

Pf. in Err.

v.

J. S. HOWELL.

(95 Ga. 184.)

- *1. According to the principle ruled by this court in the cases of Western U. Telegr. Co. v. James, 90 Ga. 254, and Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Michelson, Headnotes by LUMPKIN, J.

94 Ga. 426, there is nothing in that provision of the Constitution of the United States which confers upon Congress the power to regulate commerce among the several states, prohibiting the general assembly of this state from enacting a law subjecting telegraph companies to penalties for acts of negligence occurring entirely within the limits of Georgia, although such acts may be committed in dealing with messages which are to be transmitted to points in other states.

2. Where a message, the charges upon which were duly paid in advance, was received by a telegraph company, at one of its offices in this state, for transmission to a point in another state, and was never delivered to the person to whom it was addressed, it is incumbent on the company, in order to escape liability for the statutory penalty for negligence in transmission from the Georgia office, to show that the message was in fact transmitted from that office with due diligence, and that the nondelivery to the sendee was due to some default or other cause arising beyond the limits of this state.

as to liability for negligence, see also Solan v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (Iowa) 28 L. R. A. 712, and St. Joseph & G. I. R. Co. v. Palmer (Neb.) 28 L. R. A. 325.

(December 21, 1894.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for De Kalb County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the statutory penalty and special damages for defendant's failure to promptly deliver a telegraph message. Affirmed.

Plaintiff was arrested in Georgia; he delivered a message containing this information and requesting aid, directed to his brother in Alabama, paying the charge therefor. Defendant neglected to deliver the message. Plaintiff recovered a verdict for the statutory penalty and special damages.

Messrs. Bigby, Reed & Berry and Dorsey, Brewster, & Howell for plaintiff in error.

Mr. J. S. Candler for defendant in error.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts appear in the reporter's statement.

1. The case at bar, so far as relates to the proposition announced in the first headnote, is not distinguishable in principle from those of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. James, 90 Ga. 254, and Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Michelson, 94 Ga. 436. We have therefore felt constrained to follow those cases. As no opinion was written in either of them, the writer, but for a reason which will be presently stated, would feel incumbent upon himself to endeavor to set forth with some care the views upon which these decisions rest. It is obvious that to do so would require the consumption of much time, and the expenditure of a considerable amount of labor, as the subject is one which has but lately arisen, and is not free from doubt and difficulty. Inasmuch, however, as the general assembly of this state, four days before the present case was decided by this court, repealed the act imposing penalties upon telegraph companies (Acts 1894, p. 79, repealing both the Statute of October 23, 1837, and the amendment thereto of December 20, 1892), and in consequence the question is no longer of practical importance in this state, it is not now deemed necessary to enter into an elaborate discussion of it. The time at our command can certainly be more profitably expended in preparing opinions, so far as we are able, devoted to the discussion of questions which are live issues, and are likely to arise in future litigation. We shall therefore content ourselves with citing the case of Connell v. Western U. Teleg. Co., 108 Mo. 459, which supports the view entered tained by this court, although the subject was not dealt with at any great length, nor accorded the thorough and satisfactory discussion which its importance would seem to demand. It may nevertheless be very profitably examined, for, so far as we have been able to discover, it is the only decision outside of this state which has, as yet, directly dealt with the question. Reference may also be made to the American & English Encyclopedia of Law (vol. 25, p. 768), where, in a note, the Connell Case is cited, and also to page 770 of the same volume, where, at the conclusion of note 8 (which begins on the preceding page, with the title, Regulation of Interstate Messages), comments and expressions in full harmony with the view of the question taken by this court will be found, together with references to cases more or less in point.

2. Counsel for the telegraph company, while not conceding its liability in any event, contended that as the plaintiff had failed to show that the omission of duty on the part of the company occurred within the limits of this state, he could not recover, even under the rulings announced in the James and Michelson Cases. We quite agree with counsel that our penalty statute could have no extraterritorial operation, but are compelled to express our dissent to the assertion that the plaintiff totally failed to make out a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the company occurring within the borders of the state. The matter simply resolves itself into a question of burden of proof, and appears to us to be free from serious difficulty. The rule as to telegraph companies seems to be the same as that applicable to railroad carriers. Proof of the delivery to a telegraph company of a message, non (or incorrect) transmission of it, and consequent damage, is all that is required to make out a prima facie case of negligence. Thompson, Electricity, §§ 266, 275; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 881; Whart. Neg. § 766; 8 Sutherland, Damages, 2d ed. § 295, p. 2140; Gray, Communications by Telegraph, §§ 26, 53, 54, 77. Breach of the contract is presumed to comprehend negligence. This, as stated by Boynton, Ch. J., in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Grisnold, 37 Ohio St. 318, for the reason that: "If the error or mistake is attributable to atmospheric causes or disturbances, or to any cause for which the company is not at fault, it is entirely within its power to show it. To require the sender of the message to establish the particular act of negligence, or ferret out the particular locality where the negligent act occurred, after showing the mistake itself, would be to require, in many cases, an impossibility, not infrequently enabling the company to evade a just liability. In Turner v. Hawkeye Teleg. Co. 41 Iowa, 458, 20 Am. Rep. 605, the court dealt with the question of presumption in a case where a message delivered by one telegraph company to another, which was sued for error in transmission, was not shown by the plaintiff to have been different from the one delivered to him. Beck, J., says: "Defendant's line of telegraph did not extend to Chicago, but at Grinnell it connected with another line reaching to that city, from which the market reports were obtained, and sent by defendant to different points on its line. It is insisted by defendant that plaintiff failed to show that a correct report was furnished, to be sent from Grinnell upon defendant's line. The evidence shows that the market reports were received at Grinnell on the day the incorrect one was delivered to plaintiff. Upon this evidence, we must presume that the reports received there, and delivered to defendant, were correct. The rules of evidence, in the absence of proof showing the report delivered to defendant at Grinnell to be either correct or incorrect, require us to presume it to have been correct. They are based upon the fact that men ordinarily, in the course of business, act correctly and speak truly. Errors and intentional misstatements are exceptions, and not the rule, in the affairs of business. Their application in this case is demanded by the fact that the evidence to establish error in the report furnished defendant was within its control and exclusive knowledge. Plaintiff was utterly unable to prove the correctness of the report furnished at Grinnell, while, if it had been incorrect, defendant could have readily established the fact." Again, in Olympe de La Grange v. Southwestern Teleg. Co. 25 La. Ann. 383, it was contended that the defendant was not the first carrier or contractor, and that it was not proved that the error in the transmission occurred on defendant's line, on whose printed blank there was an express provision for nonliability for the default of other companies. But it was held "that, whether first carrier or not, it was peculiarly within their power, and was their duty, to make the proof here suggested, if necessary." Surely, the two cases last cited go further than is requisite to support our ruling in the present case; for, where a third party is also concerned, the further question is presented whether it was not in the power of the plaintiff to show that such third party, in dealing with the message, was free from negligence. In the case at bar the plaintiff showed a breach of contract,—and prima facie negligence,—which must have occurred on the defendant's line, either in this state or in Alabama. Undoubtedly, it was in the exclusive power of the telegraph company to show the exact point where the failure of diligence occurred, and through the negligence of what particular servant it was occasioned. It will not do to say that the servants of the company are equally at the disposal of the plaintiff to prove the facts connected with the transaction. The truth of this assertion may be demonstrated by the peculiar facts here presented. The plaintiff, it is true, did know the company's agent at Lithonia, and perhaps could have secured him as a witness at the trial. But suppose this had been done, and he had testified that he had promptly forwarded the message to the relay office at Atlanta, but had no further knowledge as to the transaction. How could the plaintiff pursue his investigation and proof? Would he have to sue out interrogatories,—for he could not compel personal presence in another county,—directed to each and every one of the numerous employees of the company stationed in the Atlanta office? Certainly, the company could not reasonably be expected to aid him by furnishing a list of all its servants, nor to keep him posted when any of them resigned, or were transferred elsewhere. It might be, and doubtless is, often convenient to the company to change the location of its employees, and it could do so in the utmost good faith; but, whatever the motive, the inconvenience to the plaintiff in reaching them as witnesses would be the same. Again, it cannot be known that the telegraph company keeps such records in writing of its business as would enable the plaintiff to show the required facts by compelling the defendant to produce its records in court. Besides, how would it be known that such records, if kept at all, were correct? If the company itself did not see to it that evidence of negligence was not recorded against it, would it not be a temptation to its employees to omit making any record of their own shortcomings which might result in their discharge? And, at last, this would merely be a different way of compelling the company to supply evidence entirely within its own keeping. It follows from the foregoing, that the default should be treated as having occurred in Georgia, the burden being on the defendant to show the contrary, and it having failed to do so. Finally, the plaintiff showed more than a mere failure to deliver. His brother, the addressee, who lived in Montgomery, testified: "I went directly to the telegraph office, as soon as I received my brother's letter, and there had been no message for me at all. The telegram was sent on Thursday. I received my brother's letter on Sunday morning, at 9:30." Therefore, it was shown, that three days after the message was handed to the agent at Lithonia, the office in Montgomery had still failed to receive it over the wire from Atlanta. This being so, it makes no difference whether the message was afterwards sent, or not. Three days' delay in Georgia, unexplained, would render the company liable to the penalty, for this would be undoubtedly, and per se, an unreasonable and inexcusable delay; and even if the office in Montgomery had afterwards received the message, and had made no attempt to deliver it to the addressee, these facts would be of no consequence whatever, with reference to the question of the company's liability for the penalty.

Judgment affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE, & ST. PAUL RAILWAY COMPANY, Plf. in Err.

v.

Benjamin F. WALLACE.

(86 Fed. Rep. 503.)

1. A railroad company is not a common or public carrier in respect to a special train of cars loaded with wild animals and other property as well as persons belonging to or connected with a circus, which is loaded and unloaded by the proprietor of the circus, and is run on special time to suit his convenience, under a special contract that he shall assume all the risk of accidents, the only duty of the railroad being to haul the cars.
2. A railroad company hauling a special train of cars as a private carrier may lawfully contract for entire exemption from the risk of accidents.

(February 22, 1894.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of certain property destroyed while it was being transported over defendant's road. Reversed.

NOTE.—Railroad companies as private carriers in drawing special trains or special cars.

Very few cases can be found on the subject of a railroad company's liability in transporting special trains or special cars. This note does not include the liability of a connecting carrier in hauling cars of another company during through transportation, nor the question of liability for goods transported for a shipper who hires the use of a whole car for the trip. Nor is the subject of the carriage of livestock included.

As to the liability of a railroad company for injury to postal clerks in mail cars, see note to Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Ketchum (Ind.) 19 L. R. A. 289. The liability as to passengers on sleeping cars is also considered in a note to Mann-Boudoir Car Co. v. Dupre (C. C. App. 5th C.) 21 L. R. A. 289.

Like the principal case, there have been several other cases of accidents to circus trains. In the case of Robertson v. Old Colony R. Co. 156 Mass. 825, an employee connected with a circus was injured by the derailment of a car, on account of a defect in its trucks in the circus train which was hauled by the railroad company under a special contract giving the carrier no control over the condition of the cars or imposing any duty to inspect them. The contract bound the railroad company to haul the cars belonging to the circus proprietors according to a schedule of time fixed by the agreement by which the work was to be done at eighteen different times and nearly all of it at night. The price to be paid was a gross sum less than the regular rates for such service, while the proprietors agreed to load and unload the cars at their own expense and under their own supervision, and to assume all risk of accident from any cause, and to exonerate and save the railroad company harmless from any and all claims for damages to person and property during the transportation. The court held that this contract was one which the railroad had the right to make, as it was under no obligation to draw the cars as a common carrier, citing the Coup Case, infra. It was 30 L. R. A.

Before Woods and Jenkins, Circuit Judges, and Bunn, District Judge.

Statement by Bunn, District Judge:

The facts in this case are fully and properly stated in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error, as follows: "This is a writ of error prosecuted by the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railway Company, defendant below, to reverse a judgment of $8,000 recovered against it in the lower court by Benjamin F. Wallace, the plaintiff below, for loss and injury to certain property comprising part of the belongings and equipment of a circus owned by Wallace, and for the loss of performances of the circus caused by two separate accidents happening upon the railroad company's road while it was transporting the circus in a special train composed of cars belonging to Wallace. Plaintiff's declaration is in trespass on the case for negligent violation by defendant of its duty as a common carrier. It contains two counts: The first count avers that on the 7th day of July, 1893, the defendant was possessed of and operating a certain railroad and railroad tracks in the states of Wisconsin and Iowa, and was operating and controlling certain locomotive power and engines upon and along therefore held that the railroad company was not liable for the injury to the circus employee.

In Coup v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 56 Mich. 111, 56 Am. Rep. 374, the action was brought by a circus proprietor for injuries to cars and equipments and to persons and animals caused by a collision of two trains made up of his circus cars. The railroad company furnished men and motive power to transport the circus in the special cars which were owned by the proprietor of the circus, consisting of twelve flat, six stock, one elephant, one baggage, and three passenger coaches. The contract provided that the railroad company should not be responsible for damage by want of care in the running of the cars or otherwise. The price was only 10 per cent of the rates charged for carriage. The trains were to be run chiefly at night to accommodate exhibitions, and the running times were fixed with reference to these exhibitions. The railroad employees were to attend to the moving of the train but had nothing to do with the loading and unloading of cars and no right of access or regulation in the cars themselves. The court says: "It is a misnomer to speak of such an arrangement as an agreement for carriage at all," and held that "it was in no sense a common carrier's contract." It was therefore held perfectly legal and proper in such a contract to stipulate for exemption from responsibility for consequences which might follow from carelessness of servants in such special employment.

Another accident to circus cars drawn under a special contract stipulating against any liability of the railroad company for injury to any of the animals or property transported, even if caused by negligence of the railroad company's employees, was involved in the case of Forepaugh v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 128 Pa. 217, 5 L. R. A. 503, but the court, without discussing the question whether the transportation was that of a common carrier or not, held that the exemption from liability must be upheld as the contract of carriage was made in the state of New York where the alleged its said railroad and tracks; that the plaintiff was the owner of a certain circus known and described as the 'Cook & Whitby Circus,' consisting, besides employees, of a large number of horses, wagons, tents, harnesses, and a large quantity of other property, effects, and paraphernalia, and was also the owner of twenty-four cars; that on the said 7th day of July, 1892, at the city of Prairie du Chien, in Wisconsin, the defendant then and there received as common carrier the aforesaid twenty-four cars of the plaintiff, containing the aforesaid property and effects of the plaintiff, constituting said Cook & Whitby's Circus, and the people connected therewith, to be safely transported to the town of Maquoketa, state of Iowa, and to be safely delivered there to the plaintiff on the 8th day of July, before 9 o'clock of the forenoon of that day. The plaintiff avers that it was the duty of the defendant to provide safe, strong, and efficient locomotive power for the transportation of said cars, with the property and effects of the Cook & Whitby Circus, and it was also the duty of the defendant to construct and maintain its tracks and roadbed, at and near the station known as 'Sny Magill,' in the state of Iowa, in a safe and suitable condition; that the defendant negligently failed to provide strong and efficient locomotive power, and negligently failed to construct and maintain its tracks and roadbed in a safe and suitable condition at said point near Sny Magill, and that in consequence four of said cars were damaged, twenty-four horses were killed, other horses injured, and a large amount of harness was damaged; also that by reason of the accident plaintiff was prevented from giving performances of the circus, which he had advertised, in the vicinity of the town of Maquoketa and the city of Davenport, in the state of Iowa, and thereby lost the profits he would have made had he been able to give said performances. The second count of the declaration avers that on the 6th day of July, 1892, the defendant was possessed of and operating and controlling a certain railroad and railroad tracks in the state of Wisconsin, and operating and controlling certain steam locomotive power and engines upon and along the said railroad and railroad tracks; that upon said day the defendant, at the city of Richland Center, in the state of Wisconsin, received as a common carrier the aforesaid twenty-four cars of the plaintiff, containing all the aforesaid property and effects of plaintiff, constituting said Cook & Whitby's Circus, to be transported, by means of fit and adequate locomotive engine power to be furnished by the defendant, over the railroad and tracks aforesaid, from said city of Richland Center, in the state of Wisconsin, to the said city of Prairie du Chien, in the state of Wisconsin, and to deliver the same at Prairie du Chien on the 7th day of July, 1892, at or before the hour of 9 o'clock in the forenoon of that day; that it was the duty of the defendant to have provided safe and proper appliances at a certain switch located at and near a point south of said Richland Center, and to keep proper and sufficient lights and breach of it occurred, and in which such stipulations by common carriers were held valid.

In hauling coal cars belonging to the owner of the coal, a railroad company was held to be a common carrier in Mallory v. Tioga R. Co. 39 Barb. 488, where the transportation was under a contract by which the owner of the cars loaded and unloaded them and furnished brakemen whose service was subject to the railroad company's conductor. For the derailment of such cars the railroad company was held liable. The ground of the decision seems to be that the transportation of cars in this manner was in the line of the general business of the railroad company which by its charter was authorized to charge tolls, among other things, for "empty cars" while the charter directed that no person should place any car on the road without a permit or license from the company. The court also laid stress on the fact that the entire train was controlled and managed by the railroad employees, and that the brakemen furnished by the owner of the cars were in all respects under the control of the conductor. It further appeared that the owner of the coal had large quantities carried over the road, some of it in the railroad company's cars. It seems that the cars owned by him were made a part of the railroad company's train in the same way as if the coal had been in the railroad company's own cars. As showing the real effect of the decision, the court also said: "Yet if, as is claimed by them, they simply entered into a special engagement outside of their general business to provide the plaintiff with sufficient motive power to draw his cars over their road, under the care and control of his servants, they did not thereby assume the obligation of carriers. But the case proved to be, in my judgment, materially different from the one thus hypothetically stated."

Reasonable care and diligence are held to be the measure of liability of a railroad company in hauling

ing upon its line wagons belonging to private traders, as in the case of Watson v. North British R. Co. 8 Scotch Seas. Cas. (4th Series) 637, 8 Ry. & C. T. Cas. XVII. (So stated in Rapalje & Mack's Digest of Railway Law, vol. 2, p. 25.)

In transporting over a railroad an engine belonging to another company, the owner of the road was held liable for a collision of the engine with a passenger train where the engine was in charge of a conductor employed by the owner of the road, although an engine driver and fireman on the engine were furnished by its owner. Terre Haute & L. R. Co. v. Chicago, P. & St. L. R. Co. 150 Ill. 502.

Where a railroad company transports a car over its road upon its own trucks it is held to be a common carrier. New Jersey R. & Transp. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 27 N. J. L. 100.

The distinction between transportation which a railroad company makes as common carrier and that which it makes as a private carrier has been much discussed in other cases which do not specifically touch the question here considered in respect to special trains and special cars. It was much discussed in the earlier cases respecting contracts to limit liability, but mere modifications of the extent of the carrier's liability have long been considered insufficient to destroy the nature of the service as that of a common carrier.

It would seem to be reasonable to hold that in performing a service which it was under no obligation to perform as a common carrier if requested to do so, a railroad company might well contract as a private carrier, and to hold that it could not in this way change the character of its service to that of a private carrier when performing services which the law required it to perform whether it wished to do so or not. If that is to be adopted as the line of distinction, then it would seem that the hauling of special cars or special trains might be done in the capacity of a private carrier. B. A. R.

signals placed at and near said switch to indicate whether said switch was open or closed; that the defendant negligently failed and omitted to perform its duty in this regard, and that by reason thereof the locomotive hauling plaintiff's cars was derailed; that the defendant failed to proceed with due and proper diligence to get its locomotive engine back onto the main track, and that in consequence plaintiff's cars were delayed so long that they did not reach the city of Prairie du Chien in time to give performances, which had been advertised there. The defendant pleaded the general issue to the entire declaration, and afterwards a special plea to the jurisdiction of the court, which was subsequently stricken from the files by order of the court.

"On the trial it appeared that the plaintiff's cars and property were hauled by the defendant under a special contract made and executed June 1, 1892, by the railroad company and by the plaintiff, Wallace, through their duly authorized agents. This special contract reads as follows:

"This agreement, made and entered into this 1st day of June, A. D. 1892, by and between the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railway Company, party of the first part, and Cook & Whitby Circus, party of the second part, witnesseth: The party of the first part agrees to run a special train, consisting of ten flat cars, six stock cars, six passenger cars, two advertising cars, in all twenty-four cars, to be furnished by the party of the second part, to run between as below, and as below:

"Leaving:
Shakopee to Hastings, June 20th.....	$180
Hastings to Redwing, June 30th.....	180
Redwing to Faribault, Jul. 1st.....	180
Faribault to Decorah, Jul. 2d.....	225
Decorah to Roscoe, Jul. 4th.....	200
Roscoe to Richland Center, Jul. 5th.....	180
Richland Center to Prairie du Chien, Jul. 6th.....	200
Prairie du Chien to Maquoketa, Jul. 7th.....	200
Maquoketa to Davenport, Jul. 8th.....	180

"Deliver to Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railway at Davenport, where they leave our line, and carry on said special train, as before described, the circus property of said party of the second part, together with the people properly connected therewith, so far as the same shall be loaded on said train. The said train to be run so as to arrive at its several destinations at or about 6 o'clock in the morning, provided the same shall be loaded and ready to start in time to reach its several destinations at said hour. In consideration thereof the said party of the second part hereby agrees to pay to the said party of the first part the sums as specified above per day in advance (which said sum is a reduction from the usual and regular rates charged by said party of the first part for transportation services of the kind and nature above specified), the sum to be paid to the agent of the said party of the first part at the station from which the next succeeding run is to be made, it being mutually understood that no charge will be made for the use of train or trainmen on Mondays, when the runs for those days are made on the Sunday immediately preceding; and said party of the second part also agrees to load and unload said cars. In consideration of the agreement of said party of the first part to run said special train as above specified, and at and for the reduced rates above named, and also in consideration that, by the running of said special train as above specified, the said party of the first part increases the risks and dangers of operating its railway, and subjects its own property to a greater liability of being damaged, and in further consideration of the premises, said party of the second part does hereby covenant and agree to release and discharge said party of the first part of and from any and all liabilities for claims and damages of every name and nature, by reason or on account of any accident or injury, from whatever cause, that may occur to, or may be suffered or sustained by, any one, or all, of the persons composing or attached to said circus company, or to the cars or other property of said party of the second part, while in or on said train or upon any of the premises belonging to or used by said party of the first part, or by reason or on account of any delays that may occur in the running of said special train, or by failure to reach the several points of destination at the specified time. And, in and for the consideration last above mentioned, said party of the second part does hereby further covenant and agree that he will protect, and forever hold free and harmless, the said party of the first part, from any and all damages or claims for damages that he or they may sustain or incur by reason of any accident or injury that may happen to or be received by any one or more of the several persons composing or attached to said circus company, or permitted by said party of the second part to ride upon said train, or upon any of the premises belonging to or used by said party of the first part. J. H. Hiland, for the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Ry. Co. J. M. Hamilton, for Cook & Whitby."

"The plaintiff offered evidence tending to show that at a point near Sny Magill, on the defendant's road, and while plaintiff's special train was being transported from Prairie du Chien towards Maquoketa, certain of plaintiff's cars were derailed and thrown down an embankment; that as a result twenty-four horses belonging to plaintiff were killed outright, and four others died afterwards from injuries received, and about forty other horses were permanently injured; also that serious injury was done to a large number of sets of harnesses belonging to the plaintiff, as well as to the cars derailed, and that the plaintiff was prevented from giving, and lost probable profits of, performances of his circus at Maquoketa and Davenport, which he had advertised at considerable expense. Plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the derailment was caused by defective roadbed at the point of accident, and by reason of the fact that the locomotive used to haul plaintiff's train of cars was light and of insufficient power. Plaintiff's evidence also showed that, on the evening of the 7th of July, plaintiff's special train, after starting from Richland Center towards Prairie du Chien, was stopped by reason of the engine running off the track at a misplaced switch a short distance out of Richland Center; that this accident caused a delay of several hours, and thereby prevented the plaintiff from giving, and lost probable profits of, performances at Prairie du Chien, which he had advertised at considerable expense. His evidence tended to show that the accident was caused by negligence of the defendant, and that the delay was greatly aggravated by the failure of the defendant to take proper steps for replacing the locomotive upon the track. At the close of the plaintiff's case defendant moved the court to instruct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, which motion was overruled by the court, and an exception to the ruling duly taken.

"The testimony of the defendant tended to show that the accident at Sny Magill was not caused by the defective condition of the roadbed, or by reason of insufficient power in the locomotive used in the hauling of plaintiff's cars, but was caused by the breaking of an axle under one of plaintiff's cars; and that the accident to the switch at Richland Center, and the delay there, were not caused by any neglect or misconduct of the defendant or its servants. At the close of the evidence, the defendant requested the court to give certain written charges to the jury, instructing them that the defendant was not a common carrier, or subject to the liabilities of a common carrier, in accepting and transporting plaintiff's train of cars, and the property therein contained; that the defendant was therefore not restrained or controlled by rules applicable to contracts made by common carriers in the transaction of their ordinary business; and that the agreement releasing and discharging the defendant from any and all liability for claims and damages, of whatsoever nature, must control the rights of the parties, and should be enforced in favor of the defendant. The court refused all these requests, to which rulings exceptions were duly taken. The court, in substance, instructed the jury that the clause of the special contract exonerating defendant from all responsibility for loss or damage to plaintiff's property from any cause whatever was contrary to public policy, and void, in so far as it covered loss or damage occasioned by the gross negligence of the defendant or its servants, but was valid in all other respects; that if the jury found from the evidence that the defendant was guilty of gross negligence in not furnishing sufficient motive power and in not keeping its roadbed in proper condition, and that the damage to plaintiff was caused thereby, they should find for the plaintiff, notwithstanding the clause in the special contract exonerating defendant from liability. The jury thereupon brought in a general verdict for the plaintiff for $8,000, and the court, after overruling defendant's motion for a new trial, entered judgment on the verdict, and from that judgment the plaintiff in error, the defendant below, prosecutes this writ of error."

in their character, and so wholly and entirely without the scope of the business of a railroad common carrier, the railroad company cannot be deemed to have occupied the relation of a common carrier, but on the contrary it stood in the attitude of a private carrier or special bailee for hire, with reference to the cars and other property to be transported.

Bunn, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Proper assignments of error having been made by plaintiff in error, the main question in this court, as it was below, is whether the railroad company, in carrying the plaintiff's circus people, animals, and outfit, under the special contract in evidence, assumed the relation of a common carrier for hire. If it did, then the verdict must stand. If it did not, then the contract itself was a good defense to the action; and the whole case seems to depend upon this question. The court is of opinion that the railroad company had a right to make the contract with the defendant in error; that the contract was not against public policy, but was valid and binding upon the parties who made it, according to its terms and conditions. The railroad company is charged in the declaration as a common carrier of the persons and property named in the contract, but the contract itself is wholly ignored, and the declaration framed as though no contract had ever been made. If the plaintiff had the right thus to disregard the contract, and sue the railroad company as a common carrier, the recovery must stand, because in that case the company would be liable for any defect in its roadbed which common, or even extraordinary, prudence and foresight could remedy. It would also be liable for the negligence of its own employees, and for any insufficiency in the engine or engines employed to move the plaintiff's cars, which ordinary prudence and foresight may have remedied. But if the company, in carrying the plaintiff's property under the contract and in the circumstances in which the undertaking was entered into, was not acting as a common carrier of the plaintiff's goods, but in the capacity of an ordinary private carrier for hire, then the company had the right to make the contract, and both parties will be bound by its terms.

That the company, in carrying the goods under the contract, was a private, and not a common or public, carrier, is the conclusion which the court has reached. There was no evidence offered that the railroad company had ever carried similar goods for Wallace before in his own private cars, or that it had ever carried or held itself out to carry goods in that manner for others, and there is no presumption that railroad companies would do so. We know from common observation that they do not hold themselves out as common carriers of wild and domestic animals to be transported in the private cars of the owners, and loaded in a manner agreeable to the owners; persons, animals, horses, and other property being carried upon the same train, which is operated at irregular times and seasons, at the convenience of the owners of such cars. They ordinarily operate their freight trains and passenger trains separately, and upon time schedules, prepared in advance by experts for the company, and with a view to reduce the danger of accident to a minimum. Here was a special contract in writing, wholly different from the ordinary bill of lading, providing for the hauling of a special train of cars, belonging wholly to the defendant in error, to be loaded as he pleased with persons, wild animals, domestic animals, and other property, and to be run on special time, the hours of departure to depend upon the time when the plaintiff should have his cars loaded and ready to start. Wallace was to be wholly responsible for the loading and the unloading as well as for the care of the property while in transit, the only duty of the railroad company being to haul the cars. Another significant provision of the contract is that the property was to be carried at greatly reduced rates, in consideration of which the plaintiff was to assume all the risk of accidents, releasing the company therefrom. If this provision of the contract, as no doubt it was, was binding upon the railroad company, why not upon the plaintiff? The obligation was mutual. Why could not the railroad company say: "You wish your property carried in your own private cars, which is contrary to our usual rules and regulations, and at greatly reduced rates. You wish your entire circus troupe, horses, animals, and all the paraphernalia and accompaniments of a circus, carried for less money than at our rates as common carriers it would cost you to have the persons alone of your company transported, and you desire that they be carried at special times, also contrary to our rules as common carriers, and which materially increases risks in our business. Now, here are our roadbed and our engines. They have answered our own purposes of transportation fairly well. If you wish to take upon yourself all risk of damage by accident, we will accept your proposition, and carry at the rates proposed." There is nothing unlawful in this, unless we assume that the railroad company cannot carry property or persons at all, except as common carriers, which is against all rule and precedent. No common carriers undertake to carry every species of property, in respect to which they have not held themselves out as common carriers. They may contract as private carriers, and in that case they may make any reasonable contract. The railroad company as a common carrier could not enter into such a contract as this, because it cannot as a common carrier limit the liability imposed upon it from considerations of public policy. But the case is different in respect to property of which it is not a common carrier. If any authority were needed upon so plain a proposition it is not difficult to find.

In Hutchinson on Carriers, 2d ed. § 44, it is stated: "A common carrier may, however, undoubtedly become a private carrier or a bailee for hire, when, as a matter of accommodation or special engagement, he undertakes to carry something which it is not his business to carry. The relation in such a case is changed from that of a common carrier to that of a private carrier, and where this is the effect of a special arrangement, the carrier is not liable as a common carrier and cannot be proceeded against as such."

Again, at section 78, it is stated: "And even as to such carriers as are prima facie public or common carriers, it may be shown that, in the particular instance or under the circumstances of the case, they did not undertake to transport and are not liable as common carriers."

Again, at section 56a, ¶ 3, it is stated: "In the second place, in order to charge one as a common carrier of goods, the goods in question must be of the kind to which his business is confined. No carrier undertakes to carry all kinds of goods, but only such as are of the description which he professes to carry. A common carrier is therefore not liable as such where, by special engagement, or as a matter of accommodation merely, he undertakes to carry a class of goods which it is not his business to carry."

Again, at section 56b, it is stated: "Common carriers of goods do not undertake to carry by any or all means, but only by those means and methods and over the route to which their business is confined. . . . And even if a carrier should, in a particular instance, undertake by a special contract to carry goods by unusual and exceptional methods or routes, his liability would be based upon his contract and not by the ordinary rules governing common carriers."

In the case of New York O. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627, at page 377, 21 L. ed. 639, the court says: "A common carrier may undoubtedly become a private carrier, or a bailee for hire, when, as a matter of accommodation or special engagement, he undertakes to carry something which it is not his business to carry."

There are also two recently decided cases, one before the supreme court of Michigan and the other before the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, where a question almost identical with the one at bar was adjudged in the same way. Coup v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 56 Mich. 111; Robertson v. Old Colony R. Co. 156 Mass. 525.

The declaration charges the defendant specially as a common carrier. The court held it was not a common carrier in respect to the property which it undertook to carry under the contract, but nevertheless instructed the jury that "the contract made it the duty of the defendant to furnish reasonably safe and sufficient motive power to haul the cars of the plaintiff over the specified portion of its road, and the defendant will be liable if it failed, while attempting to perform its contract, to furnish such character of engine or motive power, and damage resulted therefrom to the plaintiff's property or business. And under such contract defendant was bound to have a reasonably safe roadbed, over which the cars and property of the plaintiff could be transported. If its roadbed was not in a reasonably safe condition, but was out of repair, so as to be unsafe and dangerous, and the defendant knew this fact, or by reasonable diligence could have known it, and the derailment of plaintiff's cars, and injury and damages to his property, were occasioned by such insufficient and insecure track and roadbed, then the defendant would be liable for such injury and damage,"—thus allowing a recovery upon a cause of action nowhere hinted at in the plaintiff's declaration. The plaintiff, if he recover, should recover according to his declaration. Kimball v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 26 Vt. 247, 69 Am. Dec. 567; White v. Great Western R. Co. 2 C. B. N. S. 7.

But, independent of this principle, we do not think there is any middle ground upon which to rest a recovery in this case. The railroad company was either liable as a common carrier as charged in the declaration, or it was not, and, if not, then the contract it made with Wallace, by which he assumed the risk of accident, was valid and binding. By the contract the defendant in error assumed all risk from accident, and for a proper consideration released and exonerated the railroad company from all damage occasioned thereby. He has got what he bargained for, or, if not, can sue upon his contract, but he must abide by its conditions.

The judgment of the court below should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the court below to award a new trial.

Musra, Gearin, Silvestone, Murphy, & Brodie, for respondent.

Bean, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, a corporation organized under the statute providing for the incorporation of churches, religious, benevolent, literary, and charitable institutions, brought this suit to restrain the sheriff of Multnomah county from enforcing the collection of taxes levied upon its property for state and county purposes for the year 1892, claiming that such property is exempt from taxation under the Constitution and laws of the state. From the agreed statement of facts it appears that plaintiff was incorporated in 1878. Its Constitution declares that "the objects of this society shall be charity and benevolence, for the purpose of contributing a weekly allowance for sickness, and the means of defraying the expenses consequent upon the death of a member, and to contribute for the above-named purposes such sums as a majority of the members may be pleased to contribute." It is further provided by its Constitution and by-laws that "every Irishman, or the son of an Irishman, or a son of a member of the society," between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years, "of good moral character, possessed of reputable means of support, and free from all infirmities that might render him burdensome to the society," and a resident of the city of Portland for sixty days preceding his application, may, upon first being duly elected, "become a member thereof by signing the Constitution and paying an initiation fee of $5." Every person who has been a member of the society for six months, and whose name is on the "list of active members," is entitled, in case of sickness, "to receive such sum as the society may direct, not to exceed $7 per week, for three months in succession," provided he furnishes a doctor's certificate that through sickness he is confined to his bed, and that he has not been instrumental in causing his sickness. In addition to this allowance, the society may extend benevolence to sick members as it may deem necessary, to be decided by a two-thirds vote of the members present at any regular meeting. On the death of a member in good standing, a sum of money not less than $25, nor more than $75, is to be paid for funeral expenses; and his widow or orphans are entitled to receive $25, and, if need be, in three months thereafter, a like sum. Upon the death of his wife, a member is entitled to receive the sum of $40 for funeral expenses. If there is no money in the treasury for sick or funeral expenses, when required, the board of directors is authorized to levy a special tax on the members for that purpose, and no other. It is provided that no money shall be drawn from the treasury for any but benevolent purposes, and none of the income or revenue of the society is to be used for any purpose other than as set out in the Constitution, except for the payment of principal and interest on its indebtedness, and the purchase and improvement of real estate. Provision is also made for the appointment of a committee of three members, whose duty it shall be, when notified of the illness of a member, to visit him as often as convenient, and report from time to time to the board of managers the condition of the member, lest sick dues might be drawn from the treasury contrary to the Constitution. The property assessed consists of lot 1, block 177, in the city of Portland, upon which is erected a three-story brick building, the lower story of which is rented for stores, the second story for offices (except one room, which is occupied by the plaintiff), and the third story for a public hall; the revenue derived from such rental being exclusively devoted to the objects and purposes of the society. Upon these facts the court below found that plaintiff was a charitable institution, within the meaning of the exemption law, and that the property in question was actually occupied by the plaintiff for the purposes for which it was incorporated, although the greater part of the building was leased to sundry persons, to be used for purposes wholly unconnected with the society, and entered a decree enjoining the collection of the tax. From this decree the defendant appeals.

Section 1, article 9, of the Constitution directs that "the legislative assembly shall provide by law for uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation; and shall prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property, both real and personal, excepting such only for municipal, educational, literary, scientific, religious, or charitable purposes as may be specially exempted by law." Under this provision no property can be relieved from taxation except such as may be in use for some of the purposes enumerated therein, and then only to the extent specially permitted by legislative enactment. The Constitution itself does not exempt any property from taxation, and it authorizes the legislature to do so only for municipal, educational, literary, scientific, religious, or charitable pur poses. It follows, then, that, before property can be exempted from taxation, it must not only be used for some of the purposes specified in the Constitution, but must be specially authorized by law. Now, the statute which undertakes to exempt property from taxation, and by which the questions presented in this case must be solved, was passed by the territorial legislature in 1854, and, so far as not inconsistent with the Constitution, continued in force by section 7 of article 18 of that instrument, and is now section 2732 of Hill's Annotated Laws. By subdivision 3 of this section, it is provided that "the personal property of all literary, benevolent, charitable, and scientific institutions, incorporated within this state, and such real estate belonging to such institutions as shall be actually occupied for the purposes for which they were incorporated," shall be exempt from taxation. Under these constitutional and statutory provisions, it is manifest that real property, to be exempt from taxation, must belong to some incorporated literary, benevolent, charitable, or scientific institution, and must be actually occupied for literary, benevolent, charitable, or scientific purposes.

The contention for the defendant is that the real property upon which the tax in question was laid is not exempt from taxation, for the reasons (1) that plaintiff is not a charitable institution, within the meaning of the law, because its benefits are confined to its own members and their families; and (2) that the property assessed is not actually occupied for the purpose for which it was incorporated.

Upon the first point the argument of his counsel is that a charitable institution, within the meaning of the exemption law, is one whose benefits are extended to the public generally, or some indefinite portion thereof, without regard to the relation the recipient may bear to the members of the particular organization or society, or to the fees or dues paid. But the principal authorities relied upon by him in support of this position were determinations of controversies arising under constitutional or legislative enactments exempting from taxation property belonging to institutions devoted to "purely public charity," which it is held does not include charitable institutions whose benevolence is confined to their own members, or persons having some particular relationship to such members. Philadelphia v. Masonic Home, 160 Pa. 572, 23 L. R. A. 545; Swift v. Beneficial Soc. 73 Pa. 262; Delaware County Inst. of S. v. Delaware County, 94 Pa. 168; Donohugh's App. 86 Pa. 306; Mitchell v. Franklin County Treasurer, 25 Ohio St. 144; Babb v. Reed, 5 Rawle, 151, 28 Am. Dec. 650; Burd Orphan Asylum v. Upper Darby School Dist. 90 Pa. 31; Hennepin County v. Brotherhood of O. of G. 27 Minn. 460, 38 Am. Rep. 298. But under constitutional or legislative provisions which, like ours, provide for the exemption of certain property belonging to "charitable institutions," and used for charitable purposes, it is believed that such an institution is entitled to the benefit of the exemption, although its benefactions are confined to its own members or their families. Thus, in 30 L. R. A.

Indianapolis v. Grand Lodge of Indiana, 25 Ind. 518, it is held that an institution which extends charity to its own members only is a charitable institution, within the meaning of the law exempting such institutions from taxation, the court saying: "The third paragraph of the answer presents the question whether that is a charitable institution, in the sense of the statute, which confines its benefactions to those who have become members of the Masonic order, having paid the fees commonly required for that purpose. We think that this question must be answered in the affirmative. It is not essential to charity that it shall be universal. That an institution limits the dispensation of its blessings to one sex, or to the inhabitants of a particular city or district, or to the membership of a particular religious or secular organization, does not, we think, deprive it either in legal or popular apprehension of the character of a charitable institution. If that only be charity which relieves human want, without discriminating amongst those who need relief, then indeed it is a rarer virtue than has been supposed. And if one organization may confine itself to a sex, or church, or city, why not to a given fraternity? So narrow a definition of charity as the third paragraph presupposes is not, that we are aware of, ever attached to it, and we are not at liberty to circumscribe the effect of the statute, and defeat its intention, by affixing to its terms an unusually limited meaning." So also, in Petersburg v. Petersburg Benev. Mechanics' Assn. 78 Va. 481, it was held that an association which applies its revenues to the payment of current expenses, and to the relief of its indigent members and the families of such as have died in need, was a charitable institution. "These are charitable purposes," says the court, "and the relief afforded is none the less charity because confined to members of the association and the families of deceased members. It is not essential to charity that it shall be universal." And, again, in Book Agents of M. E. Church, South, v. Hinton, 92 Tenn. 188, 19 L. R. A. 289, it was held that a corporation created as an arm or agency of the Methodist Church, and charged with the duty of manufacturing and distributing books, periodicals, etc., in the interest and under the auspices of the church, and thereby raising a fund with which to support its worn-out preachers and their families, is a religious and charitable institution, within the meaning of the provision of the Constitution exempting such institutions from taxation. From an examination of this question and all the authorities within our reach bearing upon it, we take the result to be that an institution organized for benevolent and charitable purposes, free from any element of private or corporate gain, and which devotes its entire revenue to the payment of current expenses and the relief of the poor and needy, is a charitable institution, within the meaning of the law, although it may confine its benefits primarily to its own members and their families.

But, whether the plaintiff is such an institution or not, we are clear the property in question is not exempt from taxation, because it is not actually occupied for charitable purposes. Subdivision 3 of section 2732, supra, under which the exemption is claimed, exempts only such real property belonging to incorporated literary, benevolent, charitable, or scientific institutions as shall be actually occupied for the purposes for which they were incorporated. It does not exempt from taxation the enumerated institutions as such, or real estate simply because it belongs to such institutions, or even because it is used for literary, scientific, charitable, or benevolent purposes, but it expressly confines the right of exemption to such real estate only belonging to them as shall be actually occupied in a particular manner and for a specified purpose; and this right, therefore, clearly cannot be extended to property occupied and used for other and different purposes, although the revenue derived from its use is devoted exclusively to the objects for which the institution was established. It is the actual occupancy of the property which determines its right to exemption, and not the use made of its proceeds. The plain and obvious meaning of the statute is that only the real estate actually occupied and in use by these different institutions for the purposes for which they were organized shall be exempt from taxation. While so occupied and used, it does not come in competition with the property of other owners; and the purpose for which it is used was supposed by the legislature to be a sufficient benefit to the public to justify its exemption from the burdens of taxation imposed upon other property. But, when such property is used for the purpose of accumulating money, the law imposes upon it the same burden of taxation as it imposes upon other property similarly situated. The statute does not undertake to discriminate between the uses which different societies or individuals will make of the proceeds of their business, and determine, for that reason, that one shall be taxed, and the other not. It deals with the property as it finds it, and not with what may be done with its proceeds in the future. Upon this question the authorities are practically unanimous, under similar statutory provisions. Indianapolis v. Grand Master of G. L. 25 Ind. 518; Presbyterian Theological Seminary of N. W. v. People, 101 Ill. 578; Washburn College v. Shawnee County Comrs. 8 Kan. 344; Detroit Young Men's Soc. v. Detroit, 8 Mich. 173; *Cincinnati College v. Cas. 488; and Book Agents of M. E. Church, South, v. Hinton (Tenn.) 19 L. R. A. 289.

It is so manifestly just that all property shall bear its due proportion of the expenses of government that laws granting exemption from taxation are always strictly construed, and, before such exemption can be admitted, the intent of the legislature to confer it must be clear beyond a reasonable doubt. Thus, it is held that laws exempting from taxation "houses of religious worship," or "buildings erected and used for religious worship," or "property used for religious purposes," etc., do not exempt a parsonage erected by a religious society for the use of its minister, although occupied by him free of rent and built on grounds which would otherwise be exempt. State v. Astell, 41 N. J. L. 117; Hennepin County v. Grace, 27 Minn. 503; Ramsey County v. Church of Good Shepherd, 45 Minn. 229, 11 L. R. A. 175; Third Congregational Soc. v. Beach, 10 Kan. 214. And a building belonging to the Young Men's Christian Association, which contains above the basement, in which are the gymnasium, bowling alley, and bath room, twenty-two rooms, only one of which is devoted to public worship, was held not exempt, under a law exempting "every building used exclusively for public worship." Young Men's Christian Assn. v. New York, 118 N. Y. 187. The Constitution of this state requires an equal and uniform rate of assessment and taxation of all property, excepting "such only for municipal, educational, literary, scientific, religious, or charitable purposes as may be specially exempted by law." Taxation is therefore the rule; exemption, the exception; and nothing can be held to be exempt by implication. It is only such property used for the purposes specified in the Constitution, as the legislature may specially exempt, which can escape taxation. Exemption is not a matter of right, but a pure matter of grace; and every person or corporation claiming that his or its property, or any part thereof, is exempt, must be able to show some clear constitutional or legislative provision to that effect. The legislature, in its wisdom, has provided that, of the real property belonging to literary, benevolent, charitable, or scientific institutions incorporated within this state, such only shall be exempt from taxation as shall be actually occupied for the purposes for which they were incorporated; and, under all the rules for the construction of exemption laws, this cannot be held to include real property which is occupied for other purposes, although the revenues received therefrom may be used for the pur-nesses of the corporation. Some of the authorities cited go to the extent of holding that when a portion only of a building belonging to such an institution is occupied for the purposes for which it was incorporated, and the remainder is occupied by tenants paying rent, the entire building is liable to taxation; but the general tenor of the authorities, and no doubt the better rule, is that in such case the assessor, in estimating the value of the property, should make a proper allowance for the portion of the building occupied by the society, so that the tax levied will be laid only upon the value of that which is not exempt, though the property may be assessed as a whole.

It is insisted by the plaintiff that the state is estopped from levying the tax in question for the reason that, while it has owned the property assessed since 1877, no attempt was made to assess it until the year 1890, and that, relying upon that fact, it borrowed in that year $53,000 on a mortgage, to enable it to erect the building now on the premises, and stipulated and agreed to pay the taxes on such mortgage. But the neglect or omission of the proper officers to assess the property cannot control the duty imposed by law upon their successors, or affect the legal construction of the statute under which its exemption from taxation is claimed. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. v. Dennis, 116 U. S. 685, 29 L. ed. 770.

The case of State v. Addison, 3 S. C. N. S. 490, relied upon by plaintiff, is not in point. That was a proceeding to enforce a municipal tax. The city had by ordinance, in 1798, exempted all and every religious and charitable society from the payment of any city tax, and the city council for more than three quarters of a century had included the relators as among the societies thus exempted; and the court held that the action of the city council for so long a time would be received as the proper interpretation of their own enactment so long as it remained in force.

Again, it is claimed that, because the name appearing on the assessment roll as the owner of the property is "Hibernian Benevolent Society," and not the "Portland Hibernian Benevolent Society,"—the real owner,—the assessment is void, and should be enjoined. But we understand the rule to be that a court of equity will not interfere by injunction to restrain the collection of a tax merely because of alleged illegality or irregularity appearing upon the face of the assessment, but will leave the party to his remedy at law. 1 High, Inj. § 491; Odin v. Woodruff (Fla.) 23 L. R. A. 699, and note. "In view of the authorities," says Lord, Ch. J., "the considerations which influenced a court of equity to restrain the collection of a tax are confined to cases where the tax itself is not authorized, or, if it is, that such tax is assessed upon property not subject to taxation, or that the persons imposing it were without authority in the premises, or that they have proceeded fraudulently." Welch v. Clatsop County, 24 Or. 487.

It follows that the decrees of the court below must be reversed, and the complaint dismissed. 30 L. R. A.

(-----Or.-----)

1. The legislature has power to require a city to incur a debt without its consent for the acquisition of public bridges and ferries, as is done by act 1895 relating to the city of Portland, in the absence of any constitutional prohibition.
2. A statute providing for the acquisition of bridges and ferries by a city, the issuance of bonds in payment therefor, the transfer of the property to the county, and the collection of taxes by the county to pay the bonds, does not embrace more than one subject, in violation of Const. art. 4, § 20.
3. The acquisition by a city of certain bridges and ferries which were already public highways, provided for by act 1895, is not included in the laying out, opening, and working of highways, for which special or local laws are forbidden by Const. art. 4, § 23, subd. 7.
4. A statute requiring a county tax to be levied and collected like other taxes, for the purpose of maintaining bridges and ferries, being in effect a requirement only that the sums required shall be included in the estimate for county purposes, does not violate Const. art. 4, § 23, subd. 10, prohibiting local or special laws for assessment and collection of taxes.
5. The transfer of the management and control of public bridges and ferries may be made by the legislature to any governmental agency, such as a county court, although the bridges and ferries belong to a city.
6. The requirement that a county shall pay the debt of a city within it, made by act 1895 providing for a county tax to pay the interest and principal on the bridge bonds of the city of Portland, is unconstitutional.
7. The maintenance of a ferry by the county of Multnomah at Sellwood is not within the subject of act 1895 providing for the acquisition of specified bridges and ferries by the city of Portland.

The legislature has not undertaken to relieve the city of Portland from the payment of the bonds issued on account of the bridges and ferries, or cast the same upon the county.

If it had done so, and had required the county of Multnomah to assume such indebtedness, it would clearly be within the constitutional power of the legislature so to do.

The court will take judicial knowledge that the consolidated city of Portland is practically the county of Multnomah, and that more than three fourths of the people of that county reside within the city of Portland, and that more than three fourths of the taxable property of the county is situate within said city.

If the legislature should see fit to extend the boundaries of such quasi municipal corporation by including additional territory or even the remainder of the county, thereby determining the limits of the taxing district, it has done only that which is within the undoubted power of the legislature to do, and is in no wise different from the division of cities or counties or the consolidation thereof, the right of the 30 L. legislature to do which has never been questioned.

The bridges already purchased, at least, are property rights of which the city cannot be divested without its consent, inasmuch as they were bought by the city and paid for with its money.

The city is not a mere custodian of the bridges, but has a beneficial property interest in them, in that it is allowed to charge tolls to railways and street railways, while they are free to other vehicles and pedestrians. This is a source of revenue, and the act of the legislative assembly authorizing the acquisition of the bridges coupled with this privilege, gave the city an interest in them which cannot be divested or impaired without its consent, except by due process of law and upon just compensation paid.

Bean, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These two cases, which for convenience were heard together in this court, involve the constitutionality of an act of the legislature of 1895 providing for the acquisition by the city of Portland of the Morrison street bridge, Stark street ferry, and the upper deck of the steel bridge, and requiring the supervision, 30 L. R. A.

management, and control of said bridges and ferry, when so acquired, and of all the free bridges and ferries of the city acquired under the acts of 1891 and 1893, to be turned over to the Multnomah county court, to be thereafter supervised, managed, and controlled by said court. The provisions of the act, in brief, are: That a committee, designated as a bridge committee, is thereby appointed, and charged with the duty of acquiring in the name and on behalf of the city of Portland, by purchase or condemnation, the Morrison street bridge and Stark street ferry, and of leasing the upper deck of the steel bridge, and for that purpose it is authorized to issue and dispose of the bonds of the city, not to exceed in amount the sum of $200,000. After the two bridges specified and the ferry are thus acquired and are ready for use, the bridge committee is required to turn them over to the county court of Multnomah county. The act further provides that the bridge committee appointed under the act of 1891, and which now has control of the Madison and Burnside street bridges and Albina ferry, shall immediately turn over and deliver to said court all the bridges and ferries and property connected therewith in its possession and under its control, and the county court is required to take charge of, maintain, and operate the same, as well as the bridges and ferry to be acquired under this act, as free bridges and ferries, and to that end is given power and authority to employ all such agents or servants as it may deem necessary, and to make all needful rules and regulations for the conduct, management, and use of such bridges and ferries by the city, its inhabitants, and the public in general. The county court is required to levy and collect, in the manner and form as other taxes are levied and collected, a tax each year upon all the taxable property within the county sufficient, with such revenues as may be received from said bridges and ferries, to maintain and keep them in good condition and repair during the ensuing year, and to pay the annual rental for the upper deck of the steel bridge; and it is also required to levy and collect a tax sufficient to pay the interest to accrue upon the bonds authorized by this act to be issued, and also upon the bridge bonds already outstanding against the city, amounting to $550,000; and, at the expiration of ten years from the passage of the act, the county court is required to levy and collect an additional tax, sufficient to raise a sum of money annually equal in amount to one twentieth part of the bonds then outstanding, to be used as a sinking fund, for the purpose of paying off and retiring such bonds. It is declared by the act, however, that the bonds already issued, and those to be issued, in accordance with its provisions, are to remain as existing, valid, and binding obligations of the city of Portland, and the city is directed and required to pay, as the same matures, the interest on the bonds, and the principal thereof when due, in the event that the county court of Multnomah county fails or neglects to do so. It is further provided that the county court shall establish and maintain a free ferry across the river at Sellwood at a cost not to exceed $3,400 per annum, and for that purpose it shall cause to be used such of the ferry boats as may be acquired by it under this act. The bridge act of 1891 and the amendment thereto of 1893 are repealed. It is stoutly contended that the act in question is unconstitutional for the several reasons hereinafter noticed, and, while we are satisfied that the contention is well founded in some respects, and are conscious that in others the validity of the act is not free from doubt, yet we cannot declare it wholly void because some of its provisions are so and others are involved in doubt. The courts will never exercise the extraordinary power of declaring an act of the legislature unconstitutional unless there is a plain, palpable, and clear conflict between the statute and the Constitution, which, in our opinion, does not exist in this case. King v. Portland, 2 Or. 152; Cook v. Port of Portland, 30 Or. 580, 18 L. R. A. 538.

In the first place, the entire act is challenged upon the ground that it is incompetent for the legislature to compel the city of Portland to incur a debt for the construction of public bridges within its boundaries, and much was said at the argument about the inexpediency and injustice of such legislation, and the effect previous legislation of this character has already had upon the financial affairs of the city. But the question is one of power alone, and, however unjust, inexpedient, or even oppressive such legislation may be, the courts are powerless to declare it invalid if it is within the legitimate exercise of legislative powers. A municipal corporation is but the creature of the legislature, and in its governmental or public capacity is one of the instruments or agents of the state for governmental purposes, possessing certain prescribed political and municipal powers, to be exercised by it on behalf of the general public rather than for itself; and over it, as such agent, the authority of the legislature is supreme, and without limitation or restriction other than such as may be found in the Constitution. There is a line of authorities which hold, and perhaps properly, that a municipal corporation cannot be burdened with a debt without its consent for a matter of local, as distinguished from state, purposes. People v. Detroit, 28 Mich. 228, 15 Am. Rep. 202; People v. Chicago, 51 Ill. 17, 2 Am. Rep. 378; People v. Batchellor, 53 N. Y. 128, 18 Am. Rep. 480. But it seems to be substantially agreed that when the debt or liability is to be incurred in the discharge of some duty which is imposed upon the municipality exclusively for public purposes, and in the performance of which the general public, as distinguished from the inhabitants of the particular municipality, have an interest, it is within the power of the legislature to compel it to perform such duty and incur a debt therefor. That the making and establishment of public highways and bridges, and the assessment and collection of taxes, are within the legitimate legislative powers, and are among the ordinary subjects of legislation, cannot be questioned. Nor do we think it can be successfully denied that the bridges and ferries referred to in the act under consideration will, when acquired, belong to the city of Portland in its public or governmental capacity, and that in the acquisition of them it is but discharging a public or state duty which it is entirely proper for the legislature to impose upon it; and therefore, if there is no limitation in the Constitution, it is no objection to the validity of an act for that purpose that a debt or liability against the corporation is to be created without its consent. Cooley, Taxn. 682; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 74; Winters v. George, 21 Or. 251; State v. George, 22 Or. 142, 16 L. R. A. 787; Philadelphia v. Field, 58 Pa. 320; Baltimore United German Bank v. Katz, 57 Md. 145; Davis v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 47 N. Y. 400. That the construction of bridges and highways in a city, and the incurring of a debt therefor, should ordinarily be left to the judgment and discretion of the proper municipal authorities is manifestly just and in harmony with the right of local self-government and the theory of our political institutions, but the policy of such legislation is not for the courts. When the power is conceded, the courts cannot inquire into the expediency or manner of its exercise, or the motives or reasons prompting the particular act. We conclude, therefore, that the act in question is not invalid because it compels the city of Portland to incur a debt, without its consent, for the acquisition of public bridges and ferries.

It is next contended that the act embraces more than one subject, and therefore is in violation of section 20, article 4, of the Constitution, which declares that "every act shall embrace but one subject, and matters properly connected therewith, which subject shall be expressed in the title." The design of this provision of the Constitution was to prevent matters wholly foreign, and having no relation to each other, from being embraced in one bill, and "this purpose is fully accomplished when the law has but one general object, which is fairly indicated by its title." People v. Mahaney, 18 Mich. 495. The subject or general object of the law in question, as expressed in its title, is the acquisition, control, and management of certain specified bridges and ferries across the Willamette river at Portland, and the details by which it is to be accomplished are matters properly connected therewith, and do not constitute more than one subject within the meaning of the Constitution. Whether the body of the act contained any provisions which are void because not properly within the subject expressed in the title will be considered later.

It is also contended that the act is in conflict with subdivision 7, section 23, article 4, of the Constitution, which forbids the passage by the legislature of special or local laws "for laying, opening, and working on highways, and for the election or appointment of supervisors." It may be conceded that the act in question is special and local, but still we do not think it comes within the provision of the Constitution referred to. This provision was probably designed to require the legislature to provide by general law for the laying, opening, and working of the ordinary highways and public roads of the state, and to prevent any interference with the general highway system by special or local acts. But if it is applicable to public highways within a municipal corporation, the act under review clearly does not come within its provisions. It does not in any sense provide for the laying or opening of a highway. The bridges and ferries referred to therein were, at the time of the passage of the act, and for a long time before had been, open and in use by the public as highways. Their character as such was already established. The bridges and ferries purchased, acquired, and constructed by the commission appointed under the act of 1891 were then free and open highways, and, while it is true that the public easement was subject to the payment of tolls for passage over the bridges and ferry to be acquired under its provisions, they were nevertheless public highways, and the rights of the owners were to be extinguished before their supervision and control were to be transferred to the county court. By the transfer to the county contemplated by this act, these bridges and ferries were to continue as public highways, but their character as such is in no way derived from the act itself, and therefore it does not provide for the laying or opening of a highway and the case of Mazwell v. Tillamook County, 20 Or. 495, which declares an act which did so provide invalid, is not in point. The effect of the act of 1895 is simply to transfer the management, control, and maintenance of certain existing public highways from one governmental agency, constituted and appointed by the legislature, to another, designated by the same authority, but it does not undertake to lay out or open or provide for the laying or opening of such highways. Nor do we think the act in question is for the working of highways within the meaning of the provision of the Constitution under consideration. This provision, so far as the working of highways is concerned, was intended to apply to such roads and highways as are a part of the general highway system of the state, and can be maintained and kept in repair under a general law, and not to the public bridges and ferries of a city, which are exempt from the operation of such laws, and which, in the nature of things, cannot be so kept up and maintained. Elliott, Roads & Streets, 329. Indeed, it was said by Judge McArthur in East Portland v. Multnomah County, 6 Or. 65, that this provision of the Constitution only applies and is limited to the roads and highways traversing the rural districts, and not to the streets and alleys of a city; and in Lafayette v. Jenners, 10 Ind. 79, it is said by way of argument that a street is not a highway in any sense within the meaning of a constitutional provision like ours, and it is not apparent that this construction would fail to accomplish the purposes intended by the framers of the Constitution. But whether this is so in the matter of opening and laying of highways it is unnecessary to consider at this time, for no such question is presented by this record. But it does not seem to us that the legislature is inhibited by this provision of the Constitution from transferring, by special or local law, the supervision and control of an existing public bridge or ferry constructed by and within the boundaries of a municipal corporation from such corporation to a county, and requiring the latter to maintain and keep it in repair. The Constitution of 1874 of the state of New York contains a provision forbidding the passage by the legislature of any private or local bill "laying out, opening, altering, working, or discontinuing roads, highways, or alleys," and this provision was invoked to defeat a private and local act of the legislature of that state which authorized the conveyance by a certain turnpike company of a portion of its road to park commissioners, and which made provision for the improvement and ornamentation of the road authorized to be conveyed, and for the payment of the costs of such improvement, and for the keeping of the same in repair; but the court of appeals held that the constitutional provision was only designed to prevent any interference with the general highway system of the state, or with keeping the ordinary highways and public roads in repair under that system, and the supervision of the officers designated, and in the use of the means and the labor provided by law, and that the act in question did not in any of its provisions provide for the opening or working of a highway in the sense in which that term is used in the Constitution, although the road referred to belonged at the time to a private corporation, which was charging and collecting tolls thereon. People v. Banks, 87 N. Y. 568. This case, in many of its features, is similar in principle to the case at bar, and it seems to us the doctrine announced there is controlling here.

It is next objected that the act is violative of subdivision 10, section 28, article 4 of the Constitution, which prohibits the passage by the legislature of special or local laws "for the assessment and collection of taxes for state, county, township, or road purposes." The evident purpose of this provision was to prohibit the legislature from passing a special or local law providing a mode or manner for the assessment and collection of taxes in the enumerated cases which would interfere with or contravene the method of assessing and collecting taxes as provided by the general law, but not, in our opinion, to inhibit the legislature from authorizing or requiring a county to levy and collect a tax at the same time and in the same manner as other taxes are levied and collected for specified public purposes, and that is all the law in question required. It does not purport to provide a special manner for the assessment and collection of taxes, but only requires the county of Multnomah to include in its estimate for county purposes a sum sufficient to meet certain expenses which, by the act in question, the county is required to pay, and a tax sufficient to meet these expenses is to be assessed and collected as other taxes are assessed and collected; and hence we do not think it is a special and local law for the assessment and collection of taxes within the meaning of the Constitution.

It is also contended that the legislature cannot take from the city of Portland the supervision, management, and control of the public bridges and ferries belonging to it, and transfer them to the county of Multnomah. In the first place, these bridges and ferries are not now, and never have been, under the supervision of the city of Portland, but are managed and controlled by a committee or commission appointed for that purpose by the legislature, and this act only purports to transfer their management and control from such committee to another state or governmental agent. But, if it were otherwise, the law is now too well settled to be questioned that the public highways of a city are not the private property of the municipality, but are for the use of the general public, and that, as the legislature is the representative of the public at large, it has, in the absence of any constitutional restriction, paramount authority over such ways, and may grant the use or supervision and control thereof to some other governmental agency so long as they are not diverted to some use substantially different from that for which they were originally intended. 3 Dill. Mun. Corp. 656, and authorities there cited; Coolley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 885, and note. In accordance with this principle, it was held, in Portland & W. V. R. Co. v. Portland, 14 Or. 188, 58 Am. Rep. 299, that an act of the legislature granting the use of the public levee of the city of Portland to a railway company for railway purposes was a valid exercise of legislative powers. So also it was held in People v. Walsh, 96 Ill. 232, 36 Am. Rep. 185, that it was competent for the legislature to transfer the control of the streets of a city to park commissioners, to be by them controlled for boulevard and driveway purposes. A city occupies, as it were, a dual relation to the state,—the one governmental or political, and the other proprietary or private. In its governmental or political capacity it is nothing more than a mere governmental agent, subject to the absolute control of the legislature, except as restricted by the Constitution, and such property and easements as it may have in public streets and ways are held by it in such capacity, and at the will of the legislature. But, on the other hand, such property as it may hold or acquire in its proprietary or private capacity is as much protected by the Constitution as the property of the private citizen, and of which it cannot be deprived except for public purposes, and only then upon just compensation. To the latter effect are the authorities cited and relied upon by the defendant, and they are therefore not in point in this discussion.

It is next contended that it is not within the power of the legislature to compel the property of Multnomah county to be taxed for the payment of a debt of the city of Portland, incurred in the purchase and construction of the Madison and Burnside street bridges and Albina ferry, and to be incurred under the act in question before the county is required to receive or accept the Morrison street bridge, Stark street ferry, or the upper deck of the steel bridge. On this question there seems to be but little authority, but we think it clear upon principle that such legislation cannot be sustained. As Parker, Ch. J., says: "It certainly must be admitted that, by the principles of every free government, and of our Constitution in particular, it is not in the power of the legislature to create a debt from one person to another, or from one corporation to another, without the consent, express or implied, of the party to be charged." Hampshire County v. Franklin County, 16 Mass. 88. A question involving the authority of the legislature to compel a town to be taxed for the payment of debts previously contracted for the purpose of acquiring title to and constructing a public park partly within the boundaries of the town sought to be charged, was before the court of appeals of New York (Re Assessment of Lands, 60 N. Y. 898), and in holding such legislation invalid the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Miller, said: "Had the respondents been originally assessed for benefit conferred under a proper law it might then be said that the assessment was for public use, and not for a subsisting debt, and such an assessment could have been enforced. But such is not this case. And those assessed are required, by the proceedings of the commissioners, to aid in the discharge of a debt previously contracted, and to contribute money which is to be paid into a sinking fund, and to be appropriated for the payment of bonds, already issued, for the location and improvement of the park. There is no principle, that I am aware of, which sanctions the doctrine that it is within the taxing power of the legislature to compel one town, city, or locality to contribute to the payment of the debts of another. The government has no such authority, and this case is entirely without a precedent. If such assessments were authorized they might not be limited to adjoining towns, cities, or villages, but applied to those located at great distances from each other. Such legislation would be unjust, mischievous, and oppressive, and cannot be tolerated." It is competent for the legislature, in the exercise of its plenary powers over public highways of the city of Portland, to transfer the management and control of the bridges and ferries in question from the commission appointed by it to the county, and to determine and provide the mode in which the burden of maintaining and keeping them in repair shall be borne in the future (Scituate v. Weymouth, 106 Mass. 128), but it is not within its power to summarily declare that a debt of the city of Portland shall be paid by the county although in fact incurred for the construction of such bridges and ferries. Nor do we think the fact that the city of Portland is within the county of Multnomah, and perhaps contains a large proportion of the inhabitants and taxable property of the county, in any way affects the question. The two corporations are separate and distinct entities, and, so far as we can see, it is no more competent for the legislature to compel the county to pay the debts of the city than the city to pay those of the county. It would indeed be, as Miller, J., says, "without a precedent," to compel every property owner in the county outside of the city to suffer a lien upon his property for the next thirty years for its proportionate share of the interest and principal due and to become due on a debt of the city already contracted and outstanding. If such legislation can be sustained, there is nothing to prevent the legislature from compelling property in the county to be taxed for any or all debts of the city incurred for public or governmental purposes, and it would hardly be contended that legislation so manifestly unjust and mischievous could be sustained. The legislature may perhaps compel a municipal corporation to recognize and pay a debt, although not binding on it in a strict legal sense, when there is an equitable or moral obligation on the corporation to pay it. Dill, Mun. Corp. § 75. But no such authority exists when there is neither a legal, moral, nor equitable obligation resting on the corporation sought to be charged, as in this case, where it is proposed to summarily transfer the debt from one corporation to another.

And, finally, it is claimed that so much of the act of 1895 as requires the county to levy a tax for the maintenance and repair of the specified bridges and ferries, and to maintain a ferry at Sellwood, is invalid because not within the subject as expressed in the title of the act. The title of the act by its terms is limited to the acquisition and control of certain specified bridges and a particular ferry to be acquired under its provisions, and to the bridges and ferries in the possession and under the control of the present bridge commission, and we do not think the provision requiring the county to maintain a ferry at Sellwood can be said to be within the subject of the act as so limited, or properly connected therewith, and hence such provision must be declared invalid. But it is clearly stated in the title that one of the purposes of the act is to require the county of Multnomah county "to assume the management, control, and supervision of such bridges and ferries," and this is certainly broad enough to sustain a provision requiring the county to provide the funds with which to pay the expenses of such management, control, and supervision, and such provision is germane to and properly connected with the subject expressed in the title, and valid.

Having examined all the objections urged, we conclude that the act under consideration is constitutional and valid except in so far as it requires the county of Multnomah to levy a tax and pay the interest and principal on the bridge bonds of the city of Portland, and to maintain a ferry at Sellwood.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

P. L. JOHNSON et al., Recpts.,
v.
City of SAN DIEGO, Appl.

(.....Cal.....)

1. Liability for a pro rata share of the debts of the city continued on the territory excluded from San Diego, under Stat. 1889, p. 856, providing that it shall not "relieve in any manner whatsoever any part of such territory from any liability for any debt contracted by such municipal corporation prior to such exclusion."

2. The power of the legislature to change and readjust the burden of municipal indebtedness after the division of a city, and after having declared in the act of separation in what manner it should be borne by the divisions, still remains; and such future adjustments may be made as the equities may suggest.

(October 9, 1895.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for San Diego County in favor of plaintiffs, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial in an action brought to determine the amount of the bonded indebtedness of the defendant city, which was chargeable upon complainant's property which had been segregated from such city. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William H. Fuller and Clarence L. Barber for appellants.

Messrs. S. M. Shortridge and Gibson & Titus for respondents.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeals from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial. Under an act of the legislature approved March 19, 1889 (Stat. 1889, p. 856), a portion of the territory formerly embraced within the corporate limits of the city of San Diego was excluded therefrom. The act referred to was in its nature permissive. It provided for the calling of an election upon petition, at which election the qualified electors within the territory proposed to be segregated should vote separately from the other voters of the municipal corporation, and the votes cast in such territory should be canvassed separately from the votes cast by the other electors of the municipality. If a majority of the votes cast in the territory proposed to be excluded and a majority of the votes cast in the municipality proper should both be for the segregation, then, after certain formalities had been complied with, the territory should cease to be a part of the municipal corporation, "provided [so runs the law] that nothing contained in this act shall be held to relieve in any manner whatsoever any part of such territory from any liability for any debt contracted by such municipal corporation prior to such exclusion: and provided further that such municipal corporation is hereby authorized to levy and collect from any territory so excluded from time to time, such sums of money as shall be found due from it on account of its just proportion of liability for any payment on the principal or interest of such debts; such assessment and collection shall be made in the same manner and at the same time that such assessment and collection are levied and made upon the property of such municipal corporation for any payment on account of such debts: and provided further that any such territory so excluded from any municipal corporation may at any time tender to the legislative body of such municipal corporation the amount for which such territory is liable on account of such debts, and after such tender is made such authority as is herein given municipal corporations to levy and assess taxes on such excluded territory shall cease." Under this law, the territory known as the "Coronado Beach," which contains the land of these plaintiffs, was excluded from the corporate control of the city of San Diego. At the time of this exclusion, the city of San Diego had a bonded indebtedness of $484,000; and, after this exclusion, the city continued to assess and levy taxes upon the detached territory to meet the requirements of this bonded indebtedness, which taxes these plaintiffs duly paid. In 1893 the legislature passed an act entitled "An Act Providing for the Adjustment, Settlement, and Payment of Any Indebtedness Existing against Any City or Municipal Corporation at the Time of Exclusion of Territory therefrom and the Division of Property thereof" (Stat. 1893, p. 536). Plaintiffs availed themselves of the provision of this act to have the court determine what proportion, if any, of the bonded indebtedness of San Diego was properly chargeable against the excluded territory. The demurrer of the defendant city to their petition was overruled; and the court, after hearing evidence, found the existence of the bonded indebtedness; that all of the moneys received by the city and evidenced by this indebtedness had been expended for a sewer system, for the purchase of school sites and the erection of schoolhouses, for refunding a pre-existing debt of the city, and for clearing its titles to certain real estate, and for buying certain rights of way; and that no portion of the money had been expended upon or within the excluded territory. The value of the property belonging to the city at the time of the segregation was found to be $600,000, all of which remained within its boundaries and under its control after the segregation. It was further found that the city of San Diego had never made any improvements in the excluded territory, and had never owned any property in it. The ratio of the value of the excluded territory to that of the city immediately preceding the exclusion was as 1 to 14. Under these findings, and in strict accord with the dictates of the statute, the court adjudged that there was nothing due or to become due from the excluded territory to the city.

The chief contention of the defendant, raised upon demurrer, pressed in its motion for a nonsuit, and urged against the judgment, may be thus stated: The property owners of the city and the property owners of the excluded territory, when, in accordance with the permissive act of the legislature (Stat. 1889, p. 356), they elected to segregate Coronado Beach, did so under a contract expressed in the act itself, by which the property owners of the excluded territory were allowed to remove their land from the jurisdiction of the city, with the understanding that they should continue to pay their pro rata share of the municipal debts existing at the time of the exclusion; that the rights of the city vested under this contract cannot be destroyed or impaired by subsequent legislation; and that, therefore, to the parties to this controversy the statute of 1893 has no applicability.

This contention is first met by the respondents with the declaration that the act of 1889 did not impose or mean to impose a pro rata liability upon the excluded territory, but only a liability for a just proportion of the debt, which proportion was a subject of future ascertainment or determination; and much nice argument is advanced in its support. But the language of the proviso, that "nothing contained in the act shall be held to relieve in any manner whatsoever any part of such territory from any liability for any debt contracted by such municipal corporation prior to such exclusion," would seem to be a comprehensive pronouncement that the segregated territory should, after exclusion, be held by the same liabilities as bound it before; and, as before its exclusion it was liable for its pro rata share of these debts, it must be that after exclusion it remained subject to the same liabilities. We think, therefore, that, by the only just and reasonable interpretation of which the act in question is susceptible, the legislature, in permitting the division, exercised its undoubted power to adjust the burden of the existing corporate debt, and decreed that the excluded territory should continue to bear its former proportion of that burden.

The question that is left for consideration is that of the power of the legislature to change and readjust the burden of such an indebtedness after having, in the act of separation, declared in what manner it should be borne. Municipal corporations, in their public and political aspect, are not only creatures of the state, but are parts of the machinery by which the state conducts its governmental affairs. Except, therefore, as restrained by the Constitution, the legislature may increase or diminish the powers of such a corporation,—may enlarge or restrict its territorial jurisdiction, or may destroy its corporate existence entirely. Says Cooley: "Restraints on the legislative power of control must be found in the Constitution of the state, or they must rest alone in the legislative discretion. If the legislative action in these cases operates injuriously to the municipalities or to individuals, the remedy is not with the courts. The courts have no power to interfere, and the people must be looked to, to right, through the ballot box, all these wrongs." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 229. "A city," says Mr. Justice

Field, in Jefferson City Gaslight Co. v. Clark, 95 U. S. 644, 24 L. ed. 521, "is only a political subdivision of the state, made for the convenient administration of the government. It is an instrumentality, with powers more or less enlarged, according to the requirements of the public, and which may be increased or repealed at the will of the legislature." This right of legislative control, arising from the very nature of the creation of such corporations, is established under the well-settled doctrine that such corporations have no vested rights in powers conferred upon them for civil, political, or administrative purposes; or, as Dillon states it: "Legislative acts respecting the political and governmental powers of municipal corporations not being in the nature of contracts, the provisions thereof may be changed at pleasure where the constitutional rights of creditors and others are not invaded." Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 53.

The act of the legislature in relieving Coronado Beach from the corporate control of San Diego, and in adjusting the burden of the city's debt, was undoubtedly the exercise of a proper power directed to the political and governmental affairs of the municipality. That the legislature, by the terms of the act segregating the territory, had the right to dispose of the common property, and provide the mode and manner of the payment of the common debt, imposing its burden in such proportions as it saw fit, is a proposition undisputed and indisputable. It is equally well-settled law that, when the act of segregation is silent as to the common property, and common debts, the old corporation retains all the property within its new boundaries, and is charged with the payment of all of the debts. Upon these two propositions the cases are both numerous and harmonious. People v. Alameda County, 26 Cal. 641; Hughes v. Ewing, 98 Cal. 414; Los Angeles County v. Orange County, 97 Cal. 329; Dopers v. Bellevue, 81 Wis. 120, 11 Am. Rep. 602; Laramie County Comrs. v. Albany County Comrs. 93 U. S. 807, 23 L. ed. 552; Lycoming County v. Union County, 15 Pa. 166, 53 Am. Dec. 575; Mount Pleasant v. Beckwith, 100 U. S. 514, 25 L. ed. 699; Layton v. New Orleans, 19 La. Ann. 515; Beloit v. Morgan, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 619, 19 L. ed. 205. There is authority, however, holding that, when the legislature has spoken in the original act, rights vest under it which may not be impaired; and it is upon these cases that appellants rely. Thus, in Bowdoinham v. Richmond, 6 Me. 112, 19 Am. Dec. 197, the supreme court of Maine decided in 1839 that as the act of the legislature dividing the town of Bowdoinham, and incorporating a part of it into a new town, by the name of Richmond, enacted that the latter should be held to pay its proportion towards the support of all paupers then on expense in Bowdoinham, a later act exonerating the new town from this liability was void. The court held that by the former act a vested right of action arose in favor of the old town against the new, and that the later act, in destroying this right, impaired the obligation of the contract on the part of Richmond created by 30 L. R. A.

the first act. Just how the court reached the conclusion that a contract was created by the first act is not plain, but it seems to have been based somewhat upon the conviction that the assent of the old town was necessary to the segregation. The opinion, however, looks for authority to the case of Hampshire County v. Franklin County (decided in 1819), 16 Mass. 75. In that case the legislature had created the county of Franklin out of territory formerly a part of the county of Hampshire. The act was silent as to the disposition of the public property and the public debt. By an act passed two years later, the legislature provided in effect that if, at the time of the segregation, there were funds belonging to the county of Hampshire in excess of its debts, the new county should be entitled to such proportion of those funds as the assessed value of the property of the new county bore to the assessed value of the property of the old. The supreme court decided, in accordance with the undoubted rule, that as the first act was silent upon the subject, all of the common property within its limits belonged to the old county, which was likewise charged with all existing debts. It further held that rights vested under this act, and that the later act providing for an apportionment, violated these rights in attempting to give the property of Hampshire to Franklin county; in other words, that the later act created a debt from Hampshire to Franklin county which before had not existed. It is to be noticed that in this case the original act was silent as to common property and debts, but as, in such case, the law steps in and makes disposition of them, the silence was deemed equivalent to an affirmative declaration of the legislature making disposition which could not afterwards be modified.

But, distinguished as are the courts which have announced this doctrine, their views have not been followed, and the decisions themselves have been elsewhere criticised and rejected, until it may be safely said that it is the general rule that, where the original act does not make disposition of the common property and debts, the legislature may at any subsequent time, by later act, apportion them in such manner as seems to be just and equitable. Under the decisions adopting this rule, the theory of vested rights and contractual relations is rejected as being a false quantity in the dealings of the sovereign state with its governmental agents and mandatories; and while it is not denied that the state may make a contract with a municipal corporation, or may permit municipal corporations to enter into binding contracts with each other, which contracts it cannot impair, these contracts must be in their nature private, although the public may derive a common benefit from them, and the contracting cities are as to them measured by the same rules and entitled to the same protection as would a private corporation. The subject of such a contract, however, can never be a matter of municipal polity or of civil or political power, for the legislature itself cannot surrender its supremacy as to these things, and thus abandon its prerogatives, and strip itself of its inherent and inalienable right of control.

Of the cases so holding, either directly or impliedly, a few may profitably be mentioned: In Richland County v. Lawrence County, 12 Ill. 1, the facts were that the former county had been carved out of the territory of the latter by an act making no disposition of the county property. The state had given to the county of Lawrence a large sum of money, which it held at the time of segregation. By a later act the legislature declared that the new county should be entitled to receive from the old a certain proportion of this fund, which sum the old county refused to pay under the claim of vested right and ownership. The supreme court upheld the act, declaring that there was no contract between the state and the old county, which was merely the state's agent. The case of Hampshire County v. Franklin County, supra, is unfavorably reviewed. In Ferry County v. Conway County, 53 Ark. 480, 6 L. R. A. 665, the original act detaching territory, made no apportionment of the debt. A later act, which did so, was attacked as unconstitutional. The supreme court there said: "The earlier doctrine (still followed by some courts) was that the act detaching the territory must apportion the debt, and that it could not be subsequently taken from the old and imposed upon the new county." Hampshire County v. Franklin County, 16 Mass. 75; Bowdoinham v. Richmond, 6 Me. 112, 19 Am. Rep. 197. The better doctrine is, that the power of the legislature to impose the debt of the one county upon another, depending upon the existence of a moral obligation from the new county, or the county receiving new territory, to pay part of the old debt, the legislature may so ordain whenever it finds the moral obligation to exist." In Dunmore's App. 53 Pa. 374, four boroughs were erected in a township which was heavily in debt. By act afterwards passed, the burden of the debt was to be apportioned by commissioner between the boroughs and the township. The supreme court of Pennsylvania upheld the act. In Layton v. New Orleans, 13 La. Ann. 515, the act of the legislature consolidating several municipalities into one government, known as the "City of New Orleans," provided that the debts of each should be liquidated by taxation upon its own inhabitants. Afterwards, by another act, it was provided that the debts should be paid by taxation uniformly upon all the property of the new city. The court held that the earlier act was not a contract, and no rights vested under it; and that, as in these matters the legislature is supreme, it could change its policy and readjust these debts. In Baltimore v. State, 15 Md. 376, 74 Am. Dec. 573, the court says: "The doctrine that there is a fundamental principle of right and justice inherent in the nature and spirit of the social compact that rises above and restrains the power of legislation, cannot be applied to the legislature when exercising its sovereignty over public charters granted for the purpose of government." Says Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 189: "But upon the division of the old corporation, and the creation of a new corporation out of part of its inhabitants and territory, or upon the annexation of part to another corporation, the legislature may provide for an equitable apportionment or division of the property, and impose upon the new corporation, or upon the people and territory thus disannexed, the obligation to pay an equitable proportion of the corporate debts. The charters and constituent acts of public and municipal corporations are not, as we have before seen, contracts, and they may be changed at the pleasure of the legislature, subject only to the restraints of special constitutional provisions, if any there be. And it is an ordinary exercise of the legislative dominion over such corporations to provide for their enlargement or division, and, incidental to this, to apportion their property, and to direct the manner in which their debts or liabilities shall be met, and by whom. The opinion has been expressed that the partition of the property must be made at the time of the division of, or change in, the corporation, since, otherwise, the old corporation becomes, under the rule just before stated, the sole owner of the property, and hence cannot be deprived of it by a subsequent act of the legislature. But, in the absence of special constitutional limitations upon the legislature, this view cannot, perhaps, be maintained, as it is inconsistent with the necessary supremacy of the legislature over all its corporate and unincorporated bodies, divisions, and parts, and with several well-considered adjudications." To the same general effect are the cases of Laramie County Comrs. v. Albany County Comrs. 92 U. S. 307, 23 L. ed. 552; Mount Pleasant v. Beckwith, 100 U. S. 514, 25 L. ed. 699; Seituate v. Weymouth, 108 Mass. 128; Williamantic School Soc. v. First School Soc. 14 Conn. 457; Guilford v. Chenango County Supers. 18 N. Y. 143.

In this state the power of the legislature to make such subsequent adjustments was early declared in People v. Alameda County, 26 Cal. 641. Alameda county was created out of the territory of Contra Costa county in 1853. At the time of the separation, Contra Costa county owed for a bridge which had been constructed upon the territory set apart for Alameda county. The original act made no provision for the payment of this indebtedness, which thus remained a charge against the old county. By two separate later acts, the legislature provided for the apportionment of the debt, putting a part of the burden upon Alameda county. These acts were upheld as a proper exercise of legislative power. And, indeed, it is not easy to see how the opposite view can be maintained. Since the legislative power, within constitutional limitations, is supreme in the matter, since, in the first apportionment, the people affected are entitled to no voice (except through their representatives), and since the act of the legislature is not in the nature of a contract, it cannot logically be held that the power has been exhausted by its first exercise. The right still remains to make such future adjustments as the equities may suggest. Nor, in the operation of the act in question upon the city of San Diego, can we perceive any hardship. It had at the time of the segregation $600,000, acquired while Coronado Beach was a part of its territory, and partially acquired, doubtless, by taxation upon this land. All of this property it retains. All of the moneys evidenced by the bonded indebtedness were expended within its present territorial limits, and no dollar of it went to improve the excluded territory. Having all of the common property and all of the fruits of the common debt, it is certainly not onerous or oppressive that it should be asked to pay for what has been expended for its exclusive benefit. In a certain sense, it is true that Coronado Beach was also benefited by these expenditures. In the same sense, San Mateo county is benefited by the public improvements of the city and county of San Francisco; but it has never been asserted that for such benefits a sister county should be called upon to pay.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

1. The words "mechanics' store" may be made a tradename, and the user thereof entitled to protection from the use of such words by a competitor in business for the purpose of deceiving the public, and especially the customers of the former.
2. A mandatory injunction to compel a person to distinguish his place of business in some mode or form that shall be a sufficient indication that it is a different place of business from that of a competitor should be granted, where he has imitated the building of another dealer in the same business so closely as to deceive customers and with intent to deceive them, and has omitted the use of any name or sign which could designate the true proprietorship of the store; but it would be too strict a rule to compel him to show the proprietorship of his store.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Sacramento City in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to compel defendant to cease interfering with plaintiff's business and tradename. Reversed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—This is believed to be the first case in which a court has compelled a defendant for the purpose of distinguishing his business from that of a rival to perform acts of a positive kind as distinguished from the prohibition of acts causing infringement.

As to the power of equity to grant mandatory injunctions, see Moundsville v. Ohio River R. Co. (W. Va.) 20 L. R. A. 161.

Messrs. Holl & Dunn for appellant.

Messrs. Johnson, Johnson, & Johnson for respondent.

Garoutte, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff is a corporation carrying on a large clothing and dry-goods business in the city of Sacramento. Defendant is also a dealer in clothing of the same general character, and is carrying on business in a building adjoining plaintiff's place of business. The present action is one of injunction, and by its decree, among other things, the court ordered defendant to refrain from further use of the name "Mechanical Store" as the designation of his place of business, and further decreed that defendant maintain and place in a conspicuous part of his store, and also in a conspicuous place on the outside or front thereof, a sign showing the proprietorship of his said store, in letters sufficiently large to be plainly observable by passers-by and customers entering therein. Defendant appeals from the foregoing portions of the judgment.

The judgment is based upon certain findings of fact made by the trial court upon the evidence offered at the trial, and no complaint is now heard that this evidence does not fully support these findings. It therefore follows that the merit of this appeal presents itself upon a consideration of those findings and the decree based thereon. These findings of fact are full and in detail, and, for present purposes, we deem it sufficient to state the general tenor and effect of some of them. (1) The court finds that on or about the 8th day of October, 1874, H. Weinstock and D. Lubin entered into a copartnership under the firm name and style of Weinstock & Lubin, of the city of Sacramento, and, as such partners, engaged in the business of dealing in wearing apparel for men, women, and children, and that said Weinstock & Lubin selected as the name of their place of business "Mechanics' Store," and designated the same by that appellation, by which name their said store thenceforth was continually known; that, in the management and conduct of their business, they fixed a price upon each and every article carried by them in the stock of said store, and marked the said prices in figures upon each article, and sold such articles at the prices so marked, and never deviated therefrom; and they advertised the said method of doing business extensively throughout the entire Pacific coast by means of newspapers, etc., by means whereof their said method of doing business became widely known to the trade and public throughout the entire Pacific coast, and by reason whereof it became and was well known to the trade and public in California and the other states and territories of the Pacific coast that at the store of said Weinstock & Lubin only one price was charged for goods sold therein, and that no deviation from said price was permitted. (2) That, by care, attention, skill, and strict adherence to business and the rules as aforesaid, this plaintiff has materially increased the volume and importance and value of said business, and enhanced the good will thereof, and the said plaintiff has established for the said store and business throughout the said states and territories a wide and honorable reputation, and thereby said business has become extensive and valuable and profitable, and the public have become accustomed to plaintiff's said method of doing business, and have been induced to rely, and do rely, upon the good faith of the plaintiff in managing and conducting its business in the manner aforesaid, and by reason thereof have been induced to bestow and do bestow upon the plaintiff their custom, trade, patronage, and business. (3) That on or about 1886 the defendant, who had previously been engaged in business elsewhere, and was without any established reputation of his own, and whose business was unknown to the trade and general public, removed his business from the place he then occupied to the premises on the east of and near the premises of this plaintiff; and the defendant then and there engaged in a similar line of trade as this plaintiff, and ever since then he has maintained and conducted, and still maintains and conducts, the said store at said place, and carries on the said business therein; and he named his store in the year 1887 or thereabouts the "Mechanical Store." (4) That the defendant, well knowing the foregoing facts, and contriving, intending, and designing fraudulently to injure this plaintiff, and to obtain undue advantage of plaintiff, and to deprive the plaintiff of its business, and fraudulently and unlawfully to increase his own business, and to pirate and make use of and appropriate to himself the good will of the plaintiff's business, and the said reputation and honorable esteem and confidence that the plaintiff enjoyed in the minds of the people of the Pacific coast, and in order to create confusion in the public mind, and to take advantage of the standing that the plaintiff by its aforesaid acts had acquired in said territory, and fraudulently designing to deceive the public and people intending to trade with the plaintiff, and to divert the custom of the plaintiff to himself, and to deprive the plaintiff of its customers and of the trade, and to induce the people to trade with the defendant under the belief that they were trading with the plaintiff, and for the purpose of deceiving plaintiff's customers and persons intending to trade with plaintiff into believing that the defendant's store was that of the plaintiff, and thereby inducing them to enter said store of defendant to trade with said defendant, to his profit, and in order to carry out his fraudulent and corrupt designs as aforesaid,—the defendant has persistently carried out a system of deceit and misrepresentations concerning his store and its ownership, in connection with plaintiff's store and business, as follows: That in 1891 plaintiff, at its place of business, erected a store, the front of which is of peculiar architecture, containing arches and alcoves, of which there was none other similar in the city of Sacramento; that afterwards the defendant, at his said place of business, and adjoining plaintiff's store, erected a building which, so far as the first or lower story is concerned, was and is similar in architecture in every respect to the store of plaintiff, so much so that passers-by were liable to go into the store of defendant thinking that they were entering the store of plaintiff, and that customers of plaintiff in many instances did so enter the store of defendant thinking they were in the store of plaintiff; that defendant had no sign inside of his store or on the outside of his store by which customers could for themselves ascertain the true proprietorship thereof; that the erection of the defendant's building exactly the same as plaintiff's building in every particular, and the adoption of the use of the words "Mechanical Store," and the absence of any name or sign upon or in defendant's store designating the true proprietorship of defendant's store, were all done by the defendant for the purpose of deceiving the public, and more especially plaintiff's customers, and enticing and pirating and securing the patronage of said customers from plaintiff to defendant. (5) That, by the aforesaid means the defendant has diverted from the plaintiff a large part of plaintiff's trade and custom; has induced many persons to trade with the defendant who otherwise would have traded with the plaintiff; has sold large quantities of goods in his said store to persons who, but for said acts of defendant, would have purchased said goods of the plaintiff; has deprived the plaintiff of a large share of its legitimate profits; has injured the business and reputation of the plaintiff; has impaired the confidence of the public in the plaintiff and its method of doing business; and has deprived the plaintiff of a large number of its customers and patrons.

The foregoing chapter of facts makes interesting reading, and we first turn our attention to that portion of the judgment restraining defendant from the further use of the words "Mechanical Store" as a designation of his place of business. We see but little difficulty in arriving at a conclusion upon this branch of the case. Defendant assails the judgment in this particular with but a single weapon. He insists that the words "Mechanics' Store" are not the subject of trademark, and that therefore plaintiff can have no exclusive right to them. As we view the picture presented by the findings of fact, the question as to what may or may not be the subject of trademark is not the problem to be solved. That these words are of a kind that may be used as a tradename we have no doubt, and, having established that fact, we are required to pursue the investigation no further. That certain names and designations which may not become technical or specific trademarks may become the names of articles or of places of business, and thereby the use thereof receive the protection of the law, cannot be doubted, for the cases everywhere recognize that fact. The learned judge said in Lee v. Haley, L. R. 5 Ch. 156: "I quite agree that they [the plaintiffs] have no property in the name, but the principle upon which the cases on this subject proceed is, not that there is property in the word, but that it is a fraud on a person who has established a trade, and carries it on under a given name, that some other person should assume the same name, or the same name with a slight alteration, in such a way as to induce persons to deal with him in the belief that they are dealing with the person who has given a reputation to the name." A similar doctrine is declared in Glen & H. Mfg. Co. v. Hall, 61 N. Y. 226, 19 Am. Rep. 278, and also in the late case of Coats v. Merrick Thread Co. 149 U. S. 562, 87 L. ed. 847. This court said in Pierce v. Guittard, 68 Cal. 71, 58 Am. Rep. 1: "We are of opinion that it is not necessary to decide whether the plaintiff's label with the accompanying words and devices constituted a trademark, and as such the exclusive property of the plaintiff, for the reason that it is a fraud on a person who has established a business for his goods, and carries it on under a given name or with a particular mark, for some other person to assume the same name or mark, or the same with a slight alteration in such a way as to induce persons to deal with him in the belief that they are dealing with the person who has given a reputation to the name or mark." The same general principle is also recognized and approved in Schmidt v. Brigg, 100 Cal. 672, 23 L. R. A. 790. While in these two cases the fact appears that the defendants were selling an inferior article, and thereby deceiving and defrauding the public, it is not apparent that such fact was a necessary element in pointing the judgment. Neither do we consider it so upon principle; and in cases without number, restraining defendants from trespassing upon the good will of plaintiff's business, such fact was an element foreign to the litigation. It may be said that the adjudged cases for relief are based solely upon the ground of loss and damage to the tradesman's business, by unlawful competition. In Levy v. Walker, Cox, Man. Trade-mark Cas. No. 689, the learned judge declared: "The court interferes solely for the purpose of protecting the owner of a trade or business from a fraudulent invasion of that business by somebody else. It does not interfere to prevent the world outside from being misled into anything."

While our statutes attempt to deal with trademarks, and provide for the filing thereof with the secretary of state, with accompanying affidavits, etc., yet tradenames are equally protected upon analogous principles of law. And that the words "Mechanics' Store" may be made a tradename, and the user thereof become entitled under the law to protection from pirates preying upon the sea of commercial trade, we have no doubt. We think the defendant should be restrained from the use of the words "Mechanical Store." The court has declared the fact to be, and it is not challenged by defendant that these words were used as a designation of his store for the purpose of deceiving the public, and especially plaintiff's customers, and thereby securing the advantages and benefits of the good will of plaintiff's business. To say that such conduct upon the part of defendant is unfair business competition is to state the fact in the mildest terms. In Celluloid Mfg. Co. v. Celluloid Mfg. Co. 83 Fed. Rep. 97, Justice Bradley, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in speaking to the question of similarity in name, said: "It is not identical with the complainant's name. That would be too gross an invasion of the complainant's right. Similarity, not identity, is the usual recourse when one party seeks to benefit himself by the good name of another. What similarity is sufficient to effect the object has to be determined in each case by its circumstances. We may say, generally, that a similarity which would be likely to deceive or mislead an ordinary unsuspecting customer is obnoxious to the law." In this case the trial court determined that there was a sufficient similarity in the names to deceive the public; that the defendant adopted the name for the purpose of deceiving the public and securing plaintiff's business; and that such results had followed. These things being true, the decree must go against him.

The remaining branch of the case presents a novel and original proposition of law. In its facts we apprehend no case like it can be found, either in this country or England. The decree orders the defendant to place, both upon the outside and inside of his store, a sign, plainly legible to customers and passers-by, indicating his proprietorship; and, while the power of the court to issue mandatory injunctions in many cases must be conceded, yet cases where such power has been exercised have generally involved matters of nuisance, or at least cases where courts have ordered the subject-matter of the litigation to be placed in its original condition; as, for instance, the removing of obstructions to ancient lights. But let us for a moment turn our attention to the facts of this case. The store of plaintiff was known as the "Mechanics' Store." By various kinds of advertising, and attention, honesty, and skill in the conduct of the business, it increased the volume thereof and enhanced its good will, and throughout the Pacific coast established for it a wide and honorable reputation as a fair and reliable house with which to deal. Plaintiff erected a store building of peculiar architecture, there being none like it in the city of Sacramento; and defendant thereupon erected a store building, immediately adjoining that of plaintiff, in every respect of similar architecture. It further appears that defendant erected this particular kind of building for the purpose of deceiving the public, and securing the patronage of plaintiff's customers; and for the same purpose he refrained from placing any sign in or upon the building indicating the proprietorship of the business, or designating it in any way so that it might be distinguished from the store of plaintiff. And, by reason of these acts of defendant, many of plaintiff's customers were deceived into purchasing goods in defendant's store, believing that they were trading in plaintiff's store; and defendant thus diverted from the plaintiff a large part of its trade and custom, and thereby injured its business and curtailed the value of its good will. Upon this bald statement of facts, it cannot be gainsaid that defendant has done the plaintiff wrong; and it is said that for every wrong there is a remedy. These facts certainly indicate a case of unlawful business competition, and courts of equity have ever been ready to declare such things odious. It is strange if plaintiff may be deprived of the fruits of a long course of honest and fair dealing in business by such wicked contrivances, and, upon appeal to the courts for relief, should be told there is no relief. This cannot be so, for the whole law of trademarks, tradenames, etc., is recognized, approved, and enforced for the very purpose of protecting the honest tradesman from a like loss and damage to that which threatens this plaintiff; and the fact that the question comes to us in an entirely new guise, and that the schemer has concocted a kind of deception heretofore unheard of in legal jurisprudence, is no reason why equity is either unable or unwilling to deal with him. It has been said by some judge or law writer that "no fixed rules can be established upon which to deal with fraud, for, were courts of equity to once declare rules prescribing the limitations of their power in dealing with it, the jurisdiction would be perpetually cramped and eluded by new schemes which the fertility of man's invention would contrive." By device, defendant is defrauding plaintiff of his business. He is stealing its good will,—a most valuable property,—only secured after years of honest dealing and large expenditures of money; and equity would be impotent, indeed, if it could contrive no remedy for such a wrong.

The fundamental principle underlying this entire branch of the law is that no man has the right to sell his goods as the goods of a rival trader. Mr. Browne, in his work upon Trademarks, declares the wrong to be, "not in imitating a symbol, device, or fancy name, for any such act may not involve the slightest turpitude; the wrong consists in unfair means to obtain from a person the fruits of his own ingenuity or industry,—an injustice that is in direct transgression of the decalogue, 'Thou shalt not covet . . . anything that is thy neighbor's.' The most detestable kind of fraud underlies the filching of another's good name, in connection with trafficking." We think the principle may be broadly stated that when one tradesman resorts to the use of any artifice or contrivance for the purpose of representing his goods or his business as the goods or business of a rival tradesman, thereby deceiving the people by causing them to trade with him when they intended to and would have otherwise traded with his rival, a fraud is committed,—a fraud which a court of equity will not allow to thrive. In Howard v. Henriquez, 8 Sandf. 725, the court, in speaking of the competitor in business, said: "He must not by any deceitful or other practice, impose upon the public, and he must not by dressing himself in another man's garments, and by assuming another man's name endeavor to deprive that man of his own individuality and thus despoil him of the gains to which by his industry and skill he is fairly entitled." It may well be said that the defendant by duplicating plaintiff's building, with its peculiar architecture and immediately adjoining, entering into the same line of business, with no mark of identification upon his store, has dressed himself in plaintiff's garments; and, having so dressed himself with a fraudulent intent, equity will exert itself to reach the fraud in some way. In the leading case of Lee v. Haley, supra, the whole question is condensed by the final conclusion of the court into the principle of law "that it is a fraud on the part of a defendant to set up a business under such a designation as is calculated to lead and does lead other people to suppose that his business is the business of another person." If the same evil results are accomplished by the acts practiced by this defendant which would be accomplished by an adoption of plaintiff's name, why should equity smile upon the one practice and frown upon the other? Upon what principle of law can a court of equity say, "If you cheat and defraud your competitor in business by taking his name, the court will give relief against you, but, if you cheat and defraud him by assuming a disguise of a different character, your acts are beyond the law?" Equity will not concern itself about the means by which fraud is done. It is the results arising from the means—it is the fraud itself—with which it deals.

The foregoing principles of law do not apply alone to the protection of parties having trademarks and tradenames. They reach away beyond that, and apply to all cases where fraud is practiced by one in securing the trade of a rival dealer; and these ways are as many and as various as the ingenuity of the dishonest schemer can invent. In Glenny v. Smith, 11 Jur. N. S. 965, the court held: "Where a tradesman, in addition to his own name upon his shop front, placed upon his sunblind and upon his brass plate the words 'From Thresher & Glenny' (in whose employment he had been), the court, being of opinion that this was done in such a way as to be likely to mislead, and there being evidence that persons had been actually misled, granted an injunction to restrain such a use of the name of the firm 'Thresher & Glenny.'" In Knott v. Morgan, 2 Keen, 218, the "London Conveyance Company" had its omnibuses painted green, and its servants clothed in the same colors. Another adopted the same name, and likewise its vehicles were so painted and its servants so clothed. It was conceded that plaintiff could have no exclusive property right in any of these things, but the court issued its injunction, declaring that plaintiff had "a right to call upon this court to restrain the defendant from fraudulently using precisely the same words and devices which they have taken for the purpose of distinguishing their property, and thereby depriving them of the fair profits of their business by attracting custom on the false representation that carriages, really the defendant's, belong to, and are under the management of, the plaintiffs." The author, by a note, approves the doctrine here declared, saying: "There was an obvious attempt to trade upon the plaintiff's reputation,—a constructive fraud,—coupled with pecuniary loss, which was made the ground for the issuance of a broad injunction." The same principle is reiterated by the same learned judge in Croft v. Day, 7 Beav. 84, in the following words: "It has been very correctly said: that the principle in these cases is this: that no man has a right to sell his own goods as the goods of another. You may express the same principle in a different form, and say that no man has a right to dress himself in colors, or adopt and bear symbols, to which he has no peculiar or exclusive right, and thereby personate another person, for the purpose of inducing the public to suppose, either that he is that other person, or that he is connected with and selling the manufacture of such other person, while he is really selling his own. It is perfectly manifest that to do these things is to commit a fraud, and a very gross fraud." In the very recent case of Coats v. Merrick Thread Co. 149 U. S. 586, 37 L. ed. 850, the court said: "There can be no question of the soundness of the plaintiff's proposition that, irrespective of the technical question of trademark, the defendants have no right to dress their goods up in such manner as to deceive an intending purchaser, and induce him to believe he is buying those of the plaintiffs."

They have no right, by imitative devices, to beguile the public into buying their wares under the impression they are buying those of their rivals." To the same point, see Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woolen System Co. v. Le Boutillier, 5 Misc. 78; Apollinaris Co. v. Scherer, 27 Fed. Rep. 18; Burgess v. Burgess, 8 De G. M. & G. 896; Von Mumm v. Frash, 56 Fed. Rep. 830.

Having decided that defendant's acts constitute a fraud upon plaintiff, and that a court of equity will administer relief, the question then presents itself, What shall be the form of the decree? How may the court reach the wrong? The defendant had the right to erect his building, and erect it in any style of architecture his fancy might dictate. He had the right to erect it in the particular locality where it was erected. He had the right there to conduct a business similar to that of plaintiff. He had a right to do all these things, for, of themselves, they did not offend against equity, but when they were done with a fraudulent intent, when they were done for the purpose of tolling away the customers of plaintiff by a deception, a fraud is practiced, and equity will do what it can to right the wrong. The decision of the trial court in effect ordered defendant to place signs both inside and outside his building, showing to the world the proprietorship thereof. We think this decree holds defendant to a rule too strict, in that it requires the proprietorship of the store to be shown. In this particular we think the decree should be modified so as to require that the defendant, in the conduct of this business, shall distinguish his place of business from that in which the plaintiff is carrying on its business, in some mode or form that shall be a sufficient indication to the public that it is a different place of business from that of the plaintiff. For the foregoing reason, the judgment in this respect only is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to modify the same, as heretofore suggested; and thereupon it is ordered that said judgment stand affirmed. Appellant is to pay the costs of this appeal.

UTAH SUPREME COURT.

M. C. SULLIVAN et al., Appts.,
v.
NORTHERN SPY MINING COMPANY,
Resp.

(.....Utah.....)

The discoverer of a flow of percolating waters on the public lands may, by digging wells and improving them and constantly using the water for a beneficial purpose, acquire a right to take water from such wells as against one who by subsequent location acquires title to the land.

(June 17, 1905.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff's from a judgment of the District Court for Juab County in favor

NOTE.—Appropriation of percolating waters on public lands.

SULLIVAN v. NORTHERN SPY MINING COMPANY seems to be the first case in which the question of the right to appropriate, by means of wells, percolating waters found in public lands as against the subsequent patentee, has been considered. There are a few cases which have discussed questions analogous to the subject, which may throw some light on it.

The right to such appropriation is not an extension or application of a common-law right. Booth v. Driscoll, 20 Conn. 541.

For in Ballard v. Tomlinson, L. R. 24 Ch. Div. 121, 24 Am. L. Reg. (N. S.) 636, 54 L. J. Ch. 454, 53 L. T. N. S. 942, 38 Week. Rep. 593, 49 J. P. 603, it is said that every one has unlimited right to appropriate percolating water while it is under his own land, and may take it all so as to prevent it going onto the land of others.

The common-law rights in percolating water generally will be found stated in a note to Southern P. R. Co. v. Dufour (Cal.) 19 L. R. A. 92.

If the water has risen to the surface, so as to form a stream, of course it may be appropriated in states recognizing the doctrine of prior appropriation, so that it cannot be interfered with on the surface. DeNeocoea v. Curtis, 80 Cal. 397.

As to what states recognize the doctrine of prior appropriation, see note to Isaacs v. Barbour (Wash.) post. — of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for alleged interference by defendant with water rights belonging to plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. O. W. Powers and D. N. Straup, for appellants:

Barney only had a license to use the water in consideration of his making some repairs on the well. A licensee has the right to do any act which is necessary to the full enjoyment of the license, but the terms of the license must be strictly followed and cannot be extended or varied.

Laford v. Putnam, 85 N. H. 568; Dempsey v. Kipp, 62 Barb. 811.

The license or privilege to use the water was given to Mr. Barney personally, and it has been repeatedly held that a license is strictly confined to the original parties.

Jackson, Hull, v. Babcock, 4 Johns. 418; DeHaro v. United States, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 599, 18 L. ed. 681; Paine v. Northern P. R. Co. 14 Fed. Rep. 407; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 545.

A well is not "a natural source of supply" within the meaning of the law of February 20, 1880 (2 Utah Comp. Laws 1888, p. 184), pertaining to primary water rights.

2 Bouvier, Law Dict. p. 808; Anderson, Law Dict. p. 1111; Johnson v. Rayner, 6 Gray, 110; Mizer v. Reed, 25 Vt. 257.

Unless the territorial statute, by the use of the words "or other natural source of supply," intended to and actually did apply to wells, the common law in regard to the use of water from wells is still in force in this territory, and the water from wells on private property is not subject to appropriation like the water from "natural streams, watercourses, lakes, or springs."

Dec. 511; Rights in Subterranean Waters, 2 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 65; Bassett v. Salisbury Mfg. Co. 28 N. H. 488, 8 Am. L. Reg. 289.

Water filtering or percolating in the soil belongs to the owner of the freehold, like the rocks and minerals found there. It exists there free from the usufructuary rights of others.

Hanson v. McOue, 42 Cal. 808, 10 Am. Rep. 299; Harwood v. Benton, 82 Vt. 787; Cross v. Kitts, 69 Cal. 232, 58 Am. Rep. 558.

Where there is nothing to show that the waters of a spring or well are supplied by any defined flowing stream, the presumption will be that they have their source in the ordinary percolations of water through the soil. Percolating waters, and those whose sources are unknown, belong to the realty in which they are found.

Kinney, Irrigation, § 49; Wheatley v. Baugh, 64 Am. Dec. 727, note; Nosier v. Caldwell, 7 Nev. 368; Delhi v. Youmans, 50 Barb. 816, 45 N. Y. 863, 6 Am. Rep. 100; Taylor v. Welch, 6 Or. 199.

Where a spring is fed solely by percolating waters which seep into it from swamp or wet land surrounding the same, and not by any running stream of water, there is no water at such spring to which the right of use can be acquired, either by statutory appropriation or by adverse user.

No notice of intention to appropriate the water of the well in question was ever given. In order to appropriate the water there must be an actual bona fide intention to apply the same to some beneficial use or purpose, and one of the first steps necessary for the appropriator to take is to give notice of that intent.

Osgood v. Eldorado Water & Deep Gravel Min. Co. 56 Cal. 571; Kimball v. Gearhart, 13 Cal. 27; Kinney, Irrigation, § 187.

Messrs. Marshall & Royle for respondent.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The main question in this case, and the only one, in fact, which we deem it necessary to consider, is, Can the discoverer of a flow of percolating waters on the public lands, by digging wells and improving the same and constantly using the water for a beneficial purpose, acquire a right to take water from such

And in Cross v. Kitts, 69 Cal. 217, 58 Am. Rep. 558, the right to acquire title to percolating waters by appropriation is recognized, —so far, at least, as to entitle a grantee of the water right to hold the same against a subsequent grantee of the mining claim on which the water was brought to the surface.

So, the water of a spring which goes to feed a creek, although part of the way by underground or unknown channels, cannot be diverted to the injury of a prior appropriator of the water of the creek. Strait v. Brown, 16 Nev. 317, 40 Am. Rep. 497.

But it was subsequently held that no right can be acquired by appropriation in a spring on state land which is formed by percolating water, so that a subsequent owner of the land could cut off the supply by excavating on his own land. Southern P. R. Co. v. Dufour, 95 Cal. 615, 19 L. R. A. 92.

And also, in a Nevada case, it was held that the mere fact that water from a spring has been appropriated by the one in possession of the land will not prevent the digging of a well on adjoining land, 20 L. R. A.

although the effect is to cut off the water from the spring so that it ceases to flow. Mosier v. Caldwell, 7 Nev. 368.

In one Colorado case it was said that it is a matter of no moment whether water reaches a certain point by percolation through the soil, by a subterranean stream or an obvious surface channel. If by any of these natural methods it reaches the point and is there appropriated in accordance with law, the appropriator has a property in it which cannot be devested by a wrongful diversion by another, nor can there be any substantial diminution. McClellan v. Hurdle, 3 Colo. App. 430. But in that case the water was part of the sunken stream, and was not merely percolating water or that of a spring proper.

If water flows underground in a well-defined and constant stream, an appropriation of it at the point where it rises to the surface will give a right of it which will be protected against subsequent appropriators. Kenney v. Carillo, 2 N. M. 480.

H. P. F.

wells as against an owner of the land on which the well is located, where the owner of the land acquired title by a location made subsequent to the digging of the wells? Many other questions are raised on this appeal, but their materiality all depends on the answer to the question just stated. If this question is answered in the affirmative, the judgment must be affirmed; if answered in the negative, it must be reversed; so we do not deem it necessary to examine the other questions presented.

We are not aware of any case having been decided in these arid regions, in which this precise question has been passed upon. The doctrine may be said to be settled that the owner of lands has a right to dig thereon, and to appropriate and use percolating waters therein, although by so doing he may dry up the wells or spring of an adjacent proprietor. See Hanson v. McOus, 42 Cal. 808, 10 Am. Rep. 299; Kinney, Irrigation, §§ 49, 398; Southern P. R. Co. v. Dufour, 95 Cal. 615, 19 L. R. A. 92. But this rule does not determine the case at bar. The facts here, so far as necessary to be stated, are: The plaintiffs are the owners of a mining claim in Tintic mining district, located in 1889. When this claim was located there was a well dug in the ground, and one Barney had a house at or near this well, and was engaged in hauling water from the well to the defendant. The defendant continued to procure water from the well, and plaintiffs bring this suit to recover damages, alleging trespass. The undisputed facts are that the predecessors in interest of Barney and the defendant, in about 1870, discovered evidences of percolating waters at the point where the well was dug, and by digging a hole about 8 feet deep procured a supply of water. These discoverers were miners, and were working a mine, part of which, at least, the defendant now owns. It seems that this hole or well, if it may be called such, was so shallow that cattle and horses on the range came to it and trod down its banks, so that the discoverers arranged with one Barney that if he would repair the well, wall it up, and protect it, he might use water therefrom. Barney did this, and put in a pump. For about twenty years it remained in this condition. The well, being in the midst of a desert, was used as a source of water supply for several mines in the neighborhood, and was all the time on public lands of the United States. In 1889 the plaintiffs located the ground, including the well and Barney's house, as a mining claim. In 1890 Barney conveyed whatever right he had in the premises to the defendant, and it continued to procure water from the well. The well is shown to be from 10 to 15 feet deep, and to furnish a very abundant supply of water. The question is, Has the defendant an easement in plaintiff's land to continue to take water from the well constructed by its predecessors? The Federal government, as proprietor of the public lands, early recognized the necessity of permitting persons in this arid region to acquire an interest in water sources on the public lands distinct from the lands themselves. It had always been the settled law that the owner of land was likewise the owner of all waters situate thereon or percolating therein. This may be said to have been the universal rule in the United States, prior to the settlement of California. Local decisions, arising from the necessities of the people, soon altered it there, and in 1866 Congress passed an act (14 Stat. at L. 253; Rev. Stat. § 2339), which provided, among other things, as follows: "Whenever by priority of possession, rights to the use of water for mining, agricultural, manufacturing, or other purposes have vested and accrued, and the same are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and decisions of courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and protected in the same." By the act of July 9, 1870 (16 Stat. at L. 218; Rev. Stat. § 2340), it was further provided: "All patents granted, or pre-emption, or homesteads allowed, shall be subject to any vested and accrued water right, or rights to ditches and reservoirs used in connection with such water rights as may have been acquired under or recognized by the preceding section." The question is, then, Is the right of defendant to use water, under the facts stated, one that is recognized by the local customs and laws? Section 2780, Utah Comp. Laws, provides: "A right to the use of water for any useful purpose, such as domestic purposes, irrigating lands, propelling machinery, washing or sluicing ores and other like purposes, is hereby recognized and acknowledged to have vested and accrued as a primary right to the extent of and reasonable necessity for such use thereof under any of the following circumstances: First, whenever any person or persons shall have taken, diverted, and used any of the unappropriated water of any natural stream, water-course, lake, or spring, or other natural source of supply." We think it would be a very strained construction to hold that a hole dug 8 feet deep, into which the waters naturally gathered, was not a natural source of supply, while it is conceded if the water come to the surface and flowed along a few feet, and was then collected in a like hole, it would be a natural source of supply. We are inclined to give these statutes a much broader construction. In our opinion, wherever the industry of the pioneer has appropriated a source of water, either on the surface of or under the public lands, he and his successors acquire an easement and right to take and use such water to the extent indicated by the original appropriation, and that a private owner who subsequently acquires the land takes it burdened with this easement, and we also hold that this easement carries with it such rights of ingress and egress as are necessary to its proper enjoyment. This right of an appropriator is, of course, subject to the rule of law which will permit the owner to sink an adjoining well on his own premises, although he should thereby dry up that of the first appropriator.

The determination of this question disposes of the whole case, and it is therefore ordered that the judgment be, and it is, affirmed.

1. The negotiability of a note with accompanying interest coupons is not destroyed by clauses declaring that the contract shall be construed by the laws of the state in which it is executed, that it shall draw a specified higher rate of interest after maturity, and that, if any coupon is not paid when due, the whole debt shall mature at that time without demand, and the first unpaid coupon shall become a part of the principal and bear interest at the higher rate specified.
2. An assignment without recourse by the payee of a negotiable note payable to order will not prevent an indorsement by the assignee from making him liable as indorser of negotiable commercial paper.
3. An agreement to pay interest at 12 per cent after maturity, in a note made in Kansas expressly made subject to the laws of that state, is not usurious.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania to review judgments in favor of defendants in actions brought to enforce the alleged liability of indorsers upon certain promissory notes. Reversed.

Before Dallas, Circuit Judge, and Butler and Wales, District Judges.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. W. Shreve and Shiras & Dicksey, for plaintiff in error:

All notes which are non-negotiable in form merely, and not in substance, may be so indorsed by a party thereto as to bind him as a commercial indorser to his immediate indorsee, and if he use fit words in his indorsement, to the holder, each new indorsement of an instrument upon which an indorser may be bound as a commercial indorser is a new contract in the nature of a bill of exchange. But for an indorsement to have that effect the instrument upon which the indorsement is placed is such in terms and substance that the bill of exchange thereby created will have all the requisites of a negotiable instrument.

Patterson v. Poindexter, 6 Watts & S. 224, 40 Am. Dec. 554.

The cases bearing apparently against the claim that the defendant is bound on the said indorsement are cases in which the instrument indorsed was non-negotiable in substance, lacked some essential element of negotiability besides the mere formal words of negotiability.

Gray v. Donahoe, 4 Watts, 400; Wright v. Hart, 44 Pa. 454; Ottisens' Nat Bank v. Piolet, 126 Pa. 194, 4 L. R. A. 190; First Nat. Bank v. Gay, 71 Mo. 627; Kline v. Keiser, 87 Pa. 485.

An indorsement of a non-negotiable instrument by the payee will not render it negotiable, nor give the indorsee an action against prior parties; although it will render such indorser liable to his indorsee, and will, if he use fit words in the indorsement, render him liable to all subsequent indorsees.

NOTE—The present case, reversing the decision of the circuit court, decides what is believed to be an entirely new question in the law of negotiable paper, in respect to the effect of an indorsement by one to whom the paper has been transferred by mere assignment without recourse.

tiability of a promissory note is not affected by provisions therein that the title to the personal property for which it was given should remain, as security, in the vendor, the payee of the note, until all notes of a series to which it belonged were paid, and that the note should become due and payable to the holder on the failure of the maker to pay the principal or interest of any of the notes of the series.

A bill or note payable to the order of the payee may be assigned without indorsement, but if thus assigned instead of being transferred by a proper indorsement, the assignee will take the paper subject to all equities in the same manner as though the instrument were not negotiable, or as though it were overdue. The holder of a note not indorsed is a mere assignee, and his rights are to be settled by the same rules that govern the case of an assignee of any other chose in action.

If the $3,000 note is a negotiable instrument, and if the interest coupons shall not be paid when due, the whole of the principal matures and becomes due at that time without demand, and the principal debt and unpaid coupons represent and stand for the amount due. In that case the $3,000 note becomes a note for $3,150 and we would be charged with interest on interest, which the courts have universally held is not allowable, either as an incident or as compensation for the detention of the money.

Stokely v. Thompson, 84 Pa. 210.

Under the provisions of the note when default was made in the payment of an installment of interest the whole of the principal matured, and the contract then ceased. In such cases the legal rate of interest only should be allowed thereafter as damages.

Butler, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The suits were brought on indorsements of a promissory note and its accompanying interest coupons, and by agreement of parties were tried together. After a jury had been sworn, a paper was filed consenting to a verdict for the plaintiff in $3,887.60, subject to the opinion of the court on the following questions reserved:

"1. Whether under the evidence, to wit, the writing sued on, and the attached guaranty and the mortgage securing said obligation, and the writing sued on, dated the 15th day of June, 1887, for $3,000, payable to the order of John D. Knox & Co., is a negotiable commercial instrument.

"2. Whether the indorsement of John Dibert & Company after the assignment, without recourse made by John D. Knox & Company, the payees, upon the writings sued pro ut, same in evidence, made the said John Dibert & Company liable as indorsers of negotiable commercial paper, the transfer from John D. Knox & Co. to John Dibert & Co., and the transfer of John Dibert & Co. to F. S. De Haas, having been made in the state of Kansas.

"3. Whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover interest at the rate of 12 per cent per annum from the date of protest of the writings sued on to the date of verdict, the law of Kansas authorizing the making of contracts bearing such rate of interest."

The court filed an opinion in the plaintiff's favor as respects the first question, in the defendant's favor as respects the second, and entered judgment for the latter.

The promissory note sued on and accompanying interest coupons, with the indorsements thereon, are as follows:

"Know all men by these presents: For value received we promise to pay John D. Knox & Co., or order, $3,000 lawful money of the United States, five years after date hereof, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, payable semiannually on the 15th day of December and June in each year, according to the tenor of ten interest coupons for $120 each, hereto annexed and bearing even date therewith.

"Said principal and interest being payable at the banking house of John D. Knox & Co., Topeka, Kan. It is expressly declared and agreed that this note and coupons hereto attached are made and executed under, and are to be construed by, the laws of the state of Kansas, in every particular, and are given for an actual loan of $3,000. This note and these coupons are to draw 12 per cent interest per annum after maturity, and are secured by a first mortgage on real estate.

"And if any of the interest coupons shall not be paid when due, the whole of the principal shall mature and be due at said time without demand, and said principal debt and said unpaid coupons shall represent and stand for the amount due, and the unpaid coupon first matured shall become a part of the principal, and the whole of said principal and the first unpaid coupon shall bear 12 per cent per annum interest thereon from the maturity of said coupon until paid.

The plaintiff excepted to the entry of judgment, and assigns the same as error.

Should judgment have been so entered? As respects the first question reserved, we agree with the circuit court. The note and coupons are mercantile instruments, not only according to the laws of Kansas, by which the parties bound themselves, but according to the law-merchant as well; and we deem it unnecessary to add anything to what the court has so well said on the subject.

As respects the second point raised, we cannot adopt the conclusion reached. If the payee's transfer of the paper had been by indorsement, instead of assignment, no question could have arisen. The assignment relieved the maker from the effect of his promise to pay "to order," and thus subjected the paper to defense by him in the hands of subsequent indorsees. The suit, however, is not against him, but against the indorser, John Dibert & Co.; and the question presented is therefore, What is the effect of the indorsement? It must be decided by the terms of the statute of 3 & 4 Anne, and the construction given them by the courts. Originally promissory notes were not recognized as mercantile instruments, but were treated as common choses in action; and were therefore not transferable. The statute placed them on equality with bills of exchange, provided for their transfer by indorsement, giving to such transfer the effect accorded to indorsements of bills of exchange; and thus made them mercantile instruments. Soon after the date of the statute the question arose: Is a promissory note from which the term "order," or "bearer," has been omitted, embraced by it, and therefore transferable by indorsement, with the consequences, as respects the indorser and indorsee, therein provided for? By the omission the maker reserved to himself the right to defend against payment after transfer; and it was therefore urged that the instrument is not covered by the statute, and consequently that the indorsement creates no obligation. The English courts, however, decided otherwise; holding that the instrument is within the spirit of the statute; that it is consequently transferable by indorsement; and that such transfer has the same consequences between the indorser and indorsee as it would have if the term had not been omitted; thus holding the paper to be a mercantile instrument, the indorsement of which creates a contract to pay according to its face—if the maker fails to do so. The courts said the indorsement is substantially the drawing of a new note in the terms of the old; or of an inland bill of exchange whereby the indorser orders the maker to pay the money due him to the indorsee. From the date of the earliest decision of the question (in Hill v. Lewis, 1 Salk. 182) to the present time there has been no variation in this respect by the English courts, though the point has been repeatedly raised; and the decision has been uniformly followed in this country. As the supreme court of Pennsylvania said in Leidy v. Tammany, 9 Watts, 356: "The English courts, looking upon the statute as a remedial one, entitled to a liberal construction in accordance with its spirit, extended it to notes not made transferable by their tenor, when they are deemed mercantile instruments." This statement is fully sustained by Hill v. Lewis, 1 Salk. 182; Hodges v. Steward, Id. 125; Smith v. Kendall, 6 T. R. 128; Burchell v. Slocock, 2 Ld. Raym. 1545; Gooshen & M. Turpin. Road v. Hurtin, 9 Johns. 217, 6 Am. Dec. 278; Leonard v. Mason, 1 Wend. 532; Codwise v. Gleason, 8 Day, 12; Smallwood v. Vernon, 1 Strange, 479; Leidy v. Tammany, 9 Watts, 358. In the last of these cases, where the general subject is fully and ably considered, the court says, although without the word "order" or "bearer" being inserted, the payee cannot transfer the note so as to enable his transferee to maintain an action in his own name against any party to it "except the indorser, yet it is now well settled that the indorsee may maintain an action against the indorser; so that as against him the note and indorsement will have the same operation as if he had express authority to transfer." In Hill v. Lewis, 1 Salk. 182, it is said that an indorsement is, under the statute, equivalent to making a new bill in the terms of the one indorsed. In Ballingalls v. Gloster, 8 East, 483, the court says: "There is no distinguishing the case of an indorser from that of a drawer, it having long ago been decided that every indorser is in the situation of a new drawer, every indorsement a new bill, and that the indorser stands as to the indorsee, in the law merchant, the same as the drawer." This is repeated in Smallwood v. Vernon and others of the cases cited. In Heylyn v. Adamson, 2 Burr. 676, Lord Mansfield likened the indorser to the drawer of a bill of exchange, saying that while as between the maker and payee there is no such similarity the "resemblance begins with the indorsement, for that is an order on the maker by the indorser to pay the amount due him to the indorsee, and is thus within the very definition of a bill of exchange." In Slacum v. Pomery, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 222, 3 L. ed. 205, Chief Justice Marshall says: "The indorsement of a bill is understood to be, not simply a transfer of the paper, but a new substantive contract."

Later the question arose: Is the indorser of an overdue promissory note (even when drawn to order or bearer) within the statute, and responsible accordingly? It was urged that he is not, because by the delay the maker is let in to defend, as if the terms "to order" or "bearer" had been omitted. The courts of England, however, as well as of this country, following the reasoning in the former class of cases, held otherwise. Brown v. Davies, 3 T. R. 88; Bank of North America v. Barriers, 1 Yeates, 360; Bower v. Hastings, 36 Pa. 285; Barnet v. Offerman, 7 Watts, 180; Snyder v. Riley, 6 Pa. 165, 47 Am. Dec. 452. In Bank of North America v. Barriers, the court says: "Every indorsement of a bill is considered a new drawing. After the day of payment in a note has expired, the indorser cannot be looked upon otherwise than as a new drawer;" and he was consequently held responsible as such. In Brown v. Davies, Justice Buller said: "When a note has been indorsed after it became due, I consider it a note newly drawn by the indorser;" and the defendant was held responsible accordingly.

About the same time a third question arose: Is the indorsement of nonmercantile paper—such as a written promise to pay money conditionally, or to pay in something else than money, etc.—within the statute, and the indorser liable as such? To this question the courts of England and of this country returned a negative answer; holding that such paper stands as it did at common law, constituting a mere chose in action, and is not therefore transferable in the sense of the law merchant. Patterson v. Poindexter, 6 Watts & S. 227, 40 Am. Dec. 554; Gray v. Donahoe, 4 Watts, 400; Wright v. Hart, 44 Pa. 454; Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Piollet, 126 Pa. 194, 4 L. R. A. 190; South Bend Iron Works v. Paddock, 87 Kan. 510; Story v. Lamb, 52 Mich. 525; First Nat. Bank v. Gay, 71 Mo. 637; Fear v. Dunlap, 1 G. Greene, 384; Anida v. Yeomans, 39 Mich. 171.

How, then, should the case before us be decided? It is not covered by the terms of the statute, nor are its facts embraced in either of the three classes of cases cited. It must be determined, therefore, by the light which its proper analogies shed on the subject. These analogies are, we believe, found in the first two classes of cases cited. In all material respects it closely resembles them; in principle it seems identical with them. Here the paper is, as it was there, mercantile in character, and consequently negotiable. In the law merchant this latter term signifies transferable by indorsement, with the consequence there attached to such transfers. The negotiability of paper (except as between the original parties) does not depend, as we have seen, upon the maker's authorization of a transfer, as by promising to pay to order, or bearer (as is sometimes inaccurately said), but upon the character of the paper. In the last of the three classes of cases mentioned the paper involved, contained such a promise, but as it was not mercantile in character, the indorsement had not the effect of a mercantile contract. As said by the court in Patterson v. Poindexter, 6 Watts & S. 224, 40 Am. Dec. 554: "The contract of indorsement is a parasite which like the chameleon takes its hue from the thing with which it is connected." On the other hand, the paper involved in the first of these classes (which did not contain such a promise) was held to be mercantile, and consequently negotiable. In our case it is true the situation of the indorsee is simply that of an equitable assignee as against the maker; but so was that of the indorsees in the first class of cases cited, and substantially so, at least, was that of the indorsees involved in the second class. Here the effect of the maker's promise to pay "to order" was lost by the payee's failure to indorse, while in the second class it was lost by his failure to indorse before the note matured. In both the promise to pay to order or bearer was thus annulled (as if erased), and the note made to read as if such promise had been omitted—rendering the instrument identical with those involved in the first class.

The circuit court likened the case to those of the third class—from which, as we believe for the reasons stated, it is plainly distinguishable. There the instruments involved were not mercantile—although drawn to “order” or “bearer.” The cases relied upon by the court all rest on this plain distinction. The indorsement there was of a mere chose in action. In Gray v. Donahoe, Chief Justice Lewis points out the distinction between such cases and those of the first class mentioned, very clearly. The note before him was drawn “to order,” but was payable in “current funds at Pittsburgh.” While he therefore held it to be nonmercantile and consequently non-negotiable,—saying that “nothing but money is properly the subject of a negotiable contract,—he added: “A note not negotiable in form, as between the original parties, may be negotiable between subsequent ones;” citing Leidy v. Tammany.

The third question reserved, on which the circuit court did not pass, must now be disposed of. The paper is made payable in Kansas, and, as we have seen, the parties expressly submitted themselves to the laws of that state. They fixed the rate of interest at 12 per cent after default, which the laws of Kansas justify. This question must therefore receive an affirmative answer.

The judgment must be reversed, and the record remitted to the Circuit Court for further proceedings, in accordance with this opinion.

[Simpson, McIntire, & Co.], for themselves, and for their heirs, executors and administrators, and assigns, do hereby expressly release them from all liability or damage by reason of any injury to or destruction of any building or buildings now on, or which may hereafter be placed on, said premises, or of the fixtures, appurtenances, or other personal property remaining inside or outside of said buildings, by fire occasioned or originated by sparks or burning coal from the locomotives, or from any damage done by trains, or cars running off the track, or from the carelessness or negligence of employees or agents of said railway company.” Simpson, McIntire, & Co. had, or constructed, a cold-storage building and warehouse on the leased premises, stocked it with butter and eggs, and insured the buildings and stock with the Hartford Fire Insurance Company and seven other insurance companies, which are the plaintiffs in error, and the buildings and stock were burned. The insurance companies brought an action against the railway company in the court below, and alleged in their complaint that they had insured Simpson, McIntire, & Co. against loss by fire on their cold-storage building, warehouse, and stock; that these were destroyed by a fire caused by the negligence of the railway company on November 11, 1892; that the insurance companies had paid Simpson, McIntire, & Co. $28,450 on account of their loss by this fire; that they were thereby subrogated to the rights of Simpson, McIntire, & Co. against the railway company, and were entitled to recover from it that amount with interest. The railway company answered this complaint, and one of the defenses it pleaded was the condition of the lease to Simpson, McIntire, & Co., by which they exempted and released the railway company from all liability for damage to their buildings and stock caused by fire set by the railway company. The plaintiffs in error demurred to this defense on the ground that this stipulation of the lease was against public policy and void. Their demurrer was overruled, and judgment was rendered against them thereon. The writ of error in this case was sued out to reverse this judgment, and the ruling upon the demurrer is the error assigned.

Messrs. Charles A. Clark and Richard W. Barger, for plaintiffs in error:

Railway companies using, as they do, the dangerous agencies of steam and fire for the purposes of locomotion, may be required to take additional safeguards for protection of adjoining property from the danger of destruction by fire.

The Iowa statute does not make the railways absolutely liable for damages from fires set out, but makes the fact of the fire prima facie proof of negligence on the part of the railway, which might be rebutted by it by showing freedom from negligence.

Neither as a precedent nor as an authority is the decision overruling that case binding upon this court.

It is the duty of men to manage their own affairs carefully and circumspectly for the avoidance of injury to others, and a neglect of this duty, resulting in harm to any person, places them under an obligation from the law to compensate him.

The mere tendency of a contract to promote unlawful acts renders it quite illegal as against the policy of the law, without regard to any circumstances indicating the probable commission of such acts.

Mr. Charles B. Keeler, for defendant in error:

The supreme court of Iowa finally held that such exemption or release was not in violation of the fire statute of Iowa, or contrary to any public policy of the state, but was lawful and would be enforced by the courts of Iowa.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Is a condition, in a lease by a railway company of a portion of its right of way, that it shall not be liable to the lessee for any damage to any buildings or personal property thereon, caused by fire set by its locomotives, or by the negligence of its officers or servants, in violation of public policy, and therefore void? This is the question in this case. The public policy of a state or nation must be determined by its Constitution, laws, and judicial decisions; not by the varying opinions of laymen, lawyers, or judges as to the demands of the interests of the public. Vidal v. Philadelphia, 43 U. S. 2 How. 127, 197, 11 L. ed. 205, 233; United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assn. 7 C. C. A. 15, 78, 58 Fed. Rep. 58, 24 L. R. A. 978, 4 Intern. Com. Rep. 443; Swann v. Swann, 21 Fed. Rep. 299. If this was a question of local law, or of the public policy of the state of Iowa alone, it would require little consideration by this court. There are many provisions of the statutes of the state of Iowa relating to the duties of individuals and corporations to use care to prevent damage from fire. The two which bear most directly upon the question under consideration in this case are sections 1289 and 1306 of the Code of that state, which provide "that any corporation operating a railway shall be liable for all damages by fire that is set out or caused by operating of any such railway" (McClain's Anno. Code (Iowa) 1888, § 1972); and "no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt any corporation engaged in transporting persons or property by railway from liability of a common carrier, or carrier of passengers, which would exist had no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation been made or entered into" (Id. § 2007). In Griswold v. Illinois C. R. Co. (Iowa) 24 L. R. A. 647, the supreme court of Iowa considered these statutes and the public policy of that state, and, after repeated argument and the most careful deliberation, held that a provision in a lease by a railway company of a portion of its right of way, on which the lessee had placed an elevator and warehouse and personal property, which exempted the railroad company from liability for damages by fire negligently communicated by its servants to these buildings and their contents, violated no law of that state, was not injurious to the public interests, and was not against public policy. This was the decision of the highest judicial tribunal of that state. It constitutes an authoritative construction of the statutes of the state (Dempey v. Onego Twp. 4 U. S. App. 416, 435, 2 C. C. A. 110, 51 Fed. Rep. 97; Rugan v. Sabin, 10 U. S. App. 519, 8 C. C. A. 578, 58 Fed. Rep. 415; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Onego Twp. 7 C. C. A. 669, 674, 59 Fed. Rep. 58; Madden v. Lancaster County, 12 C. C. A. 566, 570, 65 Fed. Rep. 188), and a very persuasive authority that the contract here in question is not contrary to public policy.

Upon the latter question, however, it is not conclusive upon the national courts. Whether or not such a provision of a contract is against public policy is a question of general law, and not dependent solely upon any local statute or usage. Over this question the national courts exercise concurrent jurisdiction with those of the state, and, while the decisions of the latter are always entitled to the weight of persuasive authority, the Federal courts must in the end exercise their own judgment. New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 383, 21 L. ed. 634, 637; Myrick v. Michigan C. R. Co. 107 U. S. 102, 27 L. ed. 325; Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 495, 511, 10 L. ed. 1044, 1051; Swift v. Tyson, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 1, 10 L. ed. 685; Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. v. National Bank, 102 U. S. 14, 26 L. ed. 61; Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 33, 27 L. ed. 359, 365; Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 478, 31 L. ed. 508, 513; Bucher v. Cheshire R. Co. 125 U. S. 555, 583, 31 L. ed. 795, 799; Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co., Limited, v. Phenix Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 397, 443, 32 L. ed. 788, 793.

We turn accordingly to the consideration of this question. Before entering upon its discussion, it is important to note the terms and effect of the lease before us, and the situation of the parties and of the property which was destroyed. Before the lease was made, the lessees had no right to enter upon, or to place any property upon, the leased premises, and the railway company owed to the lessee no duty to exercise ordinary care not to set fire to any property on those premises, because, presumptively, there was none there, and because, if any one put any there, the only duty of the company was not wilfully and wantonly to injure it, because it would be there in violation of law. If, however, the railway company should lease the right of way to Simpson, McIntire, & Co., and should permit them to put buildings and personal property thereon, it would thereby subject itself to a new burden and assume a new duty,—the duty of exercising ordinary care to prevent the burning of their property on these premises by the operation of its railroad. It was apparently willing to discharge all the duties it owed to the public, and to every individual of the public, and it did not undertake, by this lease, to limit or restrict its liability to discharge any of those duties, but it simply undertook to prevent its assumption of a new duty. Its quasi public character as a railroad company, its position as a common carrier, imposed upon it no duty to lease any of its right of way to these lessees, or to any one else, nor had they, or any one, any right to the use of the leased premises before this lease was made. The property that was burned was the private property of the lessees. None of it was in process of transportation by the railway company, none of it was awaiting delivery by the company to its consignees after transportation, and none of it had been received by the company for transportation. The warehouses and the property in them bore the same relation to the carrying business of the company, according to this record, that the store and contents of any merchant or commission man would bear to it. Neither the lease, nor the relation of the property to the railway company, arose out of the discharge of any duty imposed upon the corporation by its position of a common carrier, or by its character of a quasi public corporation.

The question, then, is, Was it a violation of public policy for the lessees to agree, under these circumstances, that, if they were permitted to put their buildings and property upon the right of way of the railroad company, and to use them thereon, the duties and liabilities of the latter to them, and to the public, should remain as they were before the lease was made, and should not be increased by any additional burden? No act of Congress, no statute, no decision of any court (except a decision of the supreme court of Iowa, which was overruled by Griswold v. Illinois C. R. Co. supra), which prohibits such an agreement or declares it to be against public policy, has been called to our attention. Counsel for plaintiffs in error present a carefully prepared and exhaustive argument, by analogy, to show that such an agreement is detrimental to the public welfare, and against public policy, but their contention rests entirely upon that argument. If the analogy fails, the argument fails. The argument runs in this way: A contract by a railroad company with one of its employees, or with a passenger, or with a shipper, to exempt itself from liability for negligence in operating its railroad is against public policy and void. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Payne, 29 Kan. 169; Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Eubanks, 48 Ark. 460; New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 637; Southern Exp. Co. v. Caldwell, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 264, 267, 23 L. ed. 556, 558; York Mfg. Co. v. Illinois C. R. Co. 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 107, 18 L. ed. 170; Bank of Kentucky v. Adams Exp. Co. 93 U. S. 174, 181, 183, 185, 23 L. ed. 872, 875-877; Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co., Limited, v. Phenix Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 440, 441, 32 L. ed. 791, 792. The contract to exempt the railway company from liability for damage to the property of these lessees, caused by fires resulting from the negligence of the railway company, is similar to contracts with its employees, passengers, and shippers to exempt it from liability to them for negligence in operating its railroad. Therefore, the provision for exemption in this lease is against public policy, and void. But the analogy fails in that vital part which constitutes the reason and foundation of the rule established by the authorities cited. Its fallacy is, that the law imposes upon a railroad company the absolute duty to operate its railroad, to employ suitable men to operate it, to exercise ordinary care to furnish them with a reasonably safe place in which to render their services, and with reasonably safe machinery and appliances with which to perform them. Any breach of this duty is a violation of the law which imposes the duty. It is also an immeasurable injury to the public interests, because it endangers the lives and limbs of citizens, which are of the highest value to the state and nation. A contract which exempts the carrier from negligence in the discharge of these duties is void, because it relieves it of an absolute duty which the law imposes upon it, and because it unreasonably endangers the lives of employees and passengers. But the law imposes no duty upon a railroad company to lease its right of way, or to use ordinary care not to set fires that would burn property placed upon it by strangers without its permission. In the former case, public policy and the law impose upon the carrier the duty to hire employees, to operate its railroad with reasonable care, in order to protect its employees from injury, and therefore it may not contract to be relieved from the law and the duty. The carrier has no choice. It must perform these duties, or forfeit its charter. In the latter case, no duty to lease is imposed. The company has the option—the choice—to lease or to refuse to lease; and if it does lease, and does stipulate for indemnity from damages caused by its negligence in firing the property of the lessee placed upon the leased premises by its permission, that contract in no way relieves it from the discharge of any duty to the public, or to any citizen, that the law or public policy had imposed upon it.

Again, the law imposes upon a railroad company the absolute duty to accept passengers and freight when offered, and to carry the former with the utmost, and the latter with ordinary, care. The passenger is often obliged to travel, and the shipper to send his goods, by railroad. In making their contracts, they do not stand on an equal footing with it. They cannot stop to negotiate and settle the terms of a contract every time they desire to use the railroad. They would often prefer the abandonment of the contracts to such negotiations. On the other hand, the railroad company, with its trained employees, and its monopoly of the transportation facilities sought, has the ability and the power to exact the contract it desires. This inequality in the situation of the parties, which would, if permitted, enable the railroad company to obtain unfair contracts from passengers and shippers, and the fact that contracts with them, which exempt the company from liability for negligence, relieve it from an absolute duty imposed by the law, and thus violate it, and at the same time increase the danger to the lives and property of the people from the operation of a railroad, constitute the reasons for the decisions that have established and maintain the rule that such contracts are against public policy. New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 369, 378, 379, 21 L. ed. 627, 637, 639, 640; York Mfg. Co. v. Illinois C. R. Co. 70 U. S. 8 Wall. 107, 112, 18 L. ed. 170, 171; United States Exp. Co. v. Kountze, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 342, 353, 19 L. ed. 457, 460; Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co., Limited, v. Phenix Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 397, 440; 443, 32 L. ed. 788, 791, 792; Southern Exp. Co. v. Caldwell, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 264, 267, 268, 22 L. ed. 556, 558.

But the defendant in error and Simpson, McIntire, & Co., did not stand on unequal footing. The lessees were not compelled to lease of the railroad company. The latter had no monopoly of land in Iowa. Each party had the option to execute, or to refuse to execute, the lease. The condition exempting the company from liability for damages to the property of the lessees caused by fire set by the negligence of the company relieved the company from no duty it was required by law to perform but simply provided that it should not assume an additional burden, which it had the option to take or to refuse. Thus, in the case at bar, all the reasons for the rule avoiding contracts exempting common carriers from liability for negligence failed. And it is difficult to perceive how the proposition that this rule should govern this case can be successfully maintained.

It is said that it was the duty of the railroad company to furnish suitable warehouses for the receipt of butter and eggs offered to it for transportation, and already transported, but awaiting delivery to the consignees, that it was bound to exercise ordinary care not to burn the contents placed in such warehouses by it as a carrier, and that, if it employed Simpson, McIntire, & Co. to receive and store the goods of its shippers, it was bound to exercise the same degree of care to protect the goods in their possession. Covington Stock-Yards Co. v. Keith, 139 U. S. 128, 133, 136, 35 L. ed. 73, 75, 76. It is a conclusive answer to this contention that there is nothing in this record to show that the railroad company ever had employed Simpson, McIntire, & Co. to receive or store any of the goods of its shippers. Moreover, if it had done so, it is not perceived why the contract of these lessees to take the risk of, and to hold the railroad company harmless from, any damage to such property from fires caused by the negligent operation of the railroad, would not have been valid. It goes without saying that the railroad company could have legally employed an insurance company to indemnify it against loss by fire occasioned by the negligence of its servants. If there were goods of its customers burned in the warehouse, the lessees had, in effect, insured the railroad company against damages for their loss, and the insurance companies had insured the lessees. No reason is perceived why these contracts were not valid.

It is said that a statute which should provide that a railroad company should not be liable to the owner of property for damages to it by fire, caused by the negligence of the company, would be unconstitutional and void, because it would authorize the taking of private property without due process of law, and without compensation, and that therefore the contract here in question is void. But a statute enacting that a private individual who should construct a building or store personal property upon the right of way of a railroad company should be deemed guilty of negligence, and should not be permitted to maintain any action against the company for its destruction by fire, occasioned by the negligence of the latter in the operation of its railroad, would not be obnoxious to this objection, nor detrimental to the public interest, and it is not perceived how a contract to that effect could be.

The public policy of this nation, with reference to contracts of common carriers exempting them from liability for negligence, was established and declared by the decisions of the Supreme Court in New York

C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 384, 21 L. ed. 627, 641; Southern Exp. Co. v. Caldwell, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 264, 267, 268, 22 L. ed. 556, 558; and Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co., Limited, v. Phenix Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 397, 440, 441, 32 L. ed. 788, 791, 792. In the leading case of New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, supra, Mr. Justice Bradley declared the rules by which the validity of such contracts must be determined to be: "First, that a common carrier cannot lawfully stipulate for exemption from responsibility when such exemption is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law; secondly, that it is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law for a common carrier to stipulate for exemption from responsibility for the negligence of himself or his servants; thirdly, that these rules apply both to carriers of goods and carriers of passengers for hire, and with special force to the latter."

In Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co., Limited, v. Phenix Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 397, at page 441, 32 L. ed. 788, 792, Mr. Justice Gray thus states the rule in a single paragraph: "Special contracts between the carrier and the customer, the terms of which are just and reasonable and not contrary to public policy, are upheld—such as those exempting the carrier from responsibility for losses happening from accident, or from dangers of navigation that no human skill or diligence can guard against; or for money or other valuable articles, liable to be stolen or damaged,—unless informed of their character or value; or for perishable articles or live animals, when injured without default or negligence of the carrier. But the law does not allow a public carrier to abandon altogether his obligations to the public, and to stipulate for exemptions which are unreasonable and improper, amounting to an abnegation of the essential duties of his employment."

The burden is on the party who seeks to put a restraint upon the freedom of contracts to make it plainly and obviously clear that the contract is against public policy. United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assn. 7 C. C. A. 15, 82, 58 Fed. Rep. 58, 24 L. R. A. 78, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 443; Printing & N. R. Co. v. Sampson, L. R. 19 Eq. 462; Tallis v. Tallis, 1 El. & Bl. 391; Rousillon v. Rousillon, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 351, 365; Stewart v. Erie & W. Transp. Co. 17 Minn. 372, 391 (Gil. 348); Marsh v. Russell, 66 N. Y. 288; Phippen v. Stickney, 3 Met. 384, 389. In our opinion the plaintiffs in error fall far short of sustaining this burden, and our conclusions are:

The reasons why an unreasonable and unjust contract between a common carrier and another, exempting the former from liability for negligence, is against public policy and void, are, that it attempts to release the carrier from the discharge of the essential duties imposed upon it by law, that the parties to the contract are not upon an equal footing, and that it tends to endanger the lives and limbs of passengers and employees. A contract in a lease by a railroad company of a portion of its right of way, that it shall not be liable to the lessees for any damage, caused by fire set by the negligence of itself or of its employees, to the buildings or personal property which the lessees have or place on the leased premises, does not fall within this rule, and is not void because it does not fall within its reasons. A railroad company does not assume by such a contract to relieve itself of any of its essential duties as a common carrier or as a quasi public corporation. The contract leaves it under the same duties and liabilities to which it was subject before it was made. It is bound to the same diligence, fidelity, and care, after a lease containing such a contract is executed, that it would have been required to exercise if no such agreement had been made. Southern Exp. Co. v. Caldwell, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 264, 267, 268, 22 L. ed. 556, 558. The only effect of the contract is to prevent the assumption by the railroad company of a new duty, which it was entirely free to assume or to refuse to assume. It does not tend to endanger the lives of the employees or passengers of the company, and the parties to it stand upon an equal footing when the lease is made because each is free to make or refuse to make the contract.

For these reasons the judgment below must be affirmed, with costs, and it is so ordered.

Caldwell, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

I concur in the conclusion reached in this case, but dissent from this statement in the majority opinion, namely: "Upon the latter question, however, it is not conclusive upon the national courts. Whether or not such a provision of a contract is against public policy is a question of general law, and not dependent solely upon any local statute or usage."

The contract referred to is a lease of real estate situated in Iowa. The lease was made and executed, and its covenants were to be performed, in that state. The supreme court of Iowa held the lease and all its conditions valid under the laws of that state. No decision of the Supreme Court of the United States has been cited, and it is believed none can be found, holding that this decision of the supreme court of Iowa is not binding on this court. But, however this may be, there is no difference of opinion between the supreme court of Iowa and this court as to the validity of the lease and all its conditions, and there is therefore no occasion for this court to express an opinion upon the question whether it would be found by the decision of the supreme court of Iowa if the two courts differed in opinion on the question of public policy. What is said on this subject is not necessary to the decision of the case, and, moreover, is not law. A "local statute," declaring such a condition in a lease to be either valid or void, would undoubtedly be obligatory on this and all other courts. There are weighty reasons why a question of this character should not be lightly considered. The most serious blot on the American system of jurisprudence is that whereby a question affecting the rights and liabilities of a citizen may be differently decided by courts of different governments, whose judgments are equally binding and final. This unfortunate condition of our jurisprudence results from our dual system of government. It has no existence in any other country, and ought to be confined within the narrowest limits possible in this. Nothing can be more repugnant to one's sense of justice, or to a uniform and harmonious administration of the law, than to require the citizen to be bound by conflicting decisions of courts of different governments. Under the operation of this unseemly rule, a suit against one in a state court may be decided one way, and a suit against the same party in the Federal court, involving the very same question, may be decided the other way. As a result of these diverse rules of decision, each party to a suit engages in an unseemly struggle to get into that jurisdiction whose rules of decision are believed to be most favorable to his side of the case. It was the hope that this court would overrule the decision of the supreme court of Iowa in a similar case that caused the removal of this case into the circuit court. The class of questions as to which different rules of decision may obtain, and the Federal courts may disregard the decision of the state courts thereon, has not been very clearly defined. What is said here has reference, of course, to nonfederal questions, such as the one raised in this case. As to Federal questions, there is but one rule of decision, and one court of last resort. The general statement has been often made that the Federal courts are not bound to follow the decisions of state courts on questions of general jurisprudence, when unaffected by state legislation; but no exact enumeration has ever been made, or ever can be made, of the questions that come within this general definition. Moreover, the decisions of the supreme court relating to the subject are not uniform or harmonious. The question as presented by this record is not free from doubt. It is a question upon which the court should not express an opinion, except when necessary to the decision of the case, and that necessity does not exist in this case.

for the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company to issue certificates to raise money for the improvement and preservation of the property which should be a prior lien to that of the first mortgage on the property. Reversed.

Before Caldwell, Sanborn, and Thayer, Circuit Judges.

Statement by Caldwell, Circuit Judge:

On the 1st day of November, 1889, the Denver-Arapahoe Land Company, a Colorado corporation, executed to the appellant John R. Hanna its trust deed on 11,820 acres of land in Arapahoe and Douglas counties, Colo., to secure to the appellant Rufus Clark the payment of its promissory notes aggregating the sum of $97,000. On the same day the same corporation executed to the Mercantile Trust company of New York, as trustee, a deed of trust on 4,480 acres of land in Arapahoe county, Colo., to secure an issue of its first-mortgage bonds amounting to $140,000. On the 1st day of March, 1890, the Denver Water-Storage Company, a Colorado corporation, executed to the State Trust Company of New York, as trustee, a deed of trust on about 1,100 acres of land in Douglas county, Colo., together with the Castlewood dam and reservoir, irrigating canals, ditches, etc., to secure the payment of its first-mortgage bonds amounting to the sum of $800,000. Each of these deeds of trust covers different properties, and is the first and valid lien upon the property covered by it. On or about the 1st day of May, 1891, the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company was organized, pursuant to the laws of Colorado, by the consolidation of the Denver-Arapahoe Land Company and the Denver Water-Storage Company, and by virtue of such consolidation acquired, subject to the deeds of trust above described, all of the property covered by or embraced therein. Immediately after its organization the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company executed a deed of trust upon the entire property acquired by the consolidation mentioned, subject to the several deeds of trust executed by the constituent companies, and above set forth, to the State Trust Company of New York, as trustee, to secure an issue of its general or consolidated mortgage bonds to the amount of $800,000. On the 4th day of June, 1894, the State Trust Company of New York, as trustee in the consolidated mortgage last above mentioned, filed its bill of complaint in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Colorado against the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company, alleging that it had made default, and failed to pay the taxes on its lands or interest upon its bonds, and that it was insolvent, and prayed for the foreclosure of its mortgage and the appointment of a receiver. This bill admitted the priority of the underlying deeds of trust executed by the constituent companies, and that any relief granted in the suit, by foreclosure or otherwise, must be subject to the rights and equities existing under the prior mortgages. On the day the bill was filed the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company appeared and answered, admitting its insolvency, and confessing all the allegations to the bill. The court thereupon appointed a receiver. On the 24th of July, 1894, the State Trust Company filed its amended and supplemental bill of complaint, to which the Mercantile Trust Company of New York, and the appellants John R. Hanna and Rufus Clark were made defendants. This amended bill prayed relief as follows: That the said Mercantile Trust Company, John R. Hanna, and Rufus Clark might be brought in as defendants in the action, and required to set up their respective rights upon the real estate covered by the deeds of trust executed by the Denver-Arapahoe Land Company; that the respective rights of the trustees under the several mortgages or deeds of trust might be judicially ascertained and determined by the court; that the properties covered by the respective deeds of trust might be marshaled, and judicially ascertained and adjusted; that the amounts due upon the notes and bonds issued under the several deeds of trust might be adjudicated and determined; that the said deeds of trust might be foreclosed; that the receiver theretofore appointed in the action might be continued as receiver of all the property covered by each and all of said deeds of trust; that the said John R. Hanna, Rufus Clark, and the Mercantile Trust Company, and the holders of any of the notes, bonds, or securities issued under said deeds of trust, might be enjoined and restrained from commencing any action or proceeding in the circuit court of the United States for Colorado, or any other court, for the foreclosure of the said deeds of trust, and from enforcing their said notes and bonds, or for the collection thereof, against the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company, or its property and effects, except in this action.

On the 16th day of August, 1894, a special master appointed in the cause made a report, from which it appears that the company was endeavoring to carry on a colonization business, and was engaged in selling small tracts of land, for fruit raising and garden purposes, to settlers, or those who proposed to become settlers, or colonists; that in many cases the company sold these tracts of land (usually ten acres), under executory contracts, for small amounts of cash down, and deferred payments extending over a period of five years, when the various purchasers were to receive the deeds. The company agreed to plant these tracts with fruit trees, and cultivate and care for them during the five years. On the 16th of August the receiver filed his petition, stating, substantially, that the property of the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company consists of 17,000 acres of land in the counties of Arapahoe and Douglas, Colo., and an extensive dam or reservoir, known as the "Castlewood Dam," and a system of canals and irrigating ditches connected therewith, and a large number of land-purchase contracts and land-purchase notes, referred to in the report of the special master; that the original plan of the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company contemplated the colonization of these lands; the amount of the land-purchase contracts and notes, as shown by the report of the special master; the agreements made by the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company to plant and cultivate the lands, already referred to, and that in consideration thereof the various purchasers have made large payments, and have a right, in justice and equity, to demand performance of the contracts of the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company, and that otherwise the fruit trees upon the tracts sold under the planting and cultivation contracts will die, and the payments made by the purchasers will be absolutely lost; and that, moreover, it is of vital importance to the company that it should collect the balance due upon the land-sale notes and contracts mentioned, which collection is entirely dependent upon the keeping up of the tracts of land, and the performance by the company of the contracts with the purchasers aforesaid. The petition then presents a number of reasons and arguments why, in the judgment of the receiver, certificates should be issued, and calls attention to the default in taxes upon the company's lands, alleged to amount to about $4,000. The particulars of the three underlying mortgages and the consolidated mortgage are then given, and the receiver calls the court's attention to the opportunity which presents itself for engaging in the colonization of the company's barren lands, if he is authorized to issue certificates of indebtedness to raise funds with which to properly present the merits and advantages of the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company's property. On the 15th day of September, 1894, the court made an order, upon the receiver's petition, which authorized the issue of receiver's certificates to pay taxes due upon the lands, and to redeem the same from tax sales, and making such certificates a first and paramount lien upon the property upon which the taxes were paid. The order also contained this provision: "(5) It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that in addition to the amounts which may be necessary to pay the taxes now in arrears upon the property set forth and described in paragraphs 2, 3, and 4 of this order, the receiver shall have, and is hereby granted, authority to borrow such additional sum of money as shall, together with said amounts for taxes, amount in the aggregate to a sum not exceeding $10,000, and to issue therefor his certificates of indebtedness, which said certificates of indebtedness shall be first and paramount liens upon all the property, rights, and franchises now owned or controlled by the said the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company, defendant herein, wheresoever situated, and subject to the jurisdiction of this court. And said additional sums of money shall be used and applied by said receiver for the purpose of preserving the property of the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company in his possession and custody, and carrying out and maintaining the contracts of the company now in existence, under and by which the company has heretofore sold tracts of land to various parties, which said contracts are referred to in the report of said receiver, and for such other purposes as are set out in said petition, with references to the maintenance, preservation, and protection of the property of the company, or as the court may "from time to time direct." From this order, John R. Hanna, trustee in the deed of trust dated November 1, 1889, and Rufus Clark, the beneficiary named therein, and the holder of a large amount of the bonds secured by the mortgage to the Mercantile Trust Company, appealed to this court.

Even in railroad cases, the priority of receivers' certificates over existing mortgages in almost all instances in which the courts have authorized receivers to borrow money and make their certificates a first lien upon the property, either the suits were filed by the bondholders themselves, with an offer to postpone their liens, or the mortgagees have themselves asked for these orders, or expressly assented to them, or the state legislature has imposed upon the chancellor the obligation, when an incorporated railroad becomes insolvent, of operating the road for the use of the public.

The attempt to invoke the exercise of the peculiar power of the chancellors in relation to receivers' certificates in other than railroad cases has failed.

If such power exists or is inherent in a chancellor in the exercise of his equitable powers, there was no sufficient nor any showing in the case at bar to warrant the exercise of this exceptional and extraordinary jurisdiction against the objection of appellants.

Courts have always held that such an order as the one complained of shall only be made under extraordinary and exceptional circumstances, and, with ample opportunity given to all parties to examine witnesses and accounts, and to produce testimony, a court should not authorize the issue of receivers' certificates without clear proof of the correctness of the facts alleged as a ground for their issuance, and of the necessity for raising the money.

Caldwell, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The precise question in this case is whether a court of chancery which has appointed a receiver for an insolvent private corporation in a foreclosure suit brought by a second mortgagee may, against the objection of the first mortgagee, authorize its receiver to issue receiver's certificates to raise money to carry on the business of the insolvent corporation and to improve its lands, and make such certificates a first and paramount lien upon the lands covered by the first mortgage. So far as we are advised, the power to do this has been denied in every case in which the question has arisen. One of the first cases in which the question arose was Raht v. Attrill, 106 N. Y. 438, 60 Am. Rep. 456. In that case a hotel company mortgaged its property to raise funds to build a hotel. Before the completion of the hotel the corporation became insolvent, and upon the application of its principal stockholder a receiver was appointed; and upon an application and showing that the wages of the men who worked on the hotel building were unpaid, and that they threatened, unless paid, to burn the building, the court made an order authorizing the receiver to issue certificates, which were declared to be a lien prior to the trust mortgage, to raise funds to pay the wages due the laborers. A referee reported that, if the money had not been raised to pay the wages due the men, the hotel and other property of the corporation "would, in all probability, have been destroyed or seriously injured." In the progress of the case the mortgagees denied that the court had authority or power to set aside the prior lien of the mortgage and make the receiver's certificates, issued under the circumstances mentioned, a first and prior lien upon the property. The court delivered an exhaustive opinion, covering every aspect of the question. We quote some of its utterances. The court said: "The lien of the mortgage attaches not only to the land in the condition in which it was at the time of the execution of the mortgage, but as changed or improved by accretions, or by labor expended upon it while the mortgage is in existence. Creditors having debts created for money, labor, or materials used in improving the mortgaged property acquire on that account no legal or equitable claim to displace or subordinate the lien of the mortgage for their protection. . . . The act of the court in taking charge of property through a receiver is attended with certain necessary expenses of its care and custody; and it has become the settled rule that expenses of realization, and also certain expenses which are called 'expenses of preservation,' may be incurred under the order of the court, on the credit of the property, and it follows, from necessity, in order to the effectual administration of the trust assumed by the court, that these expenses should be paid out of the income, or, when necessary, out of the corpus of the property before distribution, or before the court passes over the property to those adjudged to be entitled. . . . It would be difficult to define, by a rule applicable in every case, what are expenses of preservation which may be incurred by a receiver by authority of the court. It was said by James, L. J., in Re Regent's Canal Iron Works Co. L. R. 8 Ch. Div. 411, that 'the only costs for the preservation of the property would be such things as have been stated, the repairing of the property, paying rates and taxes which would be necessary to prevent any forfeiture, or putting a person in to take care of the property.' Wherever the true limit is, we think it does not include the expenditure authorized by the order of August 17, and that such an expenditure is, and ought to be, excluded from the definition. There must be something approaching a demonstrable necessity to justify such an infringement of the rights of the mortgagees as was attempted in this case."

After referring to the cases in which the receivers of insolvent railroad corporations have been authorized to issue certificates which were declared to be a first lien on the property of the corporations, the court said: "It cannot be successfully denied that the decisions in these cases vest in the courts a very broad and comprehensive jurisdiction over insolvent railroad corporations and their property. It will be found, on examining these cases, that the jurisdiction asserted by the court therein is largely based upon the public character of railroad corporations; the public interest in their continued and successful operation; the peculiar character and terms of railroad mortgages, and upon other special grounds not applicable to ordinary private corporations. . . . These cases furnish, we think, no authority for upholding the order of August 17, or for subverting the priority of lien which, according to the general rules of law, the bondholders acquired through the trust mortgage on the property of the company. It would be unwise, we think, to extend the power of the court in dealing with property in the hands of receivers to the practical subversion or destruction of vested interests, as would be the case in this instance if the order of August 17 should be sustained. It is best for all that the integrity of contracts should be strictly guarded and maintained and that a rigid, rather than a liberal, construction of the power of the court to subject property in the hands of receivers to charges, to the prejudice of creditors, should be adopted."

We concur in the doctrine expressed in this case. See, to the same effect, Farmer's Loan & T. Co. v. Grapes Creek Coal Co. 50 Fed. Rep. 481, 16 L. R. A. 603; Laughlin v. United States Rolling-Stock Co. 64 Fed. Rep. 25; Fidelity Ins. T. & S. D. Co. v. Roanoke Iron Co. 68 Fed. Rep. 623; Shively v. Loomis Coal Co. 69 Fed. Rep. 204; and Hooper v. Central Trust Co. (Md.) 29 L. R. A. 262.

The contention of the appellees is that the order made by the circuit court finds sanction in the cases of Wallace v. Loomis, 97 U. S. 146, 24 L. ed. 895; Fordick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235, 25 L. ed. 839; Barton v. Barbour, 104 U. S. 126, 26 L. ed. 672; Mittenberger v. Logansport, C. & S. W. R. Co. 106 U. S. 236, 27 L. ed. 117; Union Trust Co. v. Souther, 107 U. S. 591, 27 L. ed. 488,—and other later cases of like character, in which receivers of insolvent railroad corporations were authorized to issue receivers' certificates for various purposes, which were made a first and paramount lien on the property of the insolvent railroad company. But the doctrine of these cases has no application to this case. They rest on the peculiar character of railroad property and of a railroad corporation. The distinction between railroad corporations, which are of a quasi public character, and purely private corporations, has been often pointed out, and need not be repeated here. It is enough to say that the supreme court itself has said that the doctrine of the cases cited has only been applied in railroad cases. In Wood v. Guarantees Trust & S. D. Co. 128 U. S. 416, 32 L. ed. 472, the court said: "The doctrine of Fordick v. Schall has never yet been applied in any case except that of a railroad. The case lays great emphasis upon the consideration that a railroad is a peculiar property, of a public nature, and discharging a great public work. There is a broad distinction between such a case and that of a purely private concern. We do not undertake to decide the question here, but only point it out."

The bill in this case is one to foreclose a second mortgage. To such a bill the prior mortgages are not even necessary parties. Jerome v. McCarter, 94 U. S. 734, 24 L. ed. 186. The validity and priority of the liens of the mortgages under which the appellants claimed is distinctly admitted in the original and amended bills. The purpose of filing the amended bill making the prior mortgagee defendants seems to have been to enjoin them from foreclosing their mortgages, and subject the lands covered by their mortgages to a prior lien for money borrowed to carry on the business of the corporation and improve its lands. It prays that the receiver may be empowered to manage and operate the property of the insolvent corporation, which consists in irrigating, improving, and colonizing, or settling, arid lands; and, to the end that the receiver may not be interfered with in the conduct of the business, it prays that the holders of all mortgages prior to the complainants' may be enjoined from foreclosing the same. The amended bill would seem to be founded on the theory that a private corporation conducting any kind of business may, when it becomes insolvent, obtain immunity from the compulsory payment of its debts by procuring a junior mortgagee, or some other creditor, to file a bill alleging the insolvency of the corporation, and praying for the appointment of a receiver with authority to manage and conduct its business. Upon the filing of such a bill, it is supposed to be competent for the court, in addition to appointing a receiver to carry on the business of the corporation, to enjoin its creditors, including the holders of the prior liens on its property, from collecting their debts by due course of law, and to continue such injunction in force so long as the court, in its discretion, sees fit to carry on the business of the insolvent corporation. When a receiver is appointed under such a bill, he usually makes haste, as the receiver did in this case, to assure the court that, if he only had some capital to start on, he could greatly benefit the estate by carrying on the business that bankrupted the corporation. In this case, the company being insolvent, and its property mortgaged for more than it was worth, there was no way of raising money to set the receiver up in business, except by the court giving its obligations, in the form of receiver's certificates, and making them a paramount lien on all the property of the corporation, by displacing the appellants' prior liens thereon. As commonly happens in cases of this character, the receiver, the insolvent corporation, and the junior mortgagee united in urging the court to arm its receiver with the desired powers. They ran no risk in so doing. The corporation was insolvent, and a foreclosure of the prior mortgage would leave the junior mortgagee without any security; so that it had nothing to lose, and everything to gain, in experiments to enhance the value of the mortgaged property, so long as the cost of those experiments was made a prior lien thereon. The effect of the proceeding was to burden the prior mortgagee with the whole cost of the expenditures and experiments made for the betterment of the property on the petition, and for the benefit of the insolvent corporation and the junior mortgagee. The representation is always made, in such cases, that the receiver can carry on the business much more successfully than was done by the insolvent corporation. This commonly proves to be an error. Raht v. Attrill, 106 N. Y. 430, 60 Am. Rep. 456. But, if it were true, it would afford no ground of equitable jurisdiction, for it is not a function of a court of equity to carry on the business of private corporations, whether solvent or insolvent. It is obvious that if the holders of the first mortgages and the other creditors of the insolvent corporation were allowed to proceed, in the customary and lawful mode, to collect their debts, it would put an end to the business of the receiver, and they are therefore enjoined from foreclosing their mortgages or collecting their debts. The chancery court thus assumes, in effect, all the powers and jurisdiction of a court of bankruptcy or insolvency, but without any bankrupt or insolvent law to guide or direct it in the administration of the estate. Its only guide is that varying and unknown quantity called "judicial discretion." The powers claimed for a court of equity in such cases are, indeed, much greater than a court of bankruptcy can exercise. There never was a bankrupt court, under any bankrupt act, authorized, at its discretion, to displace or nullify valid liens on the bankrupt's property, or itself to create liens paramount thereto. The rights of the citizen, lawfully acquired by contract, are under the protection of the Constitution of the United States, and, like the absolute rights of the citizen, are not dependent for their existence or continuance upon the discretion of any court whatever. Constitutional rights and obligations are no more dependent on the discretion of the chancellor than they are on the discretion of the legislature. "Rights," says the Supreme Court of the United States; "under our system of law and procedure, do not rest in the discretionary authority of any officer, judicial or otherwise." Re Parker, 181 U. S. 221, 38 L. ed. 123. If junior lien creditors of an insolvent private corporation could do what has been attempted in this case, every private corporation operating a saw-mill, gristmill, mine, factory, hotel, elevator, irrigating ditches, or carrying on any other business pursuit, would speedily seek the protection of a chancery court, and those courts would soon be conducting the business of all the insolvent private corporations in the country. If it were once settled that a chancery court, through a receiver appointed on the petition of a junior mortgagee, could carry on the business of such insolvent corporations at the risk and expense of those holding the first or prior liens on the property of the corporation, such liens would have little or no value. It is no part of the duty of a court of equity to conduct the business of insolvent private corporations, any more than it is to carry on the business of insolvent natural persons. If it may take under its control the property of an insolvent private corporation, and authorize a receiver to carry on its business, and make the debts incurred by the receiver in so doing paramount liens on all the property of the corporation, and enjoin its creditors in the meantime from collecting their debts, it is not perceived why it may not proceed in the same way with the estate of an insolvent natural person.

Without pursuing the subject further, we refer to what is said, and to the cases cited, in Scott v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 69 Fed. Rep. 17. The order appealed from is void, whether the suit in which it was made is treated as one to foreclose a second mortgage, or as a bill in equity to administer the estate of an insolvent corporation. It was open to the complainant to take and execute a decree foreclosing its second mortgage, and it is good practice in such cases to require this to be done, on pain of dismissing the bill. And if the complainant desired that money be spent, beyond the income of the property, in carrying on the business of the corporation or improving the mortgaged property, it was at liberty to furnish the means for that purpose; but it had no equity to ask that the expense and the hazards of doing so should be saddled on the first mortgagee, and the court had no jurisdiction or power to place it there.

Taxes are the first and paramount lien on all property, and must be paid. When taxes are due on property in the hands of a receiver, and he has no funds to pay them, the court will authorize him to borrow money for that purpose, and make the obligation given for the money so borrowed a prior lien on the property on which the taxes were due. This is not fixing a new or additional lien on the property, or displacing any prior lien. It is simply changing the form of the lien from one for taxes to one for money borrowed to pay the taxes.

The order and decree of the Circuit Court appealed from, which authorizes the receiver to borrow money to "be used and applied by said receiver for the purpose of preserving the property of the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company in his possession and custody, and carrying out and maintaining the contracts of the company, now in existence, under and by which the company has heretofore sold tracts of land to various parties, which said contracts are referred to in the report of said receiver, and for such other purposes as are set out in said petition with reference to the maintenance, preservation, and protection of the property of the company," and which authorizes the receiver to issue his certificates of indebtedness for the money borrowed for these purposes, and makes such certificates of indebtedness the first and paramount lien "upon all the property, rights, and franchises now owned or controlled by the said Denver Land & Water-Storage Company," is void, in so far as it makes the certificates issued by the receiver a first and paramount lien on the lands embraced in the mortgages of the appellants, and is therefore reversed.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

FIDELITY & CASUALTY COMPANY,

Appt.,
v.

Georgiana JOHNSON.

((.....Miss.....))

1. An application to compel the attendance of a witness, which will delay the trial, is properly refused where the attempt would be idle because he is without the jurisdiction of the court and beyond the reach of its process.

2. Death by hanging at the hands of a mob is an accident within the meaning of a policy against injuries through "external, violent, and accidental means."

I. Definitions; general rules.

An accident is the happening of an event without the aid and the design of the person, and which is unforeseen. Paul v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 112 N. Y. 472, 8 L. R. A. 448; North West. Com. Travellers' Assn. v. London Guarantee & Acco. Co. 10 Manitoba L. Rep. 587.

An accident is also defined to be "an event happening without the concurrence of the will of the" 30 L. R. A. person by whose agency it was caused. North West. Com. Travellers' Assn. v. London Guarantee & Acco. Co. supra.

Any event which takes place without the foresight or expectation of the person acted upon or affected by the event is an accident, within the meaning of an insurance policy. Ibid. Richards v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 90 Cal. 170; Ripley v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 2 Big. L. & Acc. Ins. Rep. 722, affirmed on other grounds, 58 U. S. 16 Wall. 520, 21 L. ed. 469.

The term "accidental" as used in an insurance policy is to be taken in its ordinary, popular sense, as meaning, "happening by chance, unexpectedly taking place, not according to the usual course of things, or not expected." Dosier v. Fidelity & Casualty Co. 46 Fed. Rep. 444, 13 L. R. A. 114; United States Mut. Acc. Assn. v. Barry. 131 U. S. 100, 33 L. ed. 60, affirming Barry v. United States Mut. Acc. Assn. 23 Fed. Rep. 712.

Some violence, casualty, or vis major is necessarily involved in an accident. Sinclair v. Maritime Pass. Assur. Co. 3 El. & El. 478, 30 L. J. Q. B. 77, 7 Jur. N. S. 367, 4 L. T. N. S. 15, 9 Week. Rep. 342.

An accident, within the meaning of an insurance

The insurance was against bodily injuries sustained through external, violent, and accidental means. The premium was to be paid in four monthly instalments by giving an order on the paymaster of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, by which corporation the insured was employed. The insured was hanged by a mob, and this action was brought on the policy.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. A. C. McNair for appellant.

Messrs. W. B. Mixon and J. B. Sternberger for appellee.

Woods, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There was no error in the court's action in overruling the appellant's application to compel the attendance of appellee's witness Barnes in open court. Section 1756, Code 1892, provides for the procuring the attendance in open court of a witness whose deposition has been taken by the opposing party. The language of the section is as follows: "Depositions taken, certified, and returned in pursuance of law shall be admissible as evidence in the cause, but when the deposition of any witness shall be taken, the party against whom the witness was examined may procure the attendance of such witness at the trial of the cause, and may put the witness on the stand in open court as the witness of the party who procured his deposition, and may cross-examine him as the witness of such party, who shall be entitled to re-examine the witness in open court; but the party procuring such oral examination shall be liable for all the costs thereof." At the time this motion was made, and by the court overruled, Barnes was, and for a long while had been, living in New Orleans, La. He was without the jurisdiction of the court, and beyond the reach of its process. The attempt to procure his attendance then and there would have been futile and vain, and the court properly refused to delay the trial of the case, and to make this idle attempt to do a thing which was plainly impossible. The statute has no reference to such case.

It is contended that payment of dues to the paymaster of the Illinois Central Railroad was not payment to the Casualty Company, and that it was incumbent on appellee to prove payment of dues by the insured to the paymaster, and then to follow this up and prove payment by the paymaster to the Casualty Company. This is a mistaken view. The seventh condition in the indorsement on the policy of insurance is as follows: "(7) In case the assured shall fail to leave in the hands of the paymaster the instalments of premium as agreed in said order [that is, the order of the assured on the paymaster to retain the instalments out of the assured's wages], this policy shall be void." The as-policy, is not less an accident because of the negligence of the person injured. Champlin v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 6 La. 71; Freeman v. Travellers' Ins. Co. 144 Mass. 573.

But injury to the arm of a passenger who inadvertently puts it out of a car window while the train is running at its usual speed was held, in Morci v. Mississippi Valley L. Ins. Co. 4 Bash, 585, to be due to the fault of the passenger himself, and therefore not covered by a policy of insurance against railway accidents.

There is no discussion by the opinion in this case of the doctrine of negligence of the insured as affecting insurance, and the decision is believed to be contrary to the almost unanimous decisions in insurance cases of all kinds.

While the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff in an action upon an accident policy to make out a case, it is generally held that there is a presumption that an unexplained personal injury is accidental. But the authorities on this point have not been here collected.

II. Intentional injuries.

a. Self-inflicted.

Cutting one's own throat while insane without knowing the result and not intending thereby to kill oneself constitutes "death by external, violent, and accidental means," within the meaning of a policy. Blackstone v. Standard Life & Acc. Ins. Co. 74 Mich. 592, 3 L. R. A. 486.

So, the shooting by which a person takes his own life must be regarded as the result of accident, if it was done when insane, with unconsciousness that the act would take his life. Mut. Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Davies, 87 Ky. 541.

Death caused by accidentally taking and drinking poison is from "external, violent, and accidental means." Healey v. Mutual Acc. Assn. 138 Ill. 556, 9 L. R. A. 371, reversing 35 Ill. App. 17; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Dunlap, 69 Ill. App. 515; Metropolitan Acc. Assn. v. Froidland, Id. 522; Mutual Acc. Assn. v. Tuggie, 39 Ill. App. 503, reversed on another point, 30 L. R. A.

126 Ill. 423; Hill v. Hartford Acc. Ins. Co. 22 Hun, 187; Ingersoll v. Knights of Golden Rule, 47 Fed. Rep. 272.

A mistake in taking an overdose of opium causing death, when opiates had been prescribed to induce sleep, was held to be by other than "external, violent, and accidental means." That such death was accidental is not denied by the court, but it is said that violence is not an ingredient in the act. Bayless v. Travellers' Ins. Co. 14 Blatchf. 143.

In numerous other cases the question of liability for self-inflicted injuries has been considered under a provision excluding liability for death by "suicide," "by one's own hand," "by poison," "by self-inflicted injuries," or similar provisions. So far as such cases turn on the proviso, concerning the accidental character of the injury, they are not here considered.

b. Inflicted by others.

The doctrine of LOVELACE v. TRAVELLERS' PROT. ASSO. OF AMERICA AND FIDELITY & C. CO. v. JOHNSON is sustained by nearly all the decisions.

Death caused by the wrongful act of another person, although intentional, may be accidental so far as the insured is concerned, within the meaning of the policy. Warner v. United States Mut. Acc. Assn. 8 Utah, 431.

An injury not anticipated or expected by the insured, though intentionally inflicted by another, is an accidental injury, within the meaning of an insurance policy. Accident Ins. Co. v. Bennett, 90 Tenn. 256.

So, a blow intentionally struck by another person is accidental within the meaning of an insurance policy against accidents. Richards v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 89 Cal. 170.

So, intentional shooting in an affray is an accident, within the meaning of an insurance policy, so far as concerns the person shot. Supreme Council O. of C. F. v. Garrigus, 104 Ind. 133, 54 Am. Rep. 298.

The same is decided in Robinson v. United States Mut. Acc. Assn. 68 Fed. Rep. 325. In this case it assured's duty as to the payment was fully performed when he left the instalment in the hands of the paymaster.

The court refused to charge the jury for appellant as asked in its 12th instruction. This instruction reads as follows: "If the jury believes from the evidence in this case that John Johnson came to his death by the hands of a mob, his death was not the result of an accident, and this case is not within the terms and conditions of the policy sued on, and the jury will find for defendant." By the terms of the policy, indemnity against "bodily injuries sustained through external, violent, and accidental means" was secured by the insured. That Johnson came to his death by external and violent means is not denied; but death by hanging at the hands of a mob, it is said by appellant's counsel, is foreign to our preconceived ideas as to what constitutes an accident. According to lexicographers, an accident is a sudden, unforeseen, and unexpected event. It has been held by courts, adopting this or any similar definition, that, where a man was killed by robbers, this was a case of death by accident, in the sense in which that word is used in accident insurance policies. So, too, it has been held that death from a blow struck by one who has attempted to blackmail the assured was an accident covered by an accident insurance policy.

In these and all like cases in which death occurs by violent means, external to the man, and against or without intention or concurrence of will on the part of the man, death may probably be called an accident. A learned and laborious writer states the true rule for determining whether injuries are accidental. With great simplicity, clearness, and strength, Biddle says: "An injury may be said objectively to be accidental, though subjectively it is not; and, if it occurs without the agency of the insured, it may logically be termed accidental, though it was brought about designedly by another person." See Biddle on Insurance, and the numerous cases cited by him in his elaborate consideration of this subject in his chapter 10, vol. 2, beginning at page 780. See, too, 2 Bacon, Ben. Soc. chap. 15, and the many cases there cited. There is, upon authority, hardly room for controversy as to the rightfulness of the action of the court below in refusing to charge the jury that death by hanging at the hands of a mob was not an accident.

There is evidence to support the verdict, and we are not authorized to substitute another finding, more in consonance with our views of the testimony, for that of the jury, which rests upon sufficient proof. We find no reversible error, and the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

was found that the victim was unarmed and had made no menacing gestures at the time he was shot, and the court regarded him as the victim of the nervous apprehension of the person who shot him.

That a person waylaid and killed by robbers meets death by violent and accidental means within the meaning of an insurance policy was declared by Withey, J., in the United States district court for the western district of Michigan in the case of Ripley v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 2 Rlg. L. & Acc. Ins. Rep. 738, but recovery in the case was denied as the policy covered accidents only "while traveling by public or private conveyance," and the robbery was committed while the insured was walking, after leaving a steamer, to finish his journey, of which about 8 miles remained. It was held that while thus walking he was not traveling by public or private conveyance, and the decision on this question was confirmed in 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 236, 21 L. ed. 469.

The doctrine of the above cases is also recognized, either expressly or by implication, in nearly all the cases found infra, II. c. Proviso against liability for intentional injuries.

But as an exception to these cases, it was held, on the other hand, in American Acc. Co. v. Carson (Ky.) 80 S. W. Rep. 879, that wounds inflicted upon an officer by a person resisting arrest were not incurred through accidental means. But a further provision in the policy against liability for intentional injuries is another ground of the decision.

e. Proviso against liability for intentional injuries.

While injuries intentionally inflicted by an assault constitute an accident so far as the person injured is concerned, if he did not expect or voluntarily bring on the assault, such injuries give no right of action on a policy stipulating against intentional injuries inflicted by the insured or any other person. Phelan v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 38 Mo. App. 640. A brief in this case cites to the same effect an unreported decision of Judge Thayer as circuit judge in St. Louis, Feb. 17, 1887, in the case of Schreck v. Insurance Co.

So in De Graw v. National Acc. Soc. 51 Hun, 142, it was held that wounds inflicted upon a person in a felonious assault are included among the "intentional injuries inflicted by the insured or any other person" which are excluded from the indemnity of an accident policy.

A stipulation against liability for "intentional injuries inflicted by the insured or any other person" will defeat any liability for death caused by the intentional act of another person, and the intention of the insured is immaterial. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. McCarthy, 15 Colo. 85, 11 L. R. A. 297; Fischer v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 77 Cal. 248, 1 L. R. A. 572.

Such is the doctrine established by all the cases.

Thus, murder is within a proviso against liability for "intentional injuries inflicted by the insured or any other person. Hutchcraft v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 87 Ky. 301; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. McConkey, 127 U. S. 651, 33 L. ed. 308.

The intentional killing of a deputy sheriff by a resisting prisoner will not sustain a recovery on a policy for accidental injuries which provides that it shall not cover "intentional injuries" inflicted on the insured by any other person. American Acc. Co. v. Carson (Ky.) 80 S. W. Rep. 879.

So, a proviso against liability for death as "the result of design either on the part of the insured or of any other person" does not apply to the shooting of a person by an officer seeking to arrest him, if he did not design to shoot him or know the identity of the man he was shooting. Utter v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 85 Mich. 545.

Death caused by a fight, although conceded to be accidental, is held to be excluded from a policy by a provision against liability for death caused by fighting, even if the slayer was insane, where both parties voluntarily engaged in the fight. Gresham v. Equitable Acc. Ins. Co. 87 Ga. 497, 13 L. R. A. 683.

To similar effect, a person who fell and caught the thumb of his hand on a chair, and thereby injured it, while engaged in a fight, although the other party was the aggressor, cannot recover under an accident policy stipulating against liability for injuries caused directly or indirectly, wholly or APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the St. Louis Circuit Court in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of accident insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Henry T. Kent for appellant.

Mr. Valle Rayburn, for respondent:

In construing the benefit certificate issued by defendant, and its constitution and by-laws applicable thereto, a liberal construction favorable to plaintiff should be adopted.

The death of Lovelace was by accident, and not from natural causes, in contemplation of law, and within the language of the membership certificate as defined by the provisions of defendant's constitution.

Barclay, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action upon a benefit certificate, in the nature of an insurance policy, issued to Charles H. Lovelace by the Travelers' Protective Association of America, the defendant, a benevolent association incorporated under in part, by fighting. United States Mut. Acc. Asso. v. Millard, 48 Ill. App. 143.

III. Accident and disease.

a. Distinguished.

Death resulting from malignant pustule caused by contact with putrid animal matter containing bacteria of the kind known as "bacilli anthrax" is death from disease, and not from accidental means, within the meaning of an accident policy. Bacon v. United States Mut. Acc. Asso. 123 N. Y. 304, 9 L. R. A. 617, reversing 44 Hun, 569.

Sunstroke or heat-prostration causing the death of a supervising architect is a disease, and not an accident, within the meaning of an insurance policy. Dodier v. Fidelity & Casualty Co. 46 Fed. Rep. 446, 13 L. R. A. 114.

So, it was held in Sinclair v. Maritime Pass. Assur. Co. 3 Bl. & El. 473, 30 L. J. Q. B. 77, 7 Jur. N. S. 367, 4 L. T. N. S. 15, 9 Week. Rep. 342, that death caused by sunstroke while a person is engaged in the performance of his regular business does not arise from accident. This was the case of the master of a vessel insured against "accident at sea," and his death occurred on the southwest coast of India. But the question was decided with respect to the character of the disease called "sunstroke," and not with any reference to the fact that it was on shipboard or while at sea.

On conflicting testimony as to whether death was caused by a hurt or by typhoid fever, it was found by the jury in Standard L. & Acc. Ins. Co. v. Thomas, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 593, that it was the result of accident.

See also, on this subject, the cases of Southard v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co.; Clidero v. Scottish Acc. Ins. Co.; Cobb v. Preferred Mut. Acc. Asso.; and McCarthy v. Travelers' Ins. Co., in IV. infra.

b. Accident caused by disease.

Drowning in a brook while in an epileptic fit is within a policy covering death by "accidental, external, and visible means," although it excludes death "from natural disease or weakness or exhaustion consequent upon disease." Winspear v. Accident Ins. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 43, 50 L. J. Q. B. 232, 43 L. T. N. S. 459, 29 Week. Rep. 116, 45 J. P. 110, 30 L. R. A.

But death by drowning, which ensues upon a fall into the water which is caused by disease, although it is an accidental death, will not sustain a cause of action on a policy which stipulates against liability for death caused, either directly or indirectly, by disease. Manufacturers' Acc. Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan, 58 Fed. Rep. 945, 22 L. R. A. 620.

A person who fell without apparent external cause, and struck his forehead violently upon the floor, while his heart and brain are shown to have been much diseased is held to be within the exception of a policy against liability for death or disability caused wholly or in part by bodily infirmities or disease. Sharpe v. Commercial Travelers' Mut. Acc. Asso. 129 Ind. 92.

So, death by falling in a fit in front of a moving train is caused by accident, and covered by an accident policy which insures against accidental injuries, and it is not a case within an exception in the policy against liability for death "arising from fits . . . whether consequent upon such accidental injury or not," whether such death results "directly or jointly with such accidental injury." Lawrence v. Accidental Ins. Co. L. R. 7 Q. B. Div. 216, 50 L. J. Q. B. 522, 45 L. T. N. S. 29, 29 Week. Rep. 802, 45 J. P. 731.

That an injury from a fall due to a temporary and unexpected disorder is caused by violent, external, and accidental means within the meaning of a policy of insurance confining liability to injuries so caused, is also declared in the late case of Meyer v. Fidelity & Casualty Co. (Iowa) 65 N. W. Rep. 323.

c. Disease caused by accident.

Death from apoplexy resulting from an effusion of blood caused by a concussion or contusion of the brain produced by a fall is within an accident policy. Hall v. American Masonic Acc. Asso. 86 Wis. 518; National Ben. Asso. v. Grauman, 107 Ind. 283.

Death from blood poisoning as a result of the inoculation of some substance into a wound at the time of an accident causing the wound is the result of such accident, within the meaning of an insurance policy. Martin v. Equitable Acc. Asso. 61 Hun. 467.

Death caused by embolism or thrombus, which the laws of Missouri. The pleadings need not be recited. No point is raised touching the formal presentation of the case. Counsel for both parties, with commendable frankness and brevity, have put the material facts into compact form to facilitate the solution of the controversy. It was submitted to the trial judge, without a jury, upon an agreed statement and depositions. The only question now urged is a question of law. Mr. Lovelace was a member in good standing in the defendant association when he met with his death, August 8, 1892. The plaintiff is his mother, the beneficiary in his membership certificate. The contract of insurance is contained in the certificate, and in parts of the constitution of the association, which, counsel mutually agree, control the issue of the litigation. In the statement introducing the report of the case, copies of these documents are given. No point is raised touching proofs of loss, notice, or any formal matter. The defendant meets the case broadly on its merits. The decisive question before us is, Was the death of the assured an "accident," within the true meaning of the contract of insurance? The question was presented by an instruction that, under the evidence, plaintiff was not entitled to recover, which the trial court refused to give. On the contrary, the court found for the plaintiff, and gave judgment accordingly for $4,119.30 (which included some interest). Defendant then appealed, after the usual preliminaries.

The following facts show the circumstances of the death of Mr. Lovelace: He was a commercial traveler. On the 5th day of August, 1892, he came as a guest to the hotel in Hazel-hurst, Miss. He was a friend of the proprietor, and spoke to some member of the latter's family on the porch of the hotel before entering the office. Another man named Graves was in the office of the hotel, making more or less noise, and cursing at times, when Lovelace arrived, about half past 11 o'clock at night. The only witness besides Graves who saw the killing was one Scott. From his testimony it seems that that night the proprietor, Mr. Brown, was sick, and there was no one in charge of the office. Scott was putting in the chairs from the porch, when Lovelace walked in and said, "Who has got charge of the office to-night?" Scott answered, "No one," and that he was going to bed. Lovelace then said, "It looks like somebody ought to be about it," and Lovelace then turned to Graves, and said, "Look here, young man, you have got to get out of here, drinking and cursing that way," and Graves replied, "What have you got to do with it?" Lovelace answered, "I am a guest at the hotel, and I think a heap of the family; and I think in the absence of Mr. Brown, it is sorter my duty to see after things." Graves said, "You had better put me out." Lovelace replied, "I will do it in a pair of minutes," and Graves said, with an oath, he would like to see him (Lovelace) put him out. Lovelace said, "I will do that — quick." Scott then walked between them, and separated them; Lovelace started up stairs, but it seems that he turned again, and went back to the register. Lovelace then said with an oath, "Don't you shake your hand in my face." (Graves had made a gesture which Lovelace interpreted as he stated.) They were then a few feet apart.

was the direct result of the breaking of an arm by accident, is a death caused by accidental means. Peck v. Equitable Acc. Asso. 52 Hun, 255.

Where an angular draw-bar of several hundred pounds' weight fell upon a sensitive and delicate portion of one's person, bearing him down to the earth and hurting him, although he did not leave work until night, but became seriously ill during the night, it was held, in Owens v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (Marion Co. Super. Ct. Ind.) 12 Ins. L. J. 75, that the accident was the cause of the illness and resulting death.

Death from erysipelas resulting from an accidental injury is within an accident policy covering death of which an accident was the proximate and sole cause, and is not within an exception of death "directly or indirectly in consequence of disease, nor . . . wholly or in part by bodily infirmities or disease." Accident Ins. Co. v. Young, 20 Can. S. C. 280, 12 Can. L. T. 217, affirming on this point. Young v. Accident Ins. Co. Mont. L. Rep. 6 Super. Ct. 3.

But an accident policy does not cover death from erysipelas caused by a wound, where the policy contains a clause excluding liability for death from "rheumatism, gout, hernia, erysipelas, or any other disease of secondary cause arising within the system of the insured before or at the time or following such accidental injury, whether causing such death directly or jointly with such accidental injury." Smith v. Accident Ins. Co. L. R. 5 Exch. 802, 39 L. J. Exch. 211, 23 L. T. N. S. 861, 18 Week. Rep. 1107.

Death from hernia caused by a violent accident in striking against the knob of a door while running is within an accident policy, and not within an exception of death "wholly or partially, directly or indirectly, from . . . hernia." Miner v. 80 L. R. A.

Travelers' Ins. Co. 3 Ohio Dec. 239, 2 Ohio N. P. 108.

So, it is held in Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Murray, 16 Colo. 296, that death from hernia resulting from accident is within an accident policy, though it makes an exception of death or disability from hernia.

So, in England death from hernia caused by external violence is within a policy insuring against accidental injuries, and is not within an exception of death from hernia, erysipelas, etc., or "any other disease or cause arising within the system of the insured before or at the time of or following such accidental injury (whether causing death or disability, directly or jointly with such accidental injury)." Fitton v. Accidental Death Ins. Co. 17 Q. B. N. S. 122, 34 L. J. C. P. 23.

Pneumonia caused by taking cold while confined to bed as the result of an accident, when this would not have resulted if the person had been in a normal state of health, is regarded as the effect of the accident. Isitt v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 504.

An accident causing peritonitis which results in death is within a policy limiting liability to cases where an injury is the proximate cause of death, even if the insured was very liable to a recurrence of the disease by reason of former attacks. Freeman v. Mercantile Mut. Acc. Asso. 156 Mass. 851, 17 L. R. A. 755. See also note on "Proximate Cause of Death within the Meaning of a Life Insurance Policy," with this case in 17 L. R. A. 753.

But death from typhoid fever supervening upon an accidental injury is not within the protection of a policy which denies liability except where the injury is the proximate and sole cause of death. Whitehouse v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (U. S. C. C. N. H.) 7 Ins. L. J. 23. This case seems hardly reconcilable with the others.

Graves replied, "You put me out. You have not got any more to do with this than I have." Lovelace then declared he would slap Graves, and applied an opprobrious epithet to him. Lovelace then slapped and pushed Graves back until the latter struck the wall or door, which was closed; and, while they were thus together, Graves drew a pistol from his pocket, and shot Lovelace several times, in consequence of which he afterward died. Lovelace weighed 175 pounds. He would have pushed Graves, who was much lighter and smaller, out of the door, if it had been open. Lovelace did not know Graves at the time. The next day he asked what boy that was that shot him.

The foregoing gives a sufficient description of the scene, as defendant claims it occurred. The substance of the contention on that side is that Mr. Lovelace lost his life at the hands of Graves in a fight with the latter, brought on by the language and acts of the former. It was not claimed, however, that Lovelace knew that Graves was armed when the difficulty began. The defendant asserts that "it is not an accidental killing, such as to make the defendant liable, where the death was the result of a rencounter, or where the party killed was the voluntary agent in bringing on the difficulty resulting in his death, or placed himself in such a position as to induce it." On the other hand, the plaintiff insists that the occurrence was an "accident." The contract in this case is to be interpreted so as to give effect to the intention of the parties, as expressed by the language they have used. That intention is, moreover, to be construed as the reasonable and natural one imported by their words.

A pistol wound causing tetanus with great bodily pain and delirium or fever may be found to be the proximate cause of death, where a person insured against accidents, excluding suicide, sane or insane, and intentional injuries, cuts his throat in a period of delirium or uncontrollable frenzy. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Melick, 65 Fed. Rep. 173, 27 L. R. A. 629.

On the other hand, death by suicide while insane, when the insanity was caused by a prior accidental fall and injury, is too remote to be regarded as caused by accident. Streeter v. Western U. Mut. L. & Acc. Soc. 65 Mich. 190.

So, where one took poison while insane as the result of an accident several months before, it was held that his death was not the proximate result of the accident so as to make the insurer liable on an accident policy. Harris v. Travelers' Ins. Co. Chicago Super. Ct. 1868, cited in 7 Am. L. Rev. 589.

d. Disease aggravated by accident.

An accident policy covering total disability only gives no right of action, where an injury within the terms of the policy caused only partial disability until it was aggravated by a subsequent injury, which was not covered by the policy. Rhodes v. Railway Pass. Ins. Co. 5 Lana. 71.

The death of a person resulting from a fall, when death would not have resulted if he had not had gall-stones, is not covered by a policy which excludes death "accelerated or promoted by any disease or bodily infirmity, or any natural cause arising within the system of the assured, whether accelerated by accident or not." Cawley v. National Employers' Assn. & Gen. Assur. Assn. 1 Cal. & El. 597.

Where a person subject to kidney disease met with an accident when free from any active symp-

Rutherford, Inst. 2d Am. ed. p. 418. "In case of death by accident," is the language immediately in view. In the same contract we note that the defendant was to pay $100 "in case of his death from natural causes." The form of the contract is very simple. It is free from those limiting terms which, in two of the three cases cited by the defendant, formed the basis of the judgments therein. We are merely called on to say whether his death was by "accident," within the intention of these parties. They did not define the term, further than its use in contradistinction to "death from natural causes" may be considered as having some significance. We hence should give the word its usual, natural, and popular meaning,—there being nothing to indicate a different purpose in its use. In that sense, was Lovelace's death an accident? We find the following definitions of "accident" in the law dictionaries: "Death by accident means death from any unexpected event which happens as by chance, or which does not take place according to the usual course of things." Anderson (1889). "An unusual or unexpected event." Abbott (1879). "An unforeseen event, occurring without the will or design of the person whose mere act causes it; an unexpected, unusual, or undesigned occurrence." Black (1891). "An event which, under the circumstances, is unusual, and unexpected by the person to whom it happens." Bouvier (1883). "A casualty; an act of Providence; an event that takes place without one's foresight or expectation." Burrill (1887). "An extraordinary incident; something not expected."

toms of the disease, which returned again about five weeks after the accident, it was held that there was no proof that the accident was the cause of his death resulting from the disease. McKechnie v. Scottish Assn. Ins. Co. 17 Sess. Cas. (S. C.) 6, cited in note in 1 Beach on Insurance, § 222. What seems to be the same case is a little more fully presented in 2 Bacon on Benefit Societies, pp. 989, 990, and cited as Anderson v. Scottish Ins. Co. 27 Scott. L. Rep. 20, where it appears that the policy contained a provision against liability for death arising from natural disease, although accelerated by accident.

A wound produced by an accident, which causes one to fall into the water and drown, makes a case of accidental death. Mallory v. Travelers' Ins. Co. supra.

Wharton Law Lex. (1888). The larger dictionaries of the English language furnish these, among other, definitions of "accident," viz.: "In general, anything that happens or begins to be without design or as an unforeseen effect.

Specifically, an undesirable or unfortunate happening; . . . a casualty or mishap." Century (1899). "Literally, a befalling; an event that takes place without one's foresight or expectation; an undesigned, sudden, and unexpected event; . . . often an undesigned and unforeseen occurrence of an afflictive or unfortunate character; a casualty; a mishap; as, to die by an accident." Webster, International (1892). "An event proceeding from an unknown cause, or happening without the design of the agent; an unforeseen event; incident; casualty; chance." Worcester (1888). On several occasions the courts have approved or quoted some of the foregoing definitions in dealing with the subject of accident insurance. Schneider v. Provident L. Ins. Co. (1869) 24 Wis. 80, 1 Am. Rep. 157; Providence L. Ins. & Invest. Co. v. Martin (1869) 82 Md. 815; Ripley v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. (1870) 2 Big. L. & Acc. Ins. Rep. Cas. 741, Fed. Cas. No. 11,854; North American L. & Acc. Ins. Co. v. Burroughs (1871) 69 Pa. 51, 8 Am. Rep. 712; Supreme Council O. of C. F. v. Garrigus (1885) 104 Ind. 140, 54 Am. Rep. 298. In other cases they have freely used the word in decisions, in the broad meaning which those definitions express. Vincent v. Stinehour (1835) 7 Vt. 62, 29 Am. Rep. 145; Bostwick v. Stiles (1868) 35 Conn. 195; Clements v. London & N. W. R. Co. [1894] 2 Q. B. 482. Some special cases on accident policies, different from that now before us, furnish, nevertheless, opinions of learned judges which cast some useful light on the present controversy. In Sinclair v. Maritime Pass. Assur. Co. (1861) 4 L. T. N. S. 15, a case wherein the court of queen's bench denied a right of recovery for death caused by a sunstroke sustained by the master of a ship in China, holding that such death was not "a personal injury arising from an accident at sea," it was said by Chief Justice Cockburn: "It is difficult to define the term 'accident,' as used in a policy of this nature, so as to arrive with perfect accuracy at the boundary line between death from accident and death from natural causes. At the same time we think we may safely assume that in the term 'accident,' as so used, some violence, casualty, or vis major, is necessarily involved." In Fennick v. Schmalz (1868) L. R. 3 C. P. 33, Willes, J., held that a snowstorm was not an accident (as mentioned in a charter party), because it is one of the ordinary operations of nature. He said it "is an incident, rather than accident." He then remarked: "An accident is not the same as an occurrence, but is something that happens out of the ordinary course of things." In Ripley v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. (1870), already cited, it is said: "In the more popular and common acceptance of the word, 'accident,' if not in its precise meaning, includes any event which takes place without the foresight or expectation of the person acted upon or affected by the event." Death by drowning (Winspear v. Accident Ins. Co. (1880) L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 42), and by fright (McGlinchey v. Fidelity

But a person found dead in a plunge bath in which the water was from 4 to 5 feet deep, and about 8 or 10 feet square, and at a temperature of more than 100 degrees, was held, in Tennant v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 31 Fed. Rep. 322, to have died from other causes than "external, violent, and accidental means," where he was a heavy drinker of intoxicating liquors, and the evidence showed that such a bath would be likely to bring on an epileptic fit, as he was subject to such fits. Whether this could be called an accident or not is not decided, as under the policy death must be caused by means which were also external and violent.

The rupture of the tympanum of an ear by the external violence of the water in diving is an accidental injury resulting from violent and external causes. Rodey v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 8 N. M. 316.

The death of a person by freezing on a prairie in consequence of the accidental breaking down of his vehicle, together with the sudden and unexpected change of the weather to great severity, is a death by external, violent, and accidental means. North West Com. Travellers' Assn. v. London Guarantee & Acc. Co. 10 Manitoba L. Rep. 537.

Death caused by choking on food which, in an attempt to swallow it, accidentally passes into the windpipe, is due to "external, violent, and accidental means." American Acc. Co. v. Reigart, 54 Ky. 547, 21 L. R. A. 661.

Death from asphyxia occasioned by deadly gas in a shallow well, into which one descends to fix a pump, is caused by "external, violent, and accidental means." Pickett v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 144 Pa. 79, 13 L. R. A. 661.

Death from the inhalation of illuminating gas while asleep, without any intention to commit suicide, is due to "external, violent, and accidental means." Paul v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 112 N. Y. 472, 3 L. R. A. 443, affirming 45 Hun, 313, 80 L. R. A.

Cases as to the effect of provisos against liability for inhaling gas, taking poison, etc., are not included here.

A rupture on the loin caused by jumping in great haste from a railroad car at a station, going to another depot and coming back in haste, running part of the way, is not caused by accident within the meaning of an insurance policy, when there was no stumbling, slipping, or falling or anything accidental in the movements of the person. Southard v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 24 Conn. 574. (Decision by Judge Shipman of the U. S. Dist. Ct. as arbitrator.)

Where a person on rising from bed and while in the act of putting on his stockings felt something give way inside, and died shortly afterwards, when examination showed that his colon had fallen out of place and become folded causing great distention and resulting pressure upon the heart, stopping its action, it was held that his death was not caused by "violent, accidental, external, and visible means," and within the opinion of Lord Adam the death was not accidental within the meaning of the policy. Cliedero v. Scottish Acc. Ins. Co. 29 Scott. L. Rep. 303. (Quoted at some length in Beach on Insurance, § 248.)

Injury to the retina of one's eye by rupture caused by carrying heavy baggage on a warm day is not effected by "external, violent, and accidental means," where there was nothing unusual in the transaction except the result to the eye. Cobb v. Preferred Mut. Acc. Assn. (Ga.) 22 S. E. Rep. 976.

Whether the rupture of a blood vessel while exercising with Indian clubs was due to "external, violent, and accidental means" was held, in McCarthy v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 8 Bias. 362, to depend on the question whether or not any unforeseen, accidental, or involuntary movement of the body, or any unforeseen or unexpected circumstances, in-

& O. Co. (1888) 80 Me. 251) have been held to be deaths by accident under policies of much narrower scope than that now before the court.

We have quoted these various cases, definitions, and comments, not with a view to approve or criticize any one of them, but to indicate the very wide range of meaning borne by the word "accident," when unaccompanied with any limitation in the context. We shall not attempt to furnish any general definition of an accident in the particular case before us, further than the conclusion we shall announce may imply. The learned counsel for defendant concedes the force of the argument deduced from the ordinary meanings of the word, but insists that they cannot apply where the insured has voluntarily assumed the risk which proves to be fatal,—in this instance by entering into the altercation which led to his death. But there is one weak point in that contention. There is no proof whatever that the insured had any cause or reasonable ground to anticipate that he would be shot or killed when he undertook to attempt to eject Graves from the hotel. There is no proof that Graves exhibited a weapon, or made any remarks indicating a purpose to shoot, before the affray. The mere fact that Lovelace engaged in or brought on a fight in the manner described did not of itself indicate that he sought death, or had reason to expect it as a consequence of his action. In Schneider v. Provident L. Ins. Co. (1869) 24 Wis. 28, 1 Am. Rep. 157, a party was allowed to recover upon an accident policy, though it appeared he had been negligent in attempting to board a moving train of cars. The court said: "There is nothing in the definition of the word 'accident' that excludes the negligence of the injured party as one of the elements contributing to produce the result. . . . An accident may happen from an unknown cause; but it is not essential that the cause should be unknown. It may be an unusual result of a known cause, and therefore unexpected by the party. And such was the case here, conceding that the negligence of the deceased was the cause of the accident." Page 80. That decision was approvingly followed in the case from the 82 Md. report already cited. In Keene v. New England Mut. Acc. Assn. (1894) 161 Mass. 149, a recovery on an accident policy was sustained where the assured was run down while passing over a street crossing of a railway track in front of a moving freight car, notwithstanding the policy required the assured to "use all due diligence for personal safety." In Cornish v. Accident Ins. Co. (1889) L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 453, it appeared that the insured met his death by attempting, in broad daylight, to cross the main line of a railway in front of a coming train, which struck and killed him. The English court of appeal held that there could be no recovery upon a policy which excepted, from the risks insured against, accidents happening by "exposure of the insured to obvious risk of injury." But Lindley, L. J. (who delivered the leading opinion) placed the ruling upon the language just quoted, remarking, in so doing: "We accept the view of the jury that this accident may be called an 'ordinary misadventure,' but the question is whether the policy covers it." He thus characterized the mishap as an "accident," notwithstanding the gross negligence of the insured. In Travelers' Ins. Co. v. McConkey (1888) 127 U. S. 661, 32 L. ed. 808, where the insured had been killed by a shot (whether fired by himself or by another was in issue), the Supreme Court of the United States terfered with the exercise, thereby producing the result. If the bursting of the blood vessel resulted merely from the exercise in the ordinary way it was held to be the result of disease and not of accident.

But death from an accidental strain while pitching hay or from an accidental blow from a pitchfork handle is within an accident policy. North American L. & Acc. Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 69 Pa. 43, 8 Am. Rep. 212.

Dislocation of the cartilage of the knee in stooping is within an accident insurance policy against any bodily injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means, and excepting injuries arising from natural disease, or weakness, or exhaustion consequent upon disease, when the insured before the accident has not suffered from weakness of the knee or knee joint. Hamllyn v. Crown Acc. Ins. Co. [1885] 1 Q. B. 750.

The death of a person which occurred about an hour after his horse had been frightened and ran, and was brought under control after running a considerable distance, is regarded as due to "external, violent, and accidental means," whether it resulted from fright or from the exertion. McGinchey v. Fidelity & Casualty Co. 80 Me. 251.

Injury to the spine, caused by lifting a heavy burden in the course of business, is within the provisions of a policy of insurance against injury arising from accident, if occasioned by any external or material cause. Martin v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 1 Fost. & F. 605.

A person killed in jumping from a car from which other persons jumped safely at the same time may be held by the jury to have met death by accident, as an injury results through accidental means if there is anything unforeseen, unexpected, or unusual in the act which precedes it. United States Mut. Acc. Assn. v. Barry, 121 U. S. 100, 32 L. ed. 60, affirming Barry v. United States Mut. Acc. Assn. 23 Fed. Rep. 712.

Injury while getting from the platform upon moving cars was also held accidental in Schneider v. Provident L. Ins. Co. 24 Wis. 28, 1 Am. Rep. 157.

The death of a yard switchman or a yard brakeman while handling broken cars in the performance of his service is an accident. National Ben. Assn. v. Jackson, 114 Ill. 532.

Stepping from a car into a hole in a bridge which had not been observed was held to be an accident within the meaning of an insurance policy, in Burkhard v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 102 Pa. 232, 43 Am. Rep. 205.

A death caused by stumbling and falling against an engine when running to get the mail from a passing train is from "external, violent, and accidental means." Equitable Acc. Ins. Co. v. Osborn, 90 Ala. 201, 13 L. R. A. 207.

Falling without foresight or expectation is accidental within the meaning of an insurance policy. Providences L. Ins. & Invest. Co. v. Martin, 33 Md. 810.

Death is accidental when it results from a fall from a window. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Harvey, 63 Va. 949.

Many other cases similar to these have arisen in which injuries have been held accidental, and in which the accidental character of the injuries was too plain for dispute, and was not involved in the questions contested.

based a similar rule, denying a recovery, on the express terms of the policy, excepting from its scope "intentional injuries inflicted by the insured or any other person." A like ruling was made in construing the same language of an accident policy in this state. Phelan v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (1890) 39 Mo. App. 640. In other cases it has been held that death produced by the direct violence of a third party is none the less an accident, as regards the insured, because the injury was intentionally inflicted by the third party. Hutchcraft v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (1888) 87 Ky. 300; Richards v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (1891) 89 Cal. 170. But in the former case a recovery was denied because of a clause in the policy similar to that quoted above from the McConkey Case. It has been declared, with reference to fire insurance, that even gross negligence of the insured will not defeat a recovery in the absence of stipulations having such an effect. Shaw v. Robberds (1837) 6 Ad. & El. 75; St. Louis Ins. Co. v. Glasgow (1844) 8 Mo. 713, 41 Am. Dec. 661; Johnson v. Berkshire Mut. F. Ins. Co. (1862) 4 Allen, 388; Enterprise Ins. Co. v. Parisot (1878) 35 Ohio St. 35, 35 Am. Rep. 889. In Supreme Council O. of U. F. v. Garrigus (1885) 104 Ind. 133, 54 Am. Rep. 295, it was ruled that where the insured engaged in a fight without fault on his part, in consequence of which he received injuries resulting in his death, the latter was an "accident," within the meaning of a benefit certificate. In view of the definitions and legal precedents above quoted and cited, and of the very general terms of the policy under consideration, we conclude that its reasonable and natural meaning includes within the term "accident" such a death as Lovelace met. Whether he acted lawfully as a guest of the hotel, during the absence and illness of the proprietor, in attempting to remove Graves from the hotel office by force, we think needless to investigate. It may be assumed that by his course of conduct he voluntarily assumed the risks of a fight; but there is nothing in the circumstances to show that he voluntarily assumed the risk of death. We consider his killing an "accident," in the popular and ordinary sense in which that word is generally used. It certainly was an accident so far as he was concerned. We do not doubt that such should be the construction given to the word in the contract in suit, and that, in so concluding, we give effect to the true purpose and intent of the parties to the document. The learned trial judge reached the same conclusion.

The judgment is affirmed.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

Phlander W. H. TUTTLE et al., Piffs. in Err.,

Henry BURGETT, Admr., etc., of William Burgett, Deceased.

(38 Ohio St. 498.)

- *1. Where no place of performance of an obligation is agreed upon by the parties, the obligee, as a general rule, may designate any reasonable place of performance.
2. Under a mortgage conditioned that the mortgagor shall furnish the mortgagee and his wife, during life, comfortable rooms, food, clothing, medicine, and medical attendance in sickness, and provide them with the necessaries and comforts suitable for persons of their age and situation in life, no place being specified where such support shall be furnished them, they are not obliged to receive it at the house of the mortgagor, but are entitled to have it furnished at such reasonable place or places as they may select.
3. When, with knowledge of such selection, the mortgagor fails to furnish the support required by his contract, and declares his intention not to do so, or pay for any support which may be furnished by others, the condition of the mortgage is broken, and an action of foreclosure may be maintained for the reasonable value of the support provided by others, though it was provided without the request of the mortgagor, or demand upon him to furnish the support required.

4. The oral declarations of a party to a written instrument, made before or at the time of its execution, of an intention or purpose not therein expressed, or different from that to be derived from its terms, are not within the rule which permits extrinsic evidence of the situation of the parties and of the surrounding circumstances when the instrument was executed, and are inadmissible in an action on the instrument where its reformation is not sought.

5. A grantee who has agreed to support his grantor during life, in consideration of the conveyance of the property, will not be discharged from his obligation by the bringing of a suit to set aside the conveyance and recover back the property, where the suit has been abandoned and dismissed without trial, and the grantee has not been disturbed in the possession or enjoyment of the property.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Ashtabula County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage. Affirmed.

William Burgett, who was the owner of a valuable farm in Ashtabula county, and of a considerable amount of personal property, together estimated to be worth about

NOTE.—In connection with the above case as to the construction and effect of a contract for support of persons, see also Vandervee v. Clark (Ind.) 8 L. R. A. 519; McArthur v. Gordan (N. Y.) 12 L. R. A. 667.

$10,000, being of advanced years, and his wife an invalid, conveyed his farm, his wife joining in the conveyance, and transferred his personal property, to his son-in-law, Philander W. H. Tuttle, upon the consideration that he would support Burgett and his wife during life, furnish them with comfortable rooms, food, clothing, medicine, and medical attendance in sickness, provide for each of them the necessaries and comforts suitable for persons of their situation in life, and at their death place a marble slab properly inscribed at the grave of each, and also pay to William Burgett $50 a year so long as he should live.

To secure the performance of his obligation, Tuttle and his wife united in the execution of a mortgage of the farm back to Burgett. The condition of the mortgage, which, it is admitted by the pleadings, contains the entire contract relating to the support of Burgett and wife, is as follows:

"The condition of this deed is such that, whereas the said P. W. H. Tuttle has this day received the above-described lands together with an amount of personal property this day delivered, in consideration of supporting said William Burgett and Mary Burgett, during the term of their natural lives. To furnish each of them with comfortable rooms, food, clothing, medicine, and medical attendance in sickness, and at their death to place at the grave of each of them a marble slab, properly inscribed. To pay to William Burgett $50 each year, and to carefully provide for each of them the necessaries and comforts of life, suitable for persons of their age and situation in life.

"Now, if the said P. W. H. Tuttle, his heirs, assigns, executors, or administrators, shall well and truly perform all covenants and agreements, according to the tenor thereof, to the said William Burgett and Mary Burgett, the above deed shall be void; otherwise the same shall remain in full force and virtue in law."

The deed and mortgage were executed on the 4th day of April, 1884, and soon thereafter Burgett and his wife left the farm where they had lived for many years and went to reside with Tuttle in the village of Geneva some miles distant from the farm, and remained there receiving their support from Tuttle and his wife until February following, when they became dissatisfied and went to the home of their son Henry, which was near the farm, and after staying there a short time went to the home of their son-in-law, Woodruff, and remained there until the date of their death, which occurred on the 28th day of January, 1886, both dying on the same day. While Burgett and his wife were at Henry's, he took care of them, providing everything necessary for their comfortable support, under an agreement with his father that he should be paid a reasonable compensation therefor; and they were in like manner provided for by Woodruff while they remained at his house, under a like agreement. Administration having been granted on the estate of William Burgett, Henry and Woodruff presented their claims for the support furnished by each respectively, which were allowed, and suit was brought in the court of common pleas of Ashtabula county, to foreclose the mortgage for the amount due on them.

When Burgett and his wife were leaving Tuttle's house, he forbade their going, and declared, in substance, in the presence of Henry, that he would not provide support for them while they were away, nor pay for any furnished to them, and afterward gave that information to Woodruff. Tuttle alleges in his answer that he was always ready and willing to furnish and provide at his home in Geneva everything he was required to do by the condition of the mortgage, but was prevented by the absence of Burgett and his wife.

Soon after leaving Tuttle's, Burgett brought a suit to set aside the deed and mortgage and recover back the farm and personal property, charging that the conveyance and transfer were obtained by fraud and undue influence while he and his wife were incapacitated by age, sickness, and their enfeebled condition to transact business.

These charges were denied by Tuttle, and after Burgett's death the action was dismissed without trial. The bringing of that action was set up as a defense in the foreclosure suit, the claim being that it constituted an abandonment and repudiation of the contract and released Tuttle from the further performance of the condition of the mortgage. Other issues were made which it is not necessary to notice. After trial and judgment in the common pleas court the cause was taken on appeal to the circuit court, where all the issues were found for the plaintiff, and a decree of foreclosure rendered, from which error is prosecuted here. It appears from the bill of exceptions that the court, on objection made by the plaintiff's counsel, excluded evidence offered by the defendant of verbal declarations which it was claimed Burgett had made while the negotiations between him and Tuttle were in progress, to the effect that if the arrangement was consummated Burgett expected he and his wife would live at Tuttle's, in Geneva, or that they were to live there. Any further facts necessary to an understanding of the questions raised in the case will be stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. R. Smith, with Messrs. Burrows & Jerome, for plaintiffs in error:

Tuttle was not bound to support the mortgagees elsewhere than at his own home.

Parker v. Parker, 126 Mass. 488; Currier v. Currier, 2 N. H. 75.

In Jenkins v. Stetson, 9 Allen, 188, the court says: "By ceasing to receive support" the obligee intended "to get rid of the performance of her part of this mutual obligation." And such conduct on her part was held to be a waiver of her support, and estopped her from complaining that the support was not furnished.

Messrs. Howland & Starkey, for defendant in error:

The contract was silent as to the place of performance, the mortgagee therefore had the right to choose the place, putting the mortgagor to no needless expense.

The condition in this mortgage was the promise of Tuttle. If he wished to limit his liability he should have used proper words. If he desired to limit the performance of his promise to a certain place he should have named the place in the contract.

State v. Worthington, 7 Ohio, pt. 1, p. 171.

After Tuttle had broken the condition of the mortgage and was refusing to furnish support Burgett had a right to treat the contract as broken and bring his action for such relief as seemed to him then most suitable.

Frost v. Knight, L. R. 7 Exch. 111; Cort v. Ambergate, N. & B. & E. J. R. Co. 17 Q. B. 127.

Tuttle's declaration and conduct made a demand for support unnecessary and constituted a breach in law. A demand for support would have been useless.

Pettes v. Case, 2 Allen, 546; Barnes v. Barnes, 9 Mackey, 479.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In behalf of the plaintiffs in error, it is claimed (1), that under the agreement of the parties as expressed in the condition of the mortgage, Burgett and his wife were obliged to receive their maintenance and support at the residence of Tuttle, and therefore the failure or refusal to furnish it elsewhere constituted no breach of the condition; or (2), if such is not the legal effect of the condition as written, it was competent to prove by the verbal declarations of Burgett, made contemporaneously with the execution of the contract, or prior thereto, that the support and maintenance were to be provided at the house of the mortgagor; and (3), that the commencement of the suit by Burgett to set aside the conveyance was an abandonment and repudiation of the contract by him, which excused further performance of it by Tuttle.

1. The agreement as expressed in the mortgage contains no stipulation which makes it a condition to the right of the mortgagee and his wife to the support which Tuttle thereby agreed to furnish, that it be accepted at the home of the latter, or requires that it be either furnished or received at that, or any other specified place. It is silent on that subject, and creates a general obligation on the part of Tuttle to supply Burgett and wife with whatever he agreed to furnish them, without limitation as to the place where performance of the agreement should be made, or might be required. The obligation is expressed in the language of the promisor who executed the mortgage, and according to a well-established rule, should be taken most strongly against him, if there be doubt or ambiguity in its terms. If it were the intention of the parties that performance of the obligation could be required only at a particular place, that intention could easily have been expressed, as could any other condition qualifying the rights of the promisee. As a general rule, where no place is mentioned for the performance of an obligation, it is to be performed to the obligee in person who may designate any reasonable place of performance; and that rule has been held applicable, in many cases, to contracts of the kind we have under consideration. Wilder v. Whittemore, 15 Mass. 262; Crocker v. Crocker, 11 Pick. 252; Thayer v. Richards, 19 Pick. 398; Pettes v. Case, 2 Allen, 546; Hubbard v. Hubbard, 12 Allen, 586; McArthur v. Gordon, 126 N. Y. 597, 12 L. R. A. 667; Stillwell v. Pease, 4 N. J. Eq. 74; Rowell v. Jewett, 69 Me. 293.

In some of the cases cited the question arose upon the construction of wills requiring devisees or legatees to provide support for persons named; while in others it was made on mortgages with conditions similar to that of the mortgage in question; and the rule as stated is recognized in all of them. In the case of Wilder v. Whittemore it was held that, "upon a mortgage conditioned that the mortgagor shall maintain and support the mortgagees during life, the mortgagee has the right to support wherever he shall choose to reside, so that needless expense be not created to the mortgagor." And in Pettes v. Case, the court held that the condition of a mortgage, not differing in any essential feature from the one before us, was broken when the mortgagor after knowledge that the persons entitled to support are at a reasonable place, where they intend to receive their support, declares to the person in whose family they are that he will not pay for their support at that place, and does not pay therefor, though no special demand is made upon him for the support.

It is said, in the opinion of the court, that under such a contract the mortgagor "was bound to support the mortgagees, without their making a demand for support. And they were not bound to receive support at his house, but had a right to be supported wherever they might choose to live, provided they cause no needless expense."

We concur in that interpretation, and find nothing in the obligation of the plaintiff in error which requires a different construction, or gives it any different effect. Contracts of this nature, entered into by persons of declining years when their capacity for business has in some measure become impaired, with children or relatives who receive not only a full consideration for their engagement, but usually something in way of bounty also, should receive a liberal construction in favor of such elderly people, and the courts have enforced a corresponding performance in their behalf. A comfortable support and maintenance, which Tuttle's agreement bound him to furnish, must have been understood by the parties to be such as would comfortably situate Burgett and his wife, as well as supply them with adequate food and clothing, and other necessities of life; and to afford them that comfort they should be allowed reasonable liberty in the choice of their situation and surroundings, there being no express limitation in that respect contained in the contract. To deny them that privilege, and compel them to remain under the control of the party whose pecuniary interest is to be relieved of the burden at the earliest moment, would place them in a condition of dependence scarcely less in degree than that of persons under guardianship, and occasion a constant dissatisfaction and discomfort which would defeat an important purpose, and the real spirit of the contract, though there should be the strictest observance of its letter in the supplies provided for them; and that restraint should not be imposed unless it is made to appear with reasonable certainty that such was the agreement of the parties.

The cases of Parker v. Parker, 126 Mass. 438, and Currier v. Currier, 2 N. H. 75, are cited in support of the construction claimed by the plaintiff in error. In the former of these cases, in giving construction to a will by which the testator gave to his widow during life the use of all his property, including the homestead farm where he and his family had always lived, and to his unmarried daughter a small sum of money, "a home and maintenance during the time she remained unmarried," it was held to be the intention of the testator that the daughter should have "the home and maintenance" given her, on the farm where the family lived. It was evidently expected by the testator that the widow would remain on the homestead devised to her, and that the daughter, while she remained unmarried, should live at home with her mother. In giving that construction to the will, the court said: "Where a testator provides in his will that his wife, child, or other person shall be supported and maintained by his executor, or where the condition of a deed or mortgage recites that the grantee or mortgagor shall support the grantor or mortgagee, and the instrument does not point out that the support shall be provided in a particular place, then the party so entitled may have the support where, under reasonable limitations, he may choose to reside. But if the instrument points out the place where the support shall be furnished, it is not the right of the party entitled to receive it to demand that it shall be furnished elsewhere. Each case must be decided on its own facts, looking to the instrument and the surrounding circumstances." In the Currier Case, a son-in-law, in consideration of a conveyance of land made to him by his father-in-law, agreed to pay the latter's debts and provide necessary support for him and his wife; or, on failure to do so, to lease to them for life the farm where he resided; which latter clause, it was held, sufficiently indicated the home of the son-in-law as the place of performance of his agreement. The court says that where, in contracts of that description, the parents retain a life lease or mortgage interest in the farm they occupied before, "the place of performance would then seem to be the house before occupied by the parents." What would be the proper interpretation of a mortgage, securing an engagement to support the mortgagee, taken upon lands granted to the mortgagor as the consideration of his promise, was not before the court, and the statement of what seemed to that court would be the proper construction of such an instrument concerning the place of performance is against the weight of authority, as will be seen by reference to the cases we have hereinbefore cited, which, in our opinion, establish the better rule. But conceding the force of the circumstances mentioned as indicating the home occupied by the parents, or that of the testator, as the place for the performance of such an engagement, they are without force as tending to fix any other place where the support shall be furnished, and therefore neither of the cases relied on by the plaintiff in error sustain his contention that his home in Geneva, remote from the Burgett homestead, was the place where he should perform his contract; and, as neither of the parties claim the homestead was such place of performance, the cases lose their applicability, and leave the obligation of Tuttle in that class where no particular place of performance is specified.

2. The record shows that on the trial in the circuit court, counsel for the plaintiff in error asked of one of his witnesses what Burgett said, prior to the execution of the deed and mortgage, "as to where he was to live if this contract was entered into." An objection to the question was sustained, and an exception taken, counsel stating that he expected "the answer would be that at the time the contract was made it was understood between them, and Mr. Burgett said that he expected, if the contract was made, to live at Mr. Tuttle's, in Geneva; that he was going to live with Mr. Tuttle; that one inducement in making the contract was to get off the farm." The exclusion of that testimony is assigned for error, and it is contended that it was admissible under the rule which permits proof of the circumstances surrounding the parties when a written contract is entered into.

There can be no doubt that in giving construction to a written instrument regard may be had to the situation of the parties, and the surrounding circumstances; and these may be shown by parol, to enable the court called on to interpret the instrument the better to understand its terms, and arrive at the intention of the parties when not clearly expressed. But we do not understand that the oral declarations of a party, made prior to or at the time of the execution of the instrument, of an intention or purpose not therein expressed, or different from that properly derived from its terms, are within the rule; and unless the evidence excluded by the court below had that effect, it was wholly immaterial and its exclusion of no legal significance. It was competent to show, as was done at the trial, that after the deed and mortgage were delivered, Burgett and wife went to live at the home of Tuttle; but, since by the terms of the mortgage they were entitled to receive their support and maintenance at such reasonable place as they might select, the fact that they accepted it for a time at Tuttle's house was not inconsistent with their claim that they had a right to receive it elsewhere; nor did it establish a practical construction of the mortgage at variance with that claimed by the plaintiff in the action.

8. The claim most earnestly pressed by the plaintiff in error is, that the suit of Burgett to set aside his conveyance and recover back the property transferred to Tuttle relieved the latter from the further performance of his agreement. It may be accepted as a general principle, that where one party refuses performance of his part of an executory agreement, or denies his obligation to perform, the other party cannot be compelled to perform his part of the contract; but the application of that principle here is not so apparent. Burgett had fully performed his part of the contract made with Tuttle, by the conveyance of the farm and delivery of the personal property in accordance with its terms. Nothing remained for him to do; but the contract was executory on the part of Tuttle only. Having concluded he had been overreached in the transaction, Burgett sued to rescind and recover what he had parted with under it. Tuttle might have accepted the offer of rescission thus made, which, if followed with a reconveyance and surrender of the property, or by a decree restoring the property, would undoubtedly have discharged him from all further liability. But he resisted the suit which was abandoned and dismissed without trial, leaving the parties in the same situation as if it had never been commenced; and if the claim he now makes were sustained, he would be enabled to retain both the property and the consideration he agreed to pay for it. That, we think he cannot be allowed to do. While he retained the property his obligation to furnish a support for Burgett and his wife was a continuing one so long as they lived, which could only be discharged by performance, or voluntary relinquishment. The trial court found there had been a failure to perform; and the suit afforded satisfactory evidence of a purpose on the part of Burgett to secure the whole of the property for his use, instead of so much only as could be enforced under the mortgage, from which an intention to forego the benefits of the mortgage, if he failed to establish his right to the restoration of the property, could not reasonably be inferred. The case of Jenkins v. Stetson, 9 Allen, 128, on which reliance is placed by plaintiff in error, rests upon the general principle we have stated. There a suit was brought on a bond by which the plaintiff agreed to support a widow and her two daughters during their natural lives, in consideration of which the daughters agreed to leave to him and his heirs all of their personal property, including what they should receive from their father's estate. The mother and one of her daughters having died, the surviving daughter took up her residence with a brother-in-law, and afterward left her personal estate, by will, to her sisters. There was no evidence that the plaintiff had been requested to furnish any support to the daughter after she went to her brother-in-law's house, but she was requested by the plaintiff to return to his house and receive her support there. It was held that, under the circumstances of that case, a failure by the plaintiff to tender the support at the brother-in-law's house was not a breach of the bond. But it was not held that the daughter was not entitled to receive it there if she had so requested, nor that a failure to so furnish after demand made would not have been a breach. The proposition declared is: "It is not sufficient proof of a breach of a bond to support another during his natural life, to show that he left the house of the person bound to furnish such support and resided elsewhere for several years, without at any time requesting him to fulfil his agreement or in any way exhibiting to him an intention or desire to hold him to the performance thereof." It will be observed that the agreement under which the party was entitled to support in that case, was executory on her part, she having agreed to leave all her personal property to the plaintiff as the consideration for his promise to support her; and that she did not perform her part of the agreement, but left her property to other persons. That feature of the case, the court says, tended "very strongly to show that it was her intention, without the knowledge or assent of the plaintiff, to avoid the obligation of the contract into which she had entered with him, and, by ceasing to receive support at his hands, to get rid of the performance of her part of this mutual obligation. Under such circumstances, a tender of performance by the plaintiff was unnecessary, and no inference of a failure or omission by the plaintiff to fulfil the agreement would have been warranted."

We see nothing in that case which conflicts with the conclusion we have reached in this one. Here the contract, as we have seen, entitled Burgett and his wife to have performance of it by Tuttle at such reasonable place as they should select, and he having declared his intention not to furnish them support while absent from his house, no demand upon him was necessary to an action on the mortgage for the reasonable value of their support by others while so absent.

Judgment affirmed.

2. A law of a general nature, which is in full force in every part of the state, complies with § 26 of art. 2 of the Constitution, requiring laws of a general nature to have a uniform operation throughout the state.
3. The act of April 20, 1894, entitled "An Act to Impose a Direct Inheritance Tax" (91 Ohio Laws, 166), by its exemption from taxation of the right to receive or succeed to estates not exceeding $20,000 in value, and taxing the whole right of receiving or succeeding to estates which exceed that sum in value, and in taxing at a higher rate per centum the right to receive or succeed to estates of larger value than to estates of smaller value, is in conflict with section 2 of the bill of rights of the Constitution of this state, which declares that "all political power is inherent in the people. Government is instituted for their equal protection and benefit;" and the whole act is therefore unconstitutional and void.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Hamilton County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in a mandamus proceeding to compel him as probate judge to take the necessary steps to collect an inheritance tax upon the property of George K. Duckworth, deceased, as required by law. Affirmed.

Statement by Burket, J. :

This case was commenced in the circuit court of Hamilton county, in the name of the state on relation of John C. Schwartz, prosecuting attorney, against Howard Ferris, judge of the probate court of said county, in mandamus in the nature of procedendo, to compel the judge of said court to proceed and perform his official duties under the act of April 20, 1894, entitled "An Act to Impose a Direct Inheritance Tax" (91 Ohio Laws, 166), as applicable to the estate of George K. Duckworth, who was a resident of said county, and died on the 8th day of May, 1894, leaving an estate of over $50,000. The petition says that letters of administration have been granted to the widow, Lucy B. Duckworth; that the prosecuting attorney has made proper application to the said probate judge for the appointment of appraisers to appraise the property of said estate for the purpose of having said direct inheritance tax assessed; that said probate judge refused, and still refuses, to make such appointment, on the ground that said statute is unconstitutional. To this petition the probate judge filed a demurrer, which was sustained by the circuit court on the ground that the statute is unconstitutional, and to which plaintiff excepted. Judgment was thereupon rendered in favor of defendant below. A petition in error was then filed in this court to reverse the judgment of the circuit court.

Messrs. John C. Schwartz and Thomas H. Darby, for plaintiff in error:

Article 12, § 2, of the Constitution only applies to taxes on property for general revenue. Baker v. Cincinnati, 11 Ohio St. 540; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Mayor, 28 Ohio St. 535; Anderson v. Brewster, 44 Ohio St. 585; Adler v. Whitbeck, Id. 565; Ashley v. Ryan, 49 Ohio St. 504; Pittsburgh, O. & St. L. R. Co. v. State, 49 Ohio St. 189, 16 L. R. A. 880; Wasson v. Wayne County Comrs. 49 Ohio St. 622, 17 L. R. A. 795.

The direct inheritance tax is not a tax on property.

The character and purpose of a law, not less than its constitutionality, are to be determined by its operation and effect.

Wasson v. Wayne County Comrs. 49 Ohio St. 622, 17 L. R. A. 795; State v. Hipp, 38 Ohio St. 199.

Laws substantially the same as the one under discussion have been many times before the courts of this country, state and Federal, and in all cases save one (Curry v. Spencer, 61 N. H. 624), have been upheld, and they have been construed to be, not a tax on the property itself, but a bonus or price exacted from the recipient of this favor at the hands of the state.

Article 2, § 26, of the Constitution is not violated by this law because it has uniform operation throughout the state.

State v. Elliot, 47 Ohio St. 90; Ex parte Falk, 42 Ohio St. 688.

There is no other constitutional provision applicable, and in the absence of such there is no principle of equality which the courts are bound to recognize and enforce, but the remedy for unjust and discriminatory taxation is with the legislature, and not with the courts.

682; Northern Indiana R. Co. v. Connelly, 10 Ohio St. 165.

Under this law the subjects of taxation are classified and the tax is uniform within these classes.

Barbet, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case has been argued with marked ability on both sides, and the arguments have greatly aided the court in reaching its final conclusions. We have carefully examined and considered all the cases cited by counsel, and many others, and shall state rather the conclusions reached than lengthy arguments in support thereof.

The 1st section of the statute in question is as follows: "Section 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the state of Ohio, that all property within the jurisdiction of this state, and any interest therein, whether belonging to inhabitants of this state or not, and whether tangible or intangible, including annuities, which shall pass by will or by the intestate laws of this state, or by deed, grant, sale, or gift, made or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the death of the grantor, to the use of the father, mother, husband, wife, brother, sister, niece, nephew, lineal descendant, adopted child, or person recognized as an adopted child and made a legal heir under the provisions of section 4183 of the Revised Statutes of Ohio, or the lineal descendant thereof, the lineal descendant of any adopted child, the wife or widow of a son, the husband of a daughter of decedent, or of any one in trust for such person or persons, shall be liable to a tax as follows, to wit: When the value of the entire property of such decedent exceeds the sum of $20,000 and does not exceed the sum of $50,000, 1 per cent; when it exceeds $50,000 and does not exceed $100,000, 1½ per cent; when it exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $200,000, 2 per cent; when it exceeds $200,000 and does not exceed $300,000, 3 per cent; when it exceeds $300,000 and does not exceed $500,000, 3½ per cent; when it exceeds $500,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000, 4 per cent; and when it exceeds $1,000,000, 5 per cent; 75 per cent of such tax to be for the use of the state, and 25 per cent for the use of the county wherein the same is collected; and all administrators, executors, and trustees shall be liable for all such taxes, with lawful interest, as hereinafter provided, until the same shall have been paid as hereinafter directed. Such taxes shall become due and payable immediately upon the death of the decedent, and shall at once become a lien upon said property." It is this first section that is claimed to be unconstitutional, and which was so held by the circuit court.

In view of the authorities cited, it must be conceded that the general assembly has the power to pass an inheritance tax for purposes of general revenue, unless prohibited by the Constitution of our state. Properly understood, it is not the right to transmit, but the right and privilege to receive, that is taxed. The right to dispose of property during the lifetime of the owner cannot be separated from the property itself, and therefore to tax the right of disposal by contract in the lifetime of the owner, even though to take effect at his death, is to tax the property itself. But the right to dispose of the property by will or descent, taking effect after the death of the owner, is not so closely connected with the right of property, and it is not so clear that such right may not be taxed. But when the right to receive the property is considered, it is clear that the right is distinct and separate from the property itself, and the state may tax this right to receive property, and this is so whether the property is disposed of by the owner during his lifetime or at his death. This right to receive property is under the control of the legislature, and it has the power to regulate and lay such burdens thereon as it may see fit, within the provisions of the Constitution. To regulate by taxation or otherwise the privilege or right to receive property, is not in conflict with the 1st section of the bill of rights, which recognizes the inalienable right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property. Were it otherwise, all our laws as to wills, descent, distribution, and conveyances would be unconstitutional.

It is urged, however, that the statute in question does not tax the right or privilege of receiving property, but taxes the property itself. It must be conceded that the language used in the statute is upon its face clearly a taxation of the property itself, and not of the right to acquire property. And for myself, I think this is the true construction of the act. Others of the court, however, think that when the operation and effect of the statute are considered, it may be regarded as taxing the right or privilege, rather than the property. Certain it is that the only thing that can be constitutionally taxed is the right or privilege of succession, and a statute having such taxation in view should express its purpose in words applicable to such subject-matter of taxation.

It is conceded by all parties that, if this statute imposes a tax on property, it is unconstitutional. As a majority of the court are of opinion that it is not a tax on property, but upon the right to receive property, the statute must, as to this point, be sustained.

It is also contended that this tax is a tax on property, because it is made a lien upon the real estate received; and cases are cited sustaining this view. Re Bittinger's Estate, 129 Pa. 344. The statute in that case provides as follows: "The tax on real estate shall remain a lien on the real estate on which the same is charged until paid" (Pa. act May 6, 1887; Pub. Laws, 79); while the statute in this state provides simply that the inheritance tax "shall at once become a lien upon said property." But, aside from the difference in the words of the statute, there is no force in the contention. If the legislature has the power to assess a tax upon the right to receive and succeed to property, it clearly has the right to make such tax a lien upon the property received by the use of such right; and the making of such lien does not change the tax from a tax upon the right to receive to a tax upon the property received under the right.

Next, it is urged that, if the statute imposes a tax only upon the right or privilege to receive property, as the taxation thereby imposed is for general revenue, it is in conflict with section 2 of article 12 of the Constitution, which provides that laws shall be passed taxing by a uniform rule all property according to its true value in money. The claim is that for purposes of general revenue property only can be taxed. The Constitution is silent as to the application of the fund arising on taxation on subjects other than property. The Constitution being silent, it follows that, if such taxes can be levied and collected at all, their application is within the sole and exclusive power and discretion of the general assembly. The power of taxation, without limitation, is given in section 1, article 2, of the Constitution, which provides that "the legislative power of this state shall be vested in a general assembly, which shall consist of a Senate and a House of Representatives." In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Mayer, 28 Ohio St. 521, it was held that the general grant of legislative power vested in the general assembly by this section includes the power to collect revenue for public purposes, and the limitations on the exercise of this power are to be found in other provisions of the Constitution. In Hill v. Higdon, 5 Ohio St. 243, 67 Am. Dec. 289, it is said by the court: "In our present Constitution, as well as in the former, the general grant of legislative authority includes the power of taxation in all its forms. Restrictions upon its exercise are to be looked for in other parts of the instrument." The power of taxation granted in the 1st section of the 2d article, being unlimited, is broad enough to include the power to tax rights, privileges, and franchises. Is there any limitation upon this power found in any other section of the Constitution? The only section which it is claimed limits this power is section 2 of article 12. That section is in the following words: "Laws shall be passed taxing by a uniform rule all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint-stock companies or otherwise; and also all real and personal property, according to its true value in money; but burying grounds, public houses, houses used exclusively for public worship, institutions of purely public charity, public property used exclusively for any public purpose, and personal property to an amount not exceeding in value $200 for each individual, may, by general laws, be exempted from taxation; but all such laws shall be subject to alteration or repeal; and the value of all property so exempted shall, from time to time, be ascertained and published, as may be directed by law." It will be noticed that this section is not a limitation upon the power to tax rights, privileges, and franchises, because the limitation by this section imposed is as to the taxation of property; that is, moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint-stock companies, or otherwise, and also real and personal property. Nothing whatever is said about rights, privileges, or franchises, and therefore this section cannot fairly be construed as a limitation of the power to tax rights, privileges, and franchises, unless they are property, within the meaning of this section of the 12th article. That a franchise is not property, within the meaning of said section, was held by this court, for reasons which seem unanswerable, in Exchange Bank v. Hines, 8 Ohio St. 1. The court says on page 8: "A corporate franchise, therefore, being a mere privilege, or right of authority by the government, is not property of any description, and consequently not subject to taxation under the above provisions of the Constitution." It will be noticed that the court here says that a franchise is not such property as can be taxed under the above provisions of the Constitution. The provisions referred to are those contained in section 2 of article 12. That a franchise is valuable, and in that sense property, has sometimes been held; but it is not property, in the sense used in said section of the Constitution, and its taxation is not by that section limited or restricted.

With the power of taxation of rights, privileges, and franchises, granted by the 1st section of the 2d article, unlimited and unrestricted by other parts of the Constitution, what authority is there to limit and restrict this kind of taxation to purposes other than for general revenue? No warrant therefor is found in the Constitution. This court, in Exchange Bank v. Hines, supra, after quoting the 2d section of the 12th article, on page 10, by Bartley, Ch. J., says: "The manifest effect of this constitutional provision is to make property the basis, and the sole basis, of taxation." Again, on page 40, the court, by Thurman, J., says: "The objects of taxation declared in that instrument are the real and personal property and choses in action in the state." The part of the Constitution under consideration was the 2d section of article 12, and nothing whatever is said about the general grant of power found in section 1 of article 2. Throughout the whole case of Exchange Bank v. Hines, section 2 of article 12 is regarded as the granting of the power of taxation, instead of a limitation and restriction of the general power granted in section 1 of article 2. That such is not the true or correct construction of the Constitution is now universally conceded. That construction was not necessary to the decision of the question then before the court, but it did not lead to an incorrect determination of that case. It mattered not in that case whether the grant of power of taxation was found in section 1 of article 2 or in section 2 of article 12; nor whether section 2 of article 12 was a grant of power of taxation or a limitation of the power granted by the other section of the Constitution. The question for determination in that case was as to taxation of banks under section 3 of article 12, and that led to the question as to whether section 2 of that article permitted the deduction of debts from moneys and credits. The question before the court had relation to property only, and, construing section 2 of article 12 as a grant of power, instead of a limitation of power granted in another section, and as nothing except property is spoken of as taxable in said section 2, the court held that what was therein expressed as taxable by implication excluded everything else, and therefore announced the rule that under said section the sole basis of taxation is property. That property is not the sole basis of taxation under the power granted by section 1 of article 2 appears by many decisions of this court, among which are the following: Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Mayer, 28 Ohio St. 533; Baker v. Cincinnati, 11 Ohio St. 540; Adler v. Whitbeck, 44 Ohio St. 565; Anderson v. Brewster, 44 Ohio St. 585; State v. Reinmund, 45 Ohio St. 214; Ashley v. Ryan, 49 Ohio St. 504; Mets v. Hagerty, 51 Ohio St. 531.

The error of regarding the 2d section of article 12 as a grant of power of taxation, instead of a limitation upon that power, was carried into the decision of the case of Zanesville v. Richards, 5 Ohio St. 589, but was partly corrected in Hill v. Higdon, Id. 243, 67 Am. Dec. 289, and fully corrected in Reeves v. Wood County, 8 Ohio St. 333. The court, on page 592, in 5 Ohio St., by Ranney, Ch. J., says: "The public burdens are made to rest upon the property of the state, and whenever money is to be raised by taxation, the positive injunction is, that 'laws shall be passed taxing by a uniform rule all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint-stock companies, or otherwise; and also all real and personal property,—according to its true value in money.'" That the public burdens are not made, by the Constitution, to rest exclusively upon the property of the state, is shown by the cases above cited, and that which is spoken of as an injunction that laws shall be passed taxing by a uniform rule all moneys, etc., is, instead of an injunction, a restriction and limitation upon the general power of taxation granted by section 1 of article 2. In the Zanesville Case, supra, the question was whether an exemption of lands, not laid out into lots, within the city of Zanesville, from all taxes except for road purposes, was constitutional. The 2d section of article 12 was again regarded as the source of the power of taxtion, but, as only taxes on property were under consideration, this led to no erroneous results in that case; and the court held that all lands within the city limits must be taxed for all purposes for which lots were taxed. The court says: "No tax, either for state, county, township, or corporation purposes, can be levied without express authority of law; and this section of the Constitution is equally applicable to, and furnishes the governing principle for, all laws authorizing taxes to be levied for either purpose." If by the applicability and governing principle is meant equality of taxation of property without exemption,—that is, that when some property in a city is taxed for state, county, township, or corporation purposes, all property within the city must be taxed for the same purposes without exemption,—it is correct. But if it means, as we think it does not, that subjects of value, other than what are regarded property within said section, cannot be taxed for state, county, township, or corporation purposes, it is incorrect. That the former was meant clearly appears from the subject-matter under consideration. The question as to the taxation of rights, privileges, and franchises was not under consideration, and the language used is not applicable thereto.

Speaking of the 94th section of the tax law, the court says, on page 592, that it seems to imply that municipal corporations might exist which were authorized to tax only such real estate as was laid out into lots when platted and recorded. The court does not so construe that section, and says that, if so construed, it would conflict with section 2 of article 12. The question under consideration being whether lands within the city not laid out into lots could be taxed for purposes other than road purposes, the court says: "We are clear in the opinion that if it [§ 94] means what is claimed for it, and intends to provide for the exemption of any part of the property in a municipal corporation otherwise subject to taxation, from contributing its proportion to the general revenue fund, it is in conflict with the 2d section of the 12th article of that instrument, and should be treated as a nullity." This is the first time in the line of decisions that "general revenue" is mentioned. It will be noticed that it is property, and not franchises, that cannot be exempted from contributing to the "general revenue" fund. It will further be noticed that it is not stated here that only tax on property can contribute to the general revenue fund. The full force of the decision is that property cannot be exempted from contributing to the general revenue fund. The court, in the Zanesville Case, says that property cannot be exempted from contributing to the general revenue fund; and when reference is made to that case in the case of Hill v. Higdon, supra, the word "property" is still retained; the court saying on page 246: "In the case of Zanesville v. Richards, decided at the present term, we have held that this section is equally applicable to, and furnishes the governing principle for, all laws levying taxes for general revenue, whether for state, county, township, or corporation purposes; and that it requires a uniform rate per cent to be levied upon all property, according to its true value in money, within the limits of the state, or the local subdivision for which the revenue is collected." The governing principle here referred to is that all property shall be taxed according to its true value, in money, when raising revenue for state, county, township, or corporation purposes, and that there can, in such cases, be no exemption of property, except as provided in said section. This very clearly appears when the whole case is read, and by what immediately precedes the part above quoted. The question in the case was whether special assessments for street improvements were constitutional or not. There was no question involved whether or not general revenue could be raised by a tax on franchises or privileges, and what is said as to taxation for general revenue is to show that in raising general revenue there can be no exemption of property other than is provided in section 2 of article 12. And when the court says, on page 249, that "the 2d section of the 12th article has established the principles upon which all taxes for general revenue purposes must be levied," the principles referred to are the principles of equality, and that all property must be taxed, without exemption, as provided for in said section. That this is so is shown by the language used by the court, the subject-matter under consideration, and the fact that those are the only principles found in said section. General revenue is not mentioned in the section. In order to sustain assessments for street improvements, the court, in this case of Hill v. Higdon, abandoned the position that the 2d section of article 12 was the source of the power of taxation, and the concession was made that "the general grant of legislative authority includes the power of taxation in all its forms," and that "restrictions upon its exercise are to be looked for in other parts of the instrument." The doctrine and line of decisions, that general revenue cannot be raised otherwise than by a tax on property, are both based upon the above cases of Exchange Bank v. Hines, Zanesville v. Richards, and Hill v. Higdon, none of which support the doctrine, but decide that in raising general revenue all property must be taxed, without exemption, as provided in said 2d section. The cases following the above three cases refer to the doctrine as well understood and settled by those cases, without examining the doctrine anew to see whether or not it is well founded. The doctrine is not necessary to a proper decision of any of the cases in which reference is made thereto, and all of them not heretofore overruled were correctly decided without its aid, including Wasson v. Wayne County Comrs. 49 Ohio St. 622, 17 L. R. A. 795; and Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. State, 40 Ohio St. 189, 16 L. R. A. 880. In none of those cases is the doctrine sustained that general revenue cannot be constitutionally raised by taxation on franchises, rights, and privileges; but the doctrine sustained is that, when general revenue is to be raised by taxation on property, all the property of the state, county, township, or corporation must be taxed without exemption, as provided in said section 2 of article 13 of the Constitution. It follows, therefore, that imposing the tax in question upon the right to receive property does not render the act unconstitutional.

Next it is urged that the statute in question is in conflict with section 26 of article 2 of the Constitution, which provides that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation throughout the state." This section of the Constitution is not intended to guarantee the equal protection of all the inhabitants of the state but only to provide that laws of a general nature shall be in force in all parts of the state. State v. Nelson, 52 Ohio St. —, 26 L. R. A. 317, and the cases there cited.

In the next place, it is urged that the statute in question is unconstitutional in this: that it exempts estates of $20,000 and under from all taxation, and in case the estate exceeds $20,000 it taxes the entire estate without any exemption whatever; and also in this: that large estates are taxed at a higher rate per cent than smaller ones. Section 2 of the bill of rights provides as follows: "All political power is inherent in the people. Government is instituted for their equal protection and benefit." This statute is in direct conflict with this section of the bill of rights. If government is instituted for the equal protection and benefit of the people, it follows that laws which are passed under a government so instituted must likewise be for the equal protection and benefit of the people. This statute fails to protect equally the people who exercise the right and privilege of receiving or succeeding to property. The right to receive the first $20,000 of an estate not exceeding that sum is protected from taxation, while the right to receive the first $20,000 of an estate exceeding that sum is taxed the sum of $200. This is not equal protection. Again, the right to receive $50,000 worth of property of an estate not exceeding that sum is taxed $500, while the right to receive $50,000 of an estate exceeding that sum is $750. This is not equal protection. The same may be said of the other gradations provided for in the statute. The right or privilege of receiving or succeeding to property is valuable in proportion to the value of the property received. It cannot be consistently said that the right to receive $20,000 is of no value, and that the right to receive $20,001 is of the value of $200.01. Again, he who uses the right or privilege of receiving property of the value of $20,001, and pays therefor a tax of $200.01, is not equally benefited for the tax paid as he who uses the same right or privilege of receiving property of the value of $20,000, without paying any tax whatever for the use of such right. The exemption of $20,000, and the increase of the per cent as the value of the estate increases, renders this statute unconstitutional. Our Constitution requires equality in our tax laws, and also equality in their execution, as near as may be. The only exemption allowed as to taxation of property is personal property to the amount of $200 to each individual, and certain other property devoted to public or charitable uses. Two hundred dollars in value to each individual is the extent to which the legislature has the power to exempt personal property from taxation. The Constitution must be regarded as consistent with itself throughout, and as section 2 of article 13 permits an exemption from taxation of personal property not exceeding $200, a construction of section 2 of the bill of rights is thereby evinced to the effect that in taxation of subjects other than property an exemption up to $200 in value would be regarded as for the equal protection and benefit of the people. The exemption must be equally for all, and the rate per cent must be the same on all estates. There can be no discrimination in favor of the rich or poor. All stand upon an equality under the provisions of the Constitution, and it is this equality that is the pride and safeguard of us all. It was this principle, more than any other, that induced the decision in Hocking Valley Coal Co. v. Rosser, 52 Ohio St. —, 29 L. R. A. 386.

In support of the law it is urged that this exemption and gradation may be sustained upon the ground that the costs of administration in a small estate are proportionately larger than in a large one, and that therefore the small estate should be free from this taxation. The answer is that equality in taxation is required by the Constitution, and that our administration laws are enacted upon the principle of equal protection and benefit of the people, and this unequal mode of taxation is not required to remedy any defect in the burdens of these laws.

Again, it is urged in support of the law that an estate not exceeding $20,000 is in the nature of a necessity for the support of widow and children; that the widow and children succeeding to so moderate a property ought to be exempted from paying the state anything for that privilege. The answer to this, as well as to the former proposition, is that we are not here considering the policy or equity of this exemption, but the power of the legislature to make such discrimination, when prohibited from so doing by the 2d section of the bill of rights. When this power is once conceded, the manner of exercising the same is limited only by the will of the legislature. In determining constitutional questions, courts should not attempt to solve them by reasoning only along the lines of the principles of equity, but the reasoning should be along the lines of the Constitution, for it may be that the very object of the Constitution is to abandon and cut loose from what had theretofore been regarded as equity in particular cases, or upon a particular subject-matter. The question is, therefore, not what would be equitable, but what is constitutional. Equity cannot be permitted to override the Constitution.

Again, it is urged in favor of the statute that the state has the right to say that the heir or legatee or devisee of a large property enjoys a disproportionate privilege, because what he receives is in the nature of a luxury, and luxuries ought to be subject to higher taxes. The answer to this is that the value of the right to receive is in direct proportion to the value of the property received, and must, under the Constitution, be taxed accordingly, if taxed at all. As to the higher tax on luxuries, it may be said that such a rule might find a place in tariff legislation, where all are free to indulge in the luxuries or not, as they see fit, but that such rule can find no support in taxation under a Constitution requiring equality in taxation, and laws to be for the equal protection and benefit of all.

Again, it is claimed in favor of the law that this statute is not purely for the raising of revenue, but for the regulation of the succession and transfer of property, and that the state has a right to say that it will regulate the matter of succession to great estates by making a greater charge for the privilege, and thus discourage the holding together of great estates until death. The answer is that the matter of succession and transfer of property is already fully regulated by our statutes as to wills, descent, distribution, and conveyances; and if further regulation is desired purely as regulation, aside from revenue, it would most likely be sought in the amendment of those statutes. The act is clearly one for taxation, and not for regulation, as shown by its provisions and title. The state finds no warrant in its Constitution for saying that it will make a greater rate of charge for the privilege of succeeding to large estates than to smaller ones, but, on the contrary, this is expressly prohibited by the requirement that laws shall be for the equal protection and benefit of the people. This requirement applies as well to laws for regulation as to laws for taxation.

It is also contended by those opposing the law that the statute is inoperative, for the reason that it fails to provide any machinery for the collection of a tax levied on property which passes by "deed, grant, sale, or gift, made or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the death of the grantor." Whether there is sufficient machinery supplied in this and other statutes to enforce collection of such tax need not now be determined, as that question is not involved in this case, and does not go to the constitutionality of the statute, but to its enforcement, if found constitutional.

As to the 1st section of the 14th amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no state shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws," it is sufficient to say that the provisions of this section of the Federal Constitution, as to this question, are not broader than the 2d section of our bill of rights, and that therefore a statute upon this subject, authorized by our bill of rights, would not be in conflict with this section of the Constitution of the United States.

While the facts in the case of Northern Indiana R. Co. v. Connelly, 10 Ohio St. 160, said to have been followed and relied upon by the circuit court, bear little, if any, relation to this case, the rule of decision in that case was in line with the 2d section of our bill of rights, and was therefore very properly followed by the circuit court.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

City of CHICAGO.

(158 Ill. 653.)

1. An ordinance which is unreasonable, unjust, and oppressive will be held by the courts to be void.
2. The reasonableness or unreasonableness of a municipal ordinance is a question for the decision of the court in the light of all existing circumstances or contemporaneous conditions, the objects sought to be obtained, and the necessity or want of necessity for its adoption.
3. Power to make ordinances on a given subject, conferred by the legislature without prescribing the details, must be reasonably exercised, else the ordinances will be held invalid.
4. An ordinance compelling the substitution of a cement sidewalk in the place of a plank walk in front of a vacant 20-acre lot, which had been laid less than six months before in conformity with an ordinance, and which was in good condition and in all respects safe, convenient, and sufficient for public use, is unreasonable, unjust, and oppressive, and therefore void.

A PPEAL by property owners from a judgment of the Cook County Court which confirmed a special assessment for street improvement purposes. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Kirk Hawes, with Mr. Ira J. Geer, for appellants:

The power of the city council to declare what shall be a local improvement is an implied power, and an ordinance exercising that power, though regularly passed, must be reasonable, otherwise it is void.

Wistar v. Philadelphia, supra; Hammett v. Philadelphia, 65 Pa. 165, 3 Am. Rep. 615.

Messrs. Harry Rubens, John F. Holland, Adolph Kraus, and Maher & Gilbert for appellee.

Baker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of confirmation of a special assessment made under an ordinance of the city of Chicago passed March 7, 1892, and providing for the construction of a cement sidewalk on Fiftieth street, from Lake avenue to Drexel boulevard. The commissioners appointed to assess the cost and expenses of the improvement upon the property benefited thereby returned into court an assessment roll, in which the property here in question, then owned by John H. Dunham, since deceased, was assessed in the sum of $1,915.50. Various objections in writing were filed by said Dunham and overruled by the court. The question of benefits was submitted to a jury, and the jury, in their verdict, reduced the assessment on the property to $1,638.75. Motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, as well as motions to dismiss the petition and to cancel the assessment, were made by the objector and overruled by the court, and exceptions taken, and the court entered judgment of confirmation for the amount fixed by the verdict of the jury, and the objector perfected an appeal to this court. John H. Dunham, the objector, thereafter died, and his death was suggested, and by leave of court Helen Elizabeth Dunham Hawes and Mary Virginia Dunham, who are his heirs at law and devisees under his will, now prosecute the appeal.

It is claimed by appellants that the ordinance providing for the construction of the cement sidewalk, and under which the assessment was made, is unreasonable, unjust, and oppressive, and therefore void. The uncontradicted evidence in the case shows that the tract of land, the south 50 feet of which is assessed for this improvement, is a 20-acre tract, having a frontage of 1256 feet along Fiftieth street, where it is proposed to construct this cement sidewalk; that there is not a house or a building of any kind upon it, and that it is an unsubdivided tract of land, and the only use to which it is put is that of a field for raising hay. Only five months before the passage of this ordinance for the construction of a cement sidewalk, the deviser of the appellants in this case, in compliance with a prior ordinance of the city duly passed for that purpose, constructed and put down along the line of this street, in the very place where this cement sidewalk is to be placed, a wood sidewalk 6 feet in width, made of plank laid crosswise on stringers or joists, in strict conformity to the regulations and requirements of the city, and this plank sidewalk, at the time this ordinance on which the present proceedings are based was passed, and at the time this case was heard in the court below, was in good order and condition. The uncontradicted evidence further shows that the street along which it is proposed to construct this cement sidewalk has never been improved by the city. It is neither curbed nor paved, sewered nor watered, surveyed nor graded. If it is to be considered as a street 66 feet wide, then there is a line of telegraph poles planted right through the center of it, and the north 83 feet of it have never been formally dedicated by the owner to public use nor condemned by any municipal corporation, and if the public have any right to it at all, it is a right by prescription or by implied dedication.

Such was and is the condition of this street in front of appellant's property, and yet, as appears from the record of the case, the common council of the city of Chicago, only five months after the construction, at a great expense, of a new plank sidewalk built in conformity with the order of the city council, 1256 feet long, passed a second ordinance ordering this new plank sidewalk torn up and a cement walk, at an assessed expense of $1,915.50 or $1,638.75, put down in its place. It is admitted by the city—at least not denied—that this plank or wooden sidewalk, at the time the ordinance for the cement sidewalk was passed and at the time this case was heard in the court below, was in good order and condition, and will answer equally as well, for the purposes of travel, as a cement walk. Now, can it for a moment be contended that it is not unreasonable, unjust, and oppressive to compel the owner of a vacant 20-acre lot first to construct and pay for a wood sidewalk, and then, within less than six months, and when it is in substantially as good condition as when first built, and in all respects safe, convenient, and sufficient for public use and travel, take it up, throw it away, and put down another in its place at an expense of over $1,600? It seems to us that it cannot be, especially when we take into consideration the fact that the street has never been improved, curbed, graded, paved, or sewered. And further, it is clear, from the evidence in the case, that if this judgment should be affirmed and appellant compelled to take up the wood sidewalk and put down one of cement, the cement sidewalk will be ruined by putting in the house drains every 25 feet along the line of the street, or at least seriously injured, and whenever the street is improved and dwellings are constructed along the line of the walk the walk itself is quite likely to be destroyed.

An ordinance must be reasonable, and if it is unreasonable, unjust, and oppressive the courts will hold it invalid and void. Chicago v. Rumpff, 45 Ill. 90, 92 Am. Dec. 196; Tugman v. Chicago, 78 Ill. 405. The question of the reasonableness or unreasonableness of a municipal ordinance is one for the decision of the court, and in determining that question the court will have regard to all the existing circumstances or contemporaneous conditions, the objects sought to be obtained, and the necessity or want of necessity for its adoption. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, 67 Ill. 87; Lake View v. Tate, 180 Ill. 247, 6 L. R. A. 268; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 327. And even where the power to legislate on a given subject is conferred on a municipal corporation, yet if the details of such legislation are not prescribed by the legislature, there the ordinance passed in pursuance of such power must be a reasonable exercise thereof, or it will be pronounced invalid. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 328; St. Paul v. Colter, 12 Minn. 41, 90 Am. Dec. 278; Dunham v. Rochester, 5 Cow. 462; State v. Belvidere, 44 N. J. L. 350.

In Cooley on Taxation (p. 428), it is said: "A clear case of abuse of legislative authority in imposing the burden of a public improvement on persons or property not specially benefited would undoubtedly be treated as an excess of power, and void." In Allen v. Drew, 44 Vt. 174, the court, by Redfield, J., says: "We have no doubt that a local assessment may so transcend the limits of equality and reason that its exaction would cease to be a tax or contribution to a common burden, and become extortion and confiscation. In that case it would be the duty of the court to protect the citizen from robbery under color of a better name." In Wistar v. Philadelphia, 80 Pa. 505, 31 Am. Rep. 112, Chief Justice Agnew says: "But if we say the city may change its pavements at pleasure, and as often as it please, at the expense of the ground owner, we take a new step, and there must be explicit legislation to authorize such taxation. If, while the pavement is good and stands in no need of repair, the city may tear it up, relay, and charge the owner again with one excessively costly, it would be exaction—not taxation. We are not at liberty to impute such a design to the legislature, unless it has plainly expressed its meaning to do this unjust thing." And in Wistar v. Philadelphia, 111 Pa. 604, it is held that where a property owner has well and properly set curbstones in front of his property, at his own expense, on the proper line, in accordance with the style in common use, and they are in good order and repair, the expense of replacing them with others cannot be provided by an assessment upon his property. In Corrigan v. Gage, 68 Mo. 541, it was held that the ordinance for the paving of the sidewalk there in question was unreasonable and oppressive and subject to judicial inquiry, because such sidewalk was in an uninhabited portion of the city and disconnected with any other street or sidewalk, and the judgment of the court below was reversed. In Bloomington v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 184 Ill. 451, this court held that where the ordinance is grossly unreasonable, unjust, and oppressive, that may be shown in defense of the application for confirmation. In Bloomington v. Latham, 142 Ill. 462, 18 L. R. A. 487, we held that an ordinance directing that the cost of the land taken or damaged, or both, should be assessed upon and collected from the lands abutting upon the proposed alley or street, in proportion to the frontage thereof, was unreasonable and void. And in Davis v. Litchfield, 145 Ill. 30 L. R. A.

313, 31 L. R. A. 568, and Palmer v. Danville, 154 Ill. 156, ordinances levying special taxes for local improvements were held to be unreasonable, arbitrary abuses of power, and void.

The rule is, that it requires a clear and strong case to justify a court in annulling the action of a municipal corporation, acting within the apparent scope of its authority. But in our opinion such a case appears in this record. We think that the ordinance in question, in so far as and to the extent that it affects the property of appellants, is unreasonable, unjust, and oppressive, and therefore void.

The judgment of confirmation as to the property of appellants is reversed, and the ordinance being void as to such property the cause will not be remanded.

Robert W. ORR.

1. The rule that a voter should not be disfranchised or deprived of his right to vote through mere inadvertence, mistake, or ignorance, if an honest intention can be ascertained from his ballot, is not changed by the Illinois ballot law of 1891, which expressly provides in section 26 that his ballot shall not be counted if he "marks more names than there are persons to be elected to an office, or if, for any reason, it is impossible to determine the voter's choice for any office to be filled."
2. The requirement that a ballot be marked by a cross "in the appropriate margin or place opposite the name," made by the Illinois ballot law, § 23 (3 Starr & C. chap. 46, p. 570), is directory, and not mandatory, and under it the voter's intention should be given effect if it can be gathered from his ballot without laying down a rule which may lead to a destruction of its secrecy.
3. The use of a mark or character which furnishes the means to designating persons of avoiding the law as to secrecy will require the rejection of a ballot under the Illinois ballot law, though it contains no prohibition of distinguishing marks, even if the mark or character used indicates an intention to vote a particular party ticket or for certain candidates.
4. An honest attempt to follow the directions of the law requiring a cross to be made in the appropriate margin or place opposite the name on the ballot must appear in order to permit the ballot to be counted.
5. A ballot marked simply by writing the word "Democratic" at the head of the Democratic ticket, or one marked by a single mark across or through the circle or square, or marked with a circle or irregular character within the circle or square, or marked with crosses opposite the names of the candidates, but entirely outside of the squares; as well as a ballot signed by the name of the voter,—must be rejected as disregarding the plain directions of the law requiring the ballot to be marked by a cross in the appropriate margin or place opposite the name, and as furnishing the means whereby the secrecy of the ballot could be destroyed.

6. Imperfect success in marking a cross in the proper place to indicate a choice of candidates, where there was a clear intention to conform to the statute, and not to distinguish the ballot, will not require its rejection.

7. A word which is read by one party as "get" and by the other as "yes," opposite a proposed constitutional amendment, is not regarded as such a distinguishing mark as to prevent counting the ballot for a candidate named on the same ballot.

8. The erasure of names of candidates by pencil marks drawn through them does not constitute a distinguishing mark which requires a rejection of the ballot as to other candidates.

9. The fact that a ballot is marked by a cross in a circle at the head of each of two tickets will not prevent counting the vote for a candidate named on one ticket for an office for which no candidate is named on the other, although it prevents counting the ballot for a candidate for any office for which both tickets present a candidate.

10. A mark on a ballot, which bears no resemblance to a cross, without any attempt to make a cross of any kind on the ballot, will not permit it to be counted.

11. A mark made with ink and somewhat blurred, even if it cannot be said to be a cross strictly speaking, if it shows an attempt to make a cross, may be sufficient to allow the ballot to be counted.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Christian County Court in favor of defendant in a proceeding brought to contest his right to the office of superintendent of schools. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. E. Harrison and Ricks & Creighton, for appellant:

The purposes of the ballot reform act of 1891 were to secure the freedom, purity, and uniformity and secrecy of the ballot in elections.

See title of act, p. 108, Sess. Laws 1891; Sego v. Stoddard, 186 Ind. 297, 23 L. R. A. 468; People v. Onondaga County Canvassers, 129 N. Y. 895, 14 L. R. A. 624; Curran v. Clayton, 86 Me. 42.

The ballot reform act is a radical departure from former methods.

Whittam v. Zahorik, 91 Iowa, —; Curran v. Clayton and Ellis v. Glaser, supra.

The cross, made substantially as that set forth in § 23 of the ballot reform act of 1891, is the only mark that the voter can use to express his choice, and it must be placed in the circle or square, as the law directs.

If another mark be used, there is nothing to certify its meaning.

Re Vote Marks, Ellis v. Glaser, and Whittam v. Zahorik, supra.

A ballot with a straight mark or line in party circle cannot be counted.

Ellis v. Glaser, Curran v. Clayton, and Whittam v. Zahorik, supra.

A ballot with a cross outside the square or circle should not be counted.

Ellis v. Glaser, supra.

A cross near to but outside of the square opposite the name should not be counted.

Whittam v. Zahorik, supra.

A cross under or above the word "Democratic" should not be counted.

A cipher in the circle or square should not be counted.

Whittam v. Zahorik, supra.

A cross made with more than two intersecting straight lines should not be counted.

While the intention of the voter is one of the first purposes of interpretation of ballots, yet the counting of the vote does not depend solely upon the power to ascertain and declare his choice, but also on the expression of that choice in the manner provided by statute.

Although the choice of the voter may be apparent from the face of the ticket, still the vote will not be counted if not expressed in the manner provided by statute.

Any mark placed upon the ballot by the voter other than that provided by the statute, or any mark not necessary to the legal expression of his choice, should vitiate the ballot as a distinguishing mark, as such mark could be used for identification, and thereby violate the secrecy of the ballot and lead to the corruption of the voter.

Messrs. J. C. McBride and Taylor & Abrams, for appellee:

If the statute simply provides that certain acts or things shall be done within a particular time, or in a particular manner, and does not declare that their performance is essential to the validity of the election, then they will be regarded as mandatory if they do, and directory if they do not, affect the actual validity of the election.

There are two classes of marks. One is where a plausible reason is or may be suggested for their existence, consistent with honesty and good faith; the other, where no such reason can be suggested. The former will rarely be allowed to invalidate a ballot, unless it appears that it was in fact used for corrupt purposes. The latter, unexplained, will generally be presumed to be for corrupt purposes.

Rutledge v. Crawford, 91 Cal. 526, 18 L. R. A. 761.

Wilkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding begun in the court below by the appellant, to contest the election of appellee to the office of superintendent of schools of Christian county. It appears from the petition filed that at the November election, 1894, Robert W. Orr was the nominee of the Democratic party, Nina S. White of the Republican party, and Eugene E. Chumley of the People's party; that by the canvass of the votes cast for these candidates, Orr received 8,915, White 8,195, and Chumley 489, whereupon a certificate of election was duly issued to Orr, who qualified and entered upon the duties of the office. Other tickets on the ballot had no candidate for that office.

It is insisted by petitioner that Miss White was in fact legally elected. The grounds of the contest are, that in each voting precinct of the county the judges failed to count a certain number of votes cast for either of the candidates, which should have been counted for White; that they counted for Orr votes which should have been counted for White, and counted votes for Orr not legally cast for him. The answer denies these grounds, and avers that in each of the precincts votes were cast for Orr which should have been, but were not, counted for him; that votes cast for him were counted for White, and that votes were counted for White which were not legally cast for her. On a recount of the ballots the court found that White received 8,168 votes and Orr 8,160, to which no objection was made. There were counted to Chumley 488, and 75 by agreement rejected, as being votes for neither party, leaving 111 in dispute. Of these the court counted 85 to White, 44 to Orr, and rejected the remaining 32 altogether, thus giving Orr a total of 8,204, and White 8,203, and declaring Orr duly elected by a majority of one vote.

It is contended by counsel for appellant that under our statute only a cross can be used upon the ballots to indicate the voter's choice of candidates, which cross must be in the form indicated in the statute and placed in the circle or square, and unless the elector so marks his ballot it must be rejected. In other words, they insist that the language of section 23 of the ballot law of this state (3 Starr & C. chap. 46, p. 570), which says the voter "shall prepare his ballot by making in the appropriate margin or place a cross (X) opposite the name of the candidate of his choice for each office to be filled," etc., is mandatory, and must be strictly complied with, else the ballot is void. They also insist that every mark upon a ballot cast, not necessary to indicate the voter's choice of candidates, as indicated in said section 23, should be treated as a distinguishing mark and render the whole ballot void. In support of these positions several decisions of the courts of other states are cited, but in view of the language of the statutes under which those cases were decided we do not regard them as in point here. For instance, the case of Parvin v. Wimberg, 130 Ind. 561, 15 L. R. A. 775, much relied upon by counsel for appellant, was decided upon a statute of that state, section 45 of which provides that in indicating the voter's choice of candidates a stamp shall be used by stamping the square immediately preceding their names, and it was held the use of the stamp and the placing it in and upon the square were mandatory. Section 23 of our statute does not say with what the cross shall be made, neither does it mention squares or circles opposite the names of candidates, but requires the cross to be made "in the appropriate margin or place opposite the name," etc. If the desire is to vote for all the candidates of a party, the cross is to be placed at the "appropriate place preceding the appellation or title of such party," etc., nothing being said about a circle. It is true that by construing section 14, prescribing the form of the ballot, with section 28, it appears that by "appropriate margin or place" is meant the circle or square on the ballot; but there is not, as in the Indiana statute, a direct command that the cross shall be made in a square or circle. Neither does our statute, as we construe it, prescribe the form of the cross to be used. It provides that it shall be "by making . . . a cross (X) opposite the name," etc. Manifestly, placing the capital X in parenthesis was merely to indicate to the voter how the cross might be made, and it cannot be seriously insisted that the statute commands the cross to be so made. That is to say, even if it were held that the statute is mandatory, its requirements would be satisfied by complying with the language, "by making a cross," in either of three forms, viz., in the form of a capital X, as indicated in the statute; in a form similar to a capital I, or by a crossing of two lines thus X. See Webster's International Dictionary, defining "cross." There is therefore a manifest difference in the requirement that a voter shall use a stamp, furnished for that purpose, to indicate his choice of candidates, and that he shall make a cross. A failure to use the stamp is a positive violation of the law; a failure to make a distinct, well-formed cross may be the result of inability or inadvertence. It would be impracticable, therefore, to give effect to our statute construed to be mandatory as to the form of the cross to be made to indicate the voter's choice.

It has always been held in this state that if the intention of the voter can be fairly ascertained from his ballot, though not in strict conformity with law, effect will be given to that intention,—in other words, that the voter shall not be disfranchised or deprived of his right to vote through mere inadvertence, mistake, or ignorance, if an honest intention can be ascertained from his ballot. See McKinnon v. People, 110 Ill. 805; Bahrensmeyer v. Kreitz, 185 Ill. 591. The ballot law of 1891 does not, in our opinion, change the rule in this regard unless to give effect to such intention would tend to destroy the secrecy of the ballot. On the contrary, section 26 expressly provides: "If the voter marks more names than there are persons to be elected to an office, or if, for any reason, it is impossible to determine the voter's choice for any office to be filled, his ballot shall not be counted for such office,"—plainly meaning that if the voter's choice can be ascertained from his ballot it shall be counted, if it can be done consistently with other provisions and the object of the act. It was the intention of this amendment, as expressed in its title, to provide for the printing and distribution of ballots at public expense, for the nomination of candidates for public offices, to regulate the manner of holding elections and to enforce the secrecy of the ballot. "Wherever our statutes do not expressly declare that particular informalities do not avoid the ballot, it would seem best to consider their requirements as directory only. The whole purpose of the ballot as an institution is to obtain a correct expression of intention, and if in a given case the intention is clear, it is an entire misconception of the purpose of the requirements to treat them as essentials,—that is, as objects in themselves, and not merely as means." Wigmore, Australian Ballot System, 2d ed. p. 195. To say that any mark on a ballot other than a cross in the proper place makes it void is to go beyond the language of the statute and in direct conflict with section 26, supra.

The statute being directory, and not mandatory, as to the manner of voting prescribed in section 28, it remains to be determined what is its proper construction. In settling this question two objects must be kept in view, viz., the secrecy of the ballot, and the intention of the voter. It was evidently the intention of the legislature to declare what should absolutely destroy a ballot or prevent its being counted by section 26, supra: "If the voter marks more names than there are persons to be elected to an office, or if, for any reason, it is impossible to determine the voter's choice for any office to be filled, his ballot shall not be counted for such office. No ballot without the official indorsement shall be allowed to be deposited in the ballot box, and none but ballots provided in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be counted." Observing this mandatory language, if a voter's intention can be gathered from his ballot, without laying down a rule which may lead to a destruction of its secrecy, that intention should be given effect. Nothing is said in the act about distinguishing marks, but if a mark or character is used which, though indicating an intention to vote a particular party ticket or for certain candidates, at the same time serves the purpose of indicating who voted it, thereby furnishing the means to designing persons of evading the law as to secrecy, the ballot should be rejected. It logically follows that the voter's intention must be manifested by a cross, substantially in the place designated, which the judges of elections, or the court on a recount, can see was an honest attempt to follow the directions of the law. For instance, on one of the ballots cast at this election the voter simply wrote at the head of the Democratic ticket the word "Democratic." On others a single mark was made across or through the circle or square. On others a circle within the circle or square was made, and on still others irregular characters were so used. On one ballot crosses were made opposite the names of candidates, but entirely outside of the squares. In those there was no attempt by the voter to indicate his choice by making a cross in the appropriate place. On another, seemingly regular in other respects, the name "Martin Lynch" is signed at the bottom. These marks and names may tend to show an intention on the part of the voter to vote tickets so marked, but they disregard the plain directions of the law, and furnish the means whereby the secrecy of the ballot could be destroyed. Therefore we think all such ballots were properly rejected by the court below. On the other hand, ballots appear in the record on which it is clear that the voter attempted to make a cross in the proper place to indicate his choice of candidates, but succeeded more or less imperfectly. It being clear, in such cases, that the intention was to conform to the statute, and not to distinguish the ballot, they were properly counted.

On one of the ballots, opposite the word "yes," on the proposed constitutional amendment submitted, the word "get," as read by counsel for appellant, was written in the square, opposing counsel insisting that the word was meant for "yes." It is insisted by counsel for appellant that this word, as used, is as much a distinguishing mark as is the name "Martin Lynch" to the ballot above referred to. We do not think so. The name signed to the ballot could serve but one purpose, namely, to indicate who voted the ballot; the word "yes" or "get" tended to indicate the voter's choice upon the proposition submitted; and that it served the further purpose of distinguishing the ballot, is, to say the least, a very remote conjecture.

On several of the ballots counted for either candidate, names of candidates were erased by drawing a pencil through them, and these, it is insisted, are invalid because of distinguishing marks. What we have already said referring to section 26 is a sufficient answer to this contention.

Applying the rules indicated, to the ballots in this record, we find that of the thirty-two rejected all were properly excluded except eight, four of which should have been counted for each of these candidates. In these the voters made a well-defined cross in the Democratic or Republican circle at the head of the ticket (four in each), but also made a cross in another circle opposite a party name on which there was no candidate for superintendent of schools. While such ballots could not be counted for candidates upon both tickets, because the voter in that case marked more names than there were persons to be elected to the office, that rule cannot apply to these candidates,—that is to say, where a voter made a cross in the Republican circle and did the same in the Independent Republican circle, on which last-named ticket there was no candidate for superintendent of schools, he did not mark more names than there were persons to be elected to that office, but expressed his choice for Miss White. And so where a voter made a cross in the Democratic circle but did the same in the People's silver circle, on which there was no candidate for the office, the vote should have been counted for Orr.

Of the disputed votes counted for Orr, one was marked in the Democratic circle with a character like this:  and had no other marks upon it.* We are unable to discover in the mark any resemblance to a cross, or see wherein the voter attempted to make a cross of any kind, and therefore, under the rule laid down, the ballot should have been rejected.

It is earnestly insisted that another ballot counted for Orr, marked in the Democratic circle in this way:  should have been rejected. The marks were made with ink, and while it is somewhat blurred, and cannot be said to be a cross, strictly speaking, still we think it shows an attempt on the part of the voter to make such a mark, and was therefore properly counted. But if it were otherwise, the result which we reach upon the whole record would not be changed, because on one of those counted for Miss White the mark in the Republican circle is like this:

Certainly there is no more reason for saying that one of these characters was intended for a cross than the other. We think they were both properly counted.

On three of the tickets counted for Miss White a cross was made in the Republican circle, but on one of them the name "R. W. Orr" and on the other two "Robert W. Orr" was written under the name "Nina S. White," and a cross made in the square opposite, but extending somewhat below her name. It would seem that the voter in each of these cases intended to vote the Republican ticket, except for Miss White, but to vote for Orr as against her. If the cross in the square opposite the name "White" had been made directly opposite that of Orr, the vote would, under the provisions of the statute and our recent decision in Sanner v. Patton, 155 Ill. 553, have been a regular vote for Orr. We are, however, of the opinion that it is, to say the least, uncertain from these ballots which of the candidates the voter intended to vote for, and therefore, under section 26, supra, they should not have been counted for either.

Our conclusion then is, that, in any view of the case presented, appellee was entitled to his certificate of election, having at least a majority of three votes. The judgment of the county court must therefore be affirmed.

It may properly be added that it is the duty of every voter, under this law, to ascertain and follow the provisions of the statute and the directions of the secretary of state in his instructions sent out with the ballots, and that whenever, either through negligence or wilfulness, he disregards that duty, he does so at the peril of losing his vote.

Judgment affirmed.

*The above characters are fac similes of the marks on the original ballots.

1. Gifts to charitable uses are excluded from the operation of the rule against perpetuities by the statute of 43 Ill. chap. 4, which is in force in Illinois.
2. A gift to the rector, church wardens, and vestrymen of an unincorporated religious society, in trust to pay the salary of the rectors of the parish forever, or for church purposes only, is for a charitable use.
3. Incorporation of a church society cannot be presumed merely because the statute prescribes a mode by which such societies may incorporate.
4. The fact that many unincorporated church societies have been in existence is a matter of common knowledge.
5. An unincorporated church society is not affected by a statute limiting the quantity of real estate which can be held by incorporated church societies.

(November 1, 1893.)

APPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Kane County in favor of defendants in an action brought to set aside a conveyance by complainants' testator to the defendant church of certain real estate. Affirmed.

Statement by Carter, J.:

Appellants filed their bill in equity in the circuit court of De Kalb county, at the October term, 1888, to set aside two certain deeds and for partition of the real estate purporting to be conveyed by said deeds. A change of venue was taken to the circuit court of Kane county, where a hearing was had and the bill dismissed for want of equity.

The bill represents that on or about September 10, 1877, James S. Waterman, late of said De Kalb county, was the owner in fee simple of the following described real estate: Lots 9, 10, 11, and 12, in J. S. and J. C. Waterman's subdivision of lots 1, 2, 8, and 4, of block 24, of the original village of Sycamore, in said De Kalb county, containing $\frac{10}{16}$ of an acre of land; that on that day said James S. Waterman, and Abbie L. Waterman, his then wife, now also deceased, made and delivered to the rector, church wardens, and vestrymen of St. Peter's parish, in the city of Sycamore and the diocese of Illinois, otherwise known as "St. Peter's parish in the city of Sycamore and the diocese of Illinois," a deed of conveyance of said lots; that on the 11th day of December, 1877, said grantors also executed a deed of conveyance of a farm in said De Kalb county, containing 160 acres of land, to said grantee, the express condition in each being "the love and affection" grantors have and bear unto the Protestant Episcopal Church and said parish. The deed of the town lots contains the following exception and reservation: "Excepting and reserving therefrom, during the lifetime of the grantors herein and the survivor of them, the rents, profits, and use and income of the two dwelling houses situated on said lots, and such suitable quantity of land immediately about them as may be necessary to the proper enjoyment of the same, with the right to improve and repair said houses, but not to remove or destroy them, said premises to be used for church purposes only, and not sold or encumbered, and shall revert to the grantors, their heirs and assigns, whenever this condition is broken." And the deed of the farm contained a condition and reservation in the following words: "This conveyance is made upon the express condition and trust that the rents, issues, and profits of the above-described land be devoted to and used for the payment, so far as it may go, of the salary of the rectors of said parish forever, and for no other purpose; and this conveyance is accepted upon the express understanding and agreement that the title hereby conveyed shall immediately revert to and be vested in the party of the first part, his heirs, executors, and administrators, when the income from said land shall be diverted to any other purpose, excepting and reserving therefrom, during the lifetime of the grantors herein and the survivor of them, the rents, profits, and use of the above-described land."

James S. Waterman died July 19, 1888, leaving a will, under which appellants were appointed and are still acting as testamentary trustees. He left also a widow surviving, who died before this bill was filed, and her representatives and devisees are now parties defendant.

The bill proceeds on the theory that said conveyances were and are absolutely void, because contrary to the laws of the state of Illinois in relation to the creation of perpetuities, and because the grantee, as a religious society, could not, under the statute, take more than 10 acres of land, and it is alleged that, by reason of the premises, Waterman, at the time of his death, still remained and was owner of all of said lands; that the said Abbie L. Waterman, widow of the said James S. Waterman, renounced, under said will, the provision therein made in her favor, and there being no issue of the said James S. Waterman, the said widow elected to take one half of all the real estate, and that she thereby became and was, at the time of her death, the owner of an undivided one half of all of said real estate; that under and by virtue of the terms of said will complainants became the holders of the legal title of an undivided one half of all of said land in trust for the uses and purposes mentioned in said will. The bill further alleges that the said St. Peter's parish is, and was at the times of the execution and delivery of the said deeds of conveyance, a corporation formed for religious purposes under the laws of the state of Illinois for the incorporation of religious societies, and that under such laws the quantity of land mentioned and described in the deed of conveyance secondly above referred to could not, at the time of the execution and delivery of said deed, be owned or held by said St. Peter's parish, nor could the grantees in said deed take, or hold the lands therein attempted to be conveyed for the purposes therein mentioned, and that for this reason also said last-mentioned deed was and is utterly void.

The answer denied the allegation that St. Peter's parish is, and was at the time of the execution of said deed, a corporation formed for religious purposes under the laws of the state of Illinois for the incorporation of religious societies; and on its becoming known that the allegation in the bill as to the incorporation of the church could not be made clear by the proofs, the complainants filed an amendment to the bill in the following words:

"Your orators further represent that it is claimed and pretended by the said St. Peter's parish that it was never incorporated as herein charged, but your orators charge that the contrary thereof is the fact, as herein shown. Your orators charge, however, and insist, that if in fact it should appear on the hearing hereof that said St. Peter's parish was not an incorporated organization, as herein stated, nevertheless it was at and long before the times of the delivery of the said deeds, and has been continually ever since, a church organization, formed and subsisting for religious purposes only, and to promote and advance the peculiar tenets of the religious sect known throughout Illinois as the Protestant Episcopal Church, and belonging to the diocese aforesaid from and about the time of organization, to wit, 1856, and differed from other churches of this state, members of said diocese, only in the lack of such corporate entity, and in virtue and effect, and to all intents and purposes, was precisely the same as if it had been duly incorporated, excepting only the legal, technical fact that it had not complied with the statute of the state of Illinois in filing its certificate of organization with the recorder of said De Kalb county, and therefore is and was within the statute of this state and the policy of its laws prohibiting religious corporations from owning and holding lands in excess of a stated amount, or it should be held, under the law, incapable of taking or holding title to any real estate whatever."

This paragraph was demurred to and the demurrer sustained, leaving the cause to go to a hearing on the rest of the bill. The bill further alleged that the condition contained in said first-mentioned deed has been broken because the lands described have been used for other than church purposes, and that if any title ever passed by said deed, such title has, by reason of the breking of such condition, reverted, as provided in said deed.

The parish was organized in 1856 as a part of the machinery of the diocese of Illinois. At that time its purposes were religious altogether, and it has generally been maintained as a parish and church organization since that time. Some of the early records of De Kalb county and the early records of the church were missing and could not be produced on the trial. No certificate of organization of the church was found.

Mr. William R. Plum, for appellants:

A voluntary society organized for religious purposes is entitled to no greater right to hold lands in this state than corporations authorized by law, even if in fact it can hold any land in perpetuity. Public policy at least forbids it.

Messrs. Botsford & Wayne for appellees.

Carter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The trial court found that the defendant society was not a corporation, and did not come within the provisions of the statute prohibiting corporations formed for religious worship from holding more than 10 acres of land, and found also that the condition of the first deed conveying the lots in question for church purposes only, had not been broken by the renting of such lots and using the rents for church purposes. After a careful consideration of the evidence, and the law applicable thereto, we are satisfied that the case was correctly decided by the learned chancellor in the circuit court.

It has been repeatedly held by this court that the statute 43 Elizabeth (chap. 4) is in force in this state, and that gifts to charitable uses are, by force of that statute, excluded from the operation of the rule against perpetuities. Heuser v. Harris, 43 Ill. 425; Andrews v. Andrews, 110 Ill. 223; Orerar v. Williams, 145 Ill. 625, 21 L. R. A. 454. It is also established that a gift for the support of churches, or to pay the expense of preaching any particular religious doctrine, comes within the equity, and therefore within the spirit, of that statute, as a gift for a charitable use. Andrews v. Andrews, and Orerar v. Williams, supra; Hunt v. Fowler, 121 Ill. 269.

It is true that the questions presented for decision by this record, so far as they (or those of a kindred nature) have heretofore come before this court for consideration, have arisen under wills, and not deeds. But we do not understand the counsel for appellants to insist that the deeds in question are void on the ground that, being made to the officers of an unincorporated society in trust for such society or its members or directly to such unincorporated society, there was no grantee capable, in law, of taking by deed. If the grant were not one made as a gift for a charitable or pious use, and so not brought within the saving provisions of the statute of 43 Elizabeth, it might be contended that the deeds would be void for want of a grantee capable of taking. German Land Assn. v. Scholler, 10 Minn. 381. But we are of the opinion, conceding that the religious society in question was not incorporated, that the conveyances were made to the rector, church wardens, and vestrymen of the society in their official capacity, in trust for a designated charitable and pious use, and are within the provisions of the statute in question, and are not void for want of a grantee capable of taking by deed, but will be upheld and enforced in equity, unless rendered invalid upon other grounds urged by counsel and referred to below. Judd v. Woodruff, 2 Root, 298; 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 804; Ferraria v. Vasconcellos, 31 Ill. 25.

The conveyances in question were made to the rector, church wardens, and vestrymen of this unincorporated religious society, the one 30 L. R. A.

conveying the 180 acres being "upon the express condition and trust that the rents, issues, and profits be devoted to and used for the payment, so far as it may go, of the salary of the rectors of said parish forever," and the other, conveying the lots, being upon condition that they were to be used for church purposes only. Both were given for the consideration of love and affection for the church and parish. It is clear that these conveyances constituted a gift in trust for a charitable use. Ferraria v. Vasconcellos, 31 Ill. 456; 31 Ill. 26; 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 805-809. And in such a case a court of equity will be inclined to lend its aid in carrying out the purpose of the donor and to give effect to the trust, if it can be done consistently with existing laws. The questions so far considered have been so often and so uniformly decided that we deem any further discussion of them, and citation of authority in support of the position here assumed, unnecessary.

It is, however, contended—and this is the principal question in the case—that this society should be held to be an incorporated church or religious society under the laws of this state, or if it be not held to be a corporation, still, inasmuch as incorporated religious societies are, by the statute, prohibited from taking or holding more than 10 (now 20) acres of land, that on the grounds of public policy the prohibition must extend to all such societies, whether incorporated or not.

In support of the first branch of this contention, it is said that by the statute in relation to the incorporation of religious societies in force at the time of the organization of the church in 1856, viz., the Act of 1845, chap. 25, p. 120 (see 1 Adams & D. Real Estate Stat. p. 842), it was made the duty of the society, or its trustees, to make and file with the recorder of deeds the certificate required by section 45 of that Act, and thus become incorporated; and it is further said that because of the destruction of one of the early records of the church, and also one of the early records of De Kalb county, it is left uncertain whether the duty imposed by the statute was performed or not, and that the presumption must be indulged that the duty imposed by the statute was performed, the law complied with, the certificate made and filed, and the society thus duly incorporated. It is, however, evident that the statute in question did not make it obligatory upon all voluntary religious societies to become incorporated, but merely prescribed the mode by which they might incorporate, and there being no evidence that this society ever took any of the steps prescribed by the statute to become incorporated, or that it ever assumed to act as a corporation, it would be carrying the doctrine of presumptive evidence too far to presume such incorporation. It is a matter of common knowledge that there have been in existence in this state many such unincorporated societies, and so far as the evidence discloses this was one of them. In Ferraria v. Vasconcellos, supra, where this court held that the steps taken in attempting to incorporate a religious societly under the act of 1845 were insufficient to create a corporation, Mr. Justice Walker said (p. 456): "The statute must be at least substantially complied with in its provisions, and all of its express requirements must be observed. We have no power to dispense with such requirements, and render illegal acts valid and binding. It is not within the province of the court to question the propriety of such requirements when imposed by the legislature, and in this case they are few, simple, and easily performed. But whether they are the most salutary is not a question which we can consider; they have been imposed as a condition to the organization of these corporations, and must be performed before corporate rights can attach. And this is expressly declared to be the legislative will by the latter clause of the 49th section."

The contention that public policy requires that the statutory limitation on the power to take and hold real estate should be imposed on these unincorporated religious societies by judicial decree, is, we think, equally untenable. Upon becoming incorporated certain legal rights are acquired and certain burdens assumed, as provided by the statute. Without incorporating, these societies cannot exercise these rights that pertain to corporations, and they ought not to be required to assume the corresponding burdens,—at least unless the statute so directs. As pointed out in Ferraria v. Vasconcellos, supra, and other cases, there are marked distinctions in the powers, property rights, and duties of the two kinds of organizations. Robertson v. Bullions, 11 N. Y. 248. There are many corporations closely allied to these church organizations which have been held not subject to the 10-acre limitation, yet it might, as reasonably as here, be contended that public policy requires that they be included in what is usually denominated religious corporations, or corporations organized for religious worship. Hamsher v. Hamsher, 132 Ill. 273, 8 L. R. A. 556; Gilmer v. Stone, 120 U. S. 586, 30 L. ed. 784; Germain v. Baltes, 118 Ill. 29. In Andrews v. Andrews, supra, it was urged that public policy requires that the value as well as the number of acres should be limited, but it was there said that it was "a sufficient answer to say that the statute has authorized such bodies to acquire and hold not exceeding 10 acres of land, without any limit as to value or income." Yet 10 acres of land in some parts of the state might not be of much value, while in a large city it would be worth many millions. It is for the lawmaking power to determine what the limit shall be and upon what bodies it shall be imposed, and unless that power imposes on unincorporated religious societies the same restrictions it has placed upon those becoming incorporated, it is not within the province of the courts to do so.

The decrees of the Circuit Court will be affirmed.

I. In favor of creditors.

The general rule is that no one but a judgment creditor is entitled to an injunction against judgments taken against his debtor by others, but on 80 L. R. A.

this question there is some conflict. This does not appear to have been discussed in the case of JOHN V. FARWELL CO. v. HILBERT, but the question there was as to the right of a general creditor to attack a judgment by confession entered against the debtor on the ground of irregularities, and the court properly held that no one but the debtor himself could attack a judgment on such grounds.

In regard to the right of a general creditor to obtain an injunction in aid of his attachment against judgments confessed by the debtor, there is a conflict of authority, the determination being largely controlled by a number of cases, on the question as to the right of a creditor to attack fraudulent conveyances, many of which are not injunction cases. Where a creditor has a lien by virtue of an attachment, the weight of authority seems to be in favor of his right to obtain an injunction, but this must be taken in connection with the rule of law in each state as to the general right of a creditor to set aside fraudulent conveyances.

Some cases hold that an attaching creditor having a lien on the property is entitled to an injunction against the proceedings on the judgment fraudu-unless such judgment is shown to be unjust or inequitable.

(November 23, 1895.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Dodge County in favor of defendants in an action brought to set aside certain judgments, and execution levies thereon, which were alleged to have been wrongfully confessed in fraud of plaintiff's rights. Affirmed.

Statement by Pinney, J. :

This action was brought to set aside two judgment notes and judgments entered thereon, and levies of execution made to satisfy the same, namely, a judgment note in favor of Lucy Ellen Hilbert against the defendants G. B. Hilbert and H. M. Johnson, for $5,423.19, dated August 27, 1893, upon which judgment was entered in her favor against them in the circuit court for Dodge county, December 30, 1893, for $5,421.51; and a judgment note in favor of the defendant James J. Hilbert against the defendant G. B. Hilbert for $2,105.05, dated December 11, 1893, upon which judgment was entered in his favor against said G. B. Hilbert, in the same court, on the 30th day of December, 1893, for $2,140.60. These executions were levied by the defendant Peters, sheriff of Dodge county, on the same day. The judgments were entered upon the stock of merchandise of the defendant G. B. Hilbert, which was sold thereunder, and the money realized was $4,500. It appeared that the plaintiff was also a creditor of the said G. B. Hilbert and H. M. Johnson for goods sold and delivered to lently confessed by the debtor to other parties. Blum v. Schram, 58 Tex. 324; People v. Van Buren, 136 N. Y. 252, 20 L. R. A. 446; Keller v. Payne, 10 N. Y. S. R. 245.

In People v. Van Buren, supra, it was held that an attaching creditor is entitled to an injunction restraining an execution sale of the debtor's property on judgments fraudulently confessed, where such debtor is insolvent, distinguishing the prior case of Thurber v. Blanck, 50 N. Y. 30, which was a case of an attaching creditor attempting to reach equitable assets, and the statute requiring the return of an execution unsatisfied as a condition precedent. Although there is much conflict of authority in other states as to the standing of an attaching creditor, this case holds that an attaching creditor ceases to occupy the defenseless position of a creditor at large, and becomes in a certain sense invested with the privileges of a creditor whose debt has been adjudged valid, and who finds himself embarrassed in its collection by fraudulent conduct of the debtor.

And attaching creditors are entitled to an injunction against execution sale under fraudulent judgments confessed in favor of other creditors, as they cannot maintain an action of replevin against the sheriff, the writ of execution giving him the right to possession, and an action against purchasers, if insolvent, would afford no redress, and they are not entitled to appear and plead in the action at law. Gerry v. Sharpe, 8 Fed. Rep. 15.

And where a merchant was induced to sell on credit, and by fraud and collusion of the debtor judgment notes were given to another party, and levy made on the goods sold, this is such fraud as will entitle the vendor to an injunction against such sale. Ibid.

A judgment creditor is entitled to an injunction against proceedings under a judgment fraudulently and subsequently confessed by his debtor to other persons to prevent the collection of the complainant's judgment. Oakley v. Young, 6 N. J. Eq. 453.

And an injunction was granted at the instance of a creditor on the ground that the debtor had fraudulently executed a bond, and was about to confess judgment in order to defeat his creditor. Mahaney v. Lazier, 16 Md. 69.

So, judgments by confession which are fraudulent as to other creditors will authorize injunction against an execution sale of personal property, made to deprive creditors of their rights, where the debt was not yet due, and was secured by a real-estate mortgage; and the fraud will dispense with the deposit of the amount required by 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 190, § 147. Burns v. Morse, 6 Paige, 108.

And a trust fund assigned for creditors will be protected by enjoining an execution sale, under 30 L. R. A. judgments confessed that are void under N. Y. Laws 1887, chap. 503, forbidding preferences. Spelman v. Jaffray, 22 Abb. N. C. 815; Wilcox v. Payne, 1077 Riessner v. Cohn, 10, 312.

So, under Illinois assignment act of 1887, § 12, providing that all preferences shall be void, judgments by confession entered just prior to an assignment for creditors and in fraud thereof may be enjoined at the instance of a creditor, where the assignee for creditors refuses to institute such suit. Preston v. Spaulding, 120 Ill. 214.

So, trust funds assigned for creditors will be protected by enjoining a sale under judgments confessed preferring one of the officers of a corporation. Harding v. Flake, 25 Abb. N. C. 848. See also Thomas v. Watson, Taney, C. C. 297, infra, IV.

And judgments by confession and the levy thereunder will be enjoined at the instance of a creditor, where the same is in contravention of the assignment act and fraudulent, and the assignee refuses to attack the same. Lindauer v. Lang, 29 Ill. App. 188.

An assignee for creditors is not a proper party defendant in an action by a creditor to enjoin a sale under judgments fraudulently confessed to defeat creditors, where it is claimed that the assignment is also fraudulent, as the remedy is by removing the assignee if he is not acting in good faith. Artman v. Giles, 155 Pa. 409.

Where a judgment against a grantor was purchased, and the grantee of an undivided part of the land told the purchaser of the judgment that it was valid, and that the amount thereof was due, asked delay in issuing execution, and thereafter the grantee, to defeat such execution, confessed a judgment to another party, having full notice of complainant's priority, the same will be set aside as a cloud on the title, preventing a sale for full value under the prior judgment. Oakley v. Young, 6 N. J. Eq. 453.

A partnership lien creditor may enjoin judgments confessed by his debtor to another party, where the debt was not due, as N. J. Rev. Stat. 946, § 5, prohibits a judgment on confession where it is not due. Blackwell v. Rankin, 7 N. J. Eq. 153. See Christy v. Sherman, 10 Iowa, 535, infra, VII.

Other cases refuse an injunction in favor of a creditor against judgments confessed by the debtor to others, and this refusal is on the ground that he is not a judgment creditor, or that he has a remedy at law, or that the judgment confessed is not fraudulent or unjust.

Attaching creditors cannot enjoin a sale under a judgment fraudulently confessed by his debtor, as they have a standing to rule the sheriff to pay the proceeds into court, and there question the validity of the confessed judgment. Artman v. Giles, 155 Pa. 409.

them while engaged in the mercantile business, to the amount of $946.79, for which it had caused a writ of attachment to be issued in its action against said Hilbert & Johnson, in the same court, and delivered to the sheriff of said county to be levied on the same stock of merchandise; and it was alleged that Hilbert & Johnson, on the 80th day of December, 1898, were insolvent, and unless the court should enjoin the payment of the proceeds of said stock of goods in satisfaction of said executions in favor of the defendants Lucy Ellen Hilbert and James J. Hilbert until it could recover judgment on its demand and intervene to claim said money, the plaintiff's claim and remedy to collect it out of said stock or the proceeds thereof, would be lost. It was further alleged that said defendant Lucy Ellen Hilbert is the wife of the defendant James J. Hilbert, and that they are the parents of G. B. Hilbert; that on or about August 20, 1892, said G. B. Hilbert and H. M. Johnson formed a partnership to carry on the mercantile business at Waupun, and that the defendant Lucy Ellen Hilbert purchased a stock of goods for her said son to start him in said business, and it was claimed that the money so used for that purpose was a gift to him; that on or about the 12th of January, 1893, said Hilbert & Johnson obtained credit of the plaintiff to the amount of $2,417.53, upon which a balance of $946.79 still remains unpaid, on the representation that they were the sole owners of the stock, and had paid for the same in cash, and owed no debts except such as they had incurred, since their purchase, for goods in their business, and that the said Lucy Ellen

In Martin v. Michael, 23 Mo. 50, 66 Am. Dec. 656, it was held that an attaching creditor before judgment was not entitled to an injunction against proceedings on the judgment confessed by his debtor to another, but in Hulett v. Stockwell, 27 Mo. App. 323, which was not against a judgment on confession, it was held that a landlord having a lien was entitled to an injunction to protect the removal of the property.

And in Rollins v. Van Baalen, 56 Mich. 610, an injunction was refused against proceedings under judgments obtained by fraudulent confession in favor of other parties against their debtors, where complainant had only a claim under attachment.

The fact that security was given and judgment confessed to a director of a corporation will not authorize setting the same aside at suit of the receiver on the ground of being fraudulent, but under N. J. Nix, Dig. 371, § 9, such judgment confessed in contemplation of insolvency will not be allowed to have any priority over other claims. Stratton v. Allen, 16 N. J. Eq. 223. See also Kilgore v. Nicholson, 26 La. Ann. 683, infra, VI.

A judgment confessed by a third party to indemnify a surety cannot be impeached in a collateral attack by a creditor of the principal where it is claimed to be fraudulent but the creditor has not established his claim or lien. Philadelphia v. Dobson, 10 Pa. Co. Ct. 34.

And a general creditor is not entitled to an injunction. Kelly v. Herb, 137 Pa. 41.

And in Shedd v. Bank of Brattleboro, 22 Vt. 709, it was held that irregularities in a writ of attachment, and that a judgment was confessed by one partner against all the firm, will not be ground for enjoining the judgment on complaint of a judgment creditor, as the complainant cannot take advantage of irregularities.

An injunction will not be granted in favor of a judgment creditor against a judgment confessed by one member of a firm, where the other member consents to such confession, unless the same is shown to be unjust and inequitable, as the same rule applies as in case of want of service of process, and there is a remedy in the law court. Hier v. Kaufman, 134 Ill. 215.

Under the Colorado statutes, giving an attaching creditor a conditional lien from the time of the levy, a partnership creditor, having levied a valid attachment on property of an insolvent firm, is entitled to an injunction against a judgment confessed by the firm to others, that is not recorded as required by the statute, and that is fraudulent. Schuster v. Rader, 13 Colo. 329.

In Uhlfelder v. Levy, 9 Cal. 607, it was said that the only exception to the rule forbidding one court to enjoin the judgment of another would be where a debtor confessed a fraudulent judgment in different courts, and an injunction would be granted to prevent the necessity of the creditors bringing a suit in each different court.

Where a creditor obtained an injunction to set aside a judgment confessed by his debtor on the ground of fraud, and also issued an execution and levied on the property of his debtor, the court required the creditor to make an election to stay his execution during the continuance of the injunction or to dissolve the injunction, and the creditor refusing to elect, the injunction was dissolved. Livingston v. Kane, 3 Johns. Ch. 224.

II. For irregularities.

If the irregularity is so great as to render the judgment void, it seems that an injunction will be granted; but no one except the debtor is entitled to complain if the debt is just, and an injunction will be refused if there is an adequate remedy at law.

So, a judgment by confession upon a forged note and warrant of attorney will be void, and proceedings under an execution sale thereon will be enjoined. Bullen v. Dawson, 129 Ill. 633.

And an order of seizure and sale on a judgment by confession was enjoined where the confession of the judgment, power of attorney, certificate, and affidavit of the justice, taken in another state, were not in compliance with law, and the identity of the notes with this on which judgment was confessed was not shown, and there is a defense to the action. Chambless v. Atchison, 2 La. Ann. 433.

The execution of a void judgment entered on confession by a married woman where it is not within some of the causes allowing an action against her, will be enjoined. Hoffman v. Shupp, 80 Md. 611.

And under Md. act 1872, chap. 370, providing that a married woman may be sued jointly with her husband on a joint contract, a judgment by confession on a joint power of attorney on a debt that is not joint is void, and proceedings will be enjoined as to the wife. Lowe-kamp v. Koehling, 64 Md. 96.

An execution will not be enjoined where it issues upon confession in a supersedeas which is not dated as required by Md. Stat. 1825, chap. 223, § 2, providing that the date of confession shall be a part of entry. Dilley v. Shipley, 4 Gill. 43.

Under Tenn. act 1831, chap. 23, providing that judgments confessed or suffered by an administrator within six months after his qualification shall be void, and it shall be his duty to plead Tenn. act 1829, chap. 53, providing that they shall not be liable to answer in that time, a judgment taken within that time in a suit begun before the death of the obligor, where no plea was made in bar, will not be enjoined, as the word "void" is construed to mean that if judgment is taken on confession

Hilbert knew of such representations, and that the plaintiff trusted Hilbert & Johnson, relying on the same; that she conspired with them to keep secret the existence of her said judgment note against them, and that it was understood that, if the said business was not successful, she could, by collusive and fraudulent confession of judgment in her favor, absorb the stock and secure the same, or the avails thereof, to her use, and cheat and defraud the creditors of Hilbert & Johnson. Various other matters were alleged to show that the dealings of Hilbert & Johnson and of Lucy Ellen Hilbert in relation to said stock of goods were fraudulent as against the creditors of Hilbert & Johnson. It was also alleged that both of said judgments were entered by collusion by and between the said Lucy Ellen Hilbert and James J. Hilbert and their said son, G. B. Hilbert,—C. E. Hooker, Esq., acting, in the recovery thereof, for the respective plaintiffs, so that they might secure to themselves the proceeds of said stock on said judgments, to the prejudice of all the other creditors; that the answer of confession in each of said proceedings purported to be signed by J. J. Dick, Esq., as attorney for the defendants, but were not, in fact signed by him or by any person authorized by him, or by the defendants or either of them, and that said judgments were therefore void. The defendants Lucy Ellen Hilbert and James J. Hilbert answered the complaint, putting in issue all the allegations of fraud and collusion in the complaint, and insisting that their judgments were founded upon bona fide debts for moneys advanced, and were not gifts to G. B.

or default it will be inoperative during that time. Roche v. Washington, 7 Humph. 142.

So, an execution on a judgment by confession which was not entered in the judgment book may be enjoined upon principles of equity, at the suit of the third party prejudiced thereby. Schuster v. Rader, 13 Colo. 329.

But a judgment upon a warrant of attorney to secure a contingent liability is not void or will not be enjoined on the ground that the plaintiff's affidavit annexed to the complaint was defective, where the insufficiency is not clearly shown, and complainant does not show that the judgment is wrong. Relley v. Johnston, 22 Wis. 279.

And judgments by confession by a corporation will not be enjoined because entered upon defective warrants of attorney, where no valid defense to the same is shown, under Ill. Rev. Stat. 1874, chap. 69, § 7, providing that only so much of a judgment at law shall be enjoined as the complainant shall show himself not equitably bound to pay; and besides there is a remedy in the court at law or by a writ of error. Burch v. West, 124 Ill. 258, affirming, 38 Ill. App. 369.

A judgment by confession, including an attorney's fees under an agreement that is void, will not be enjoined where there is a remedy by motion to set aside or by writ of error. Shelton v. Gill, 11 Ohio, 417.

A receiver of a corporation was refused an injunction against a judgment confessed by the president to a director, although it was claimed that the affidavit was insufficient; that the board of directors directing the same was not duly organized; that a director could not vote in his own favor; that the power to confess judgment was not conferred; that the bonds and warrants were not countersigned as required by the by-laws; and that the same was an unlawful preference,—there being no fraud shown, and the debt being justly due. Besides there is a remedy at law. Stratton v. Allen, 6 N. J. Eq. 220.

And where a judgment was claimed to be irregular an injunction was refused, as there was a remedy in the court in which it was entered. Cammack v. Johnson, 2 N. J. Eq. 163.

An injunction was refused a general creditor against the enforcement of a judgment confessed by his debtor to another on a just debt, although the affidavit required to enter a judgment on a bond and warrant did not set out the consideration. Jackson v. Darcy, 1 N. J. Eq. 194.

And that a magistrate's judgment on confession was rendered without a warrant will not authorize an execution against the same, as there is a remedy by appeal. Brumbaugh v. Schnebly, 2 Md. 320.

A judgment entered on confession will not be 30 L. R. A.

held to be fraudulent on the ground that it was entered up in violation of a statute requiring an affidavit that so much was due and justly owing; but as the proof shows that the amount for which the payment was rendered is not all due, the parties holding the same will be required to give bond to refund any part which is not due. Clapp v. Ely, 10 N. J. Eq. 173.

Under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 1490, providing that judgments by confession may be collaterally impeached by fraud by creditors of the judgment debtor, and such judgment shall be void as to such creditors, unless at the time of the rendition thereof the defendant makes affidavit that he justly owes the debt, the party is not entitled to restrain a sale of his land under a judgment confessed by another for irregularity for want of the statutory affidavit, but may restrain the sale where the judgment has been paid. Chapin v. McLaren, 105 Ind. 563.

The enforcement of a judgment by confession will not be enjoined on the ground that a copy of the petition was not served, under La. Code Pr. arts. 172-179, requiring citations to be served in the French language, as this does not apply to an executory petition. Alliet v. Henry, 2 La. Ann. 145.

In White v. Crow, 17 Fed. Rep. 93, which was a suit in the Federal court to redeem from a sale in the state court, and to enjoin the execution of a debt on the ground of irregularity in the confession of a judgment, it was held that the Federal court would not enjoin the officer of the state court, and as to the confession of a judgment by a corporation, the court in which the action was pending was the judge of the authority of the person who appeared for the company, whether an attorney at law or an agent, and its judgment as to his authority was conclusive; but, having the parties all before the Federal court, the right was recognized to deal with them directly without reference to the sheriff, and a decree was made authorizing a redemption.

For injunction in aid of attachment, see note to People v. VanBuren (N. Y.), 2 L. R. A. 444.

III. For fraud.

The debtor is always entitled to an injunction against judgments taken by confession against him, which are obtained by fraud, unless there is an adequate remedy at law; but in actions to enjoin a judgment a valid defense should always be shown before an injunction will be granted.

As, where the debt had previously been paid, and an injunction will be granted by a court of equal jurisdiction of another county having jurisdiction of the person, even though Ohio Rev. Stat. 5854, provides for vacating judgments in the same

Hilbert, and that they were rightfully recovered. The defendant Peters, the sheriff, answered, setting up his proceedings under the executions. It appeared from the findings of the court that H. M. Johnson sold out his interest in the partnership of Hilbert & Johnson to his partner, G. B. Hilbert, August 21, 1893, and that the latter carried on the business until the time the executions were levied, December 30, 1893; that the judgments were founded on bona fide debts actually due for moneys advanced, and which were not gifts to G. B. Hilbert, and all the charges of conspiracy, collusion, and fraud against the creditors of Hilbert & Johnson or of G. B. Hilbert were found to be substantially untrue and without foundation. It was found that the answers to the complaints in the proceedings confessing the judgments, purporting to be signed by J. J. Dick, as attorney for the defendants therein, were not signed in the proper handwriting of said J. J. Dick, but were signed by C. E. Hooker in the absence of said J. J. Dick, for and at the special instance and request of J. J. Dick, he having duly authorized such signing, and also ratified the same. Judgment was rendered dismissing the plaintiff's complaint on the merits, with costs, from which the plaintiff appealed.

Mr. E. D. Doney for appellant.

Messrs. C. E. Hooker and J. J. Dick, for respondents:

Mere irregularity in obtaining a judgment is not good ground for its collateral impeachment.

Adams v. White, 23 Fla. 352.

court that are obtained by fraud, as this is only cumulative. Darst v. Phillips, 41 Ohio St. 514.

And an injunction was granted where the majority of the trustees of a religious society gave a judgment note to persons who had a claim against the society, and also included in such note the amount of certain claims in favor of such parties personally, for the purpose of encumbering the church property and subjecting it to a sale, for this was a fraud; and this was done although the society might have had the judgment vacated on motion. United Brethren Ch. v. Vandusen, 37 Wis. 54.

So, a judgment obtained by an unauthorized appearance of strangers will be enjoined on the ground of fraud whatever may have been the original intention of the party, although courts of law have concurrent jurisdiction; but this will not deprive a court of equity of its jurisdiction. Truett v. Wainwright, 9 Ill. 418.

Or, where a judgment was confessed only as a security for what might thereafter be found due, and the claims were fraudulently enlarged. Keighler v. Savage Mfg. Co., 12 Md. 383, 71 Am. Dec. 600.

And a judgment entered on confession, agreed and intended only as a conditional judgment, where the justice had no power to enter a conditional judgment, was enjoined as void. Gwinn v. Newton, 3 Humph. 710.

Or where the same was excessive, and obtained by fraud and misrepresentation from an ignorant and illiterate party, and a good defense is shown to that action. Shufeldt v. Gandy, 25 Neb. 602.

And fraud in procuring an assignment of a judgment confessed to indemnify the sheriff and a release of errors, so as to prevent prosecution of error, will justify enjoining the judgment. Lyon v. Tallmadge, 14 Johns. 501, reversing Lyon v. Richmond, 2 Johns. Ch. 51.

In Lyon v. Tallmadge, 1 Johns. Ch. 184, a similar bill between the same parties, not charging fraud, was dismissed.

An injunction was granted against suing out execution on a judgment on confession on a bond of £1,200 into which the plaintiff had entered partly in consideration of the defendant returning as so much cash a post obit formerly granted by the plaintiff (an expectant heir) in discharge of a debt of inconsiderable amount, on the understanding that the principal was not to be called for until the death of plaintiff's father. Annesley v. Bookes, 3 Meriv. 226, note.

IV. Judgments against public policy.

a. Usury.

Injunctions have been granted against judgments entered on confession that are contrary to public policy or statute on account of usury, where 30 L. R. A.

the principal and interest are tendered. West v. Beanes, 3 Harr. & J. 638; Fanning v. Dunham, 5 Johns. Ch. 142, 9 Am. Dec. 283.

And an assignee for creditors may obtain an injunction against a judgment by confession entered against his assignor containing usury, even if the defense of usury was not made at law, as equity will relieve on the ground that usurious contracts are contrary to public policy, and Md. act 1845, abrogating the penalty of the act of 1704, still leaves such contracts as to usury void. Thomas v. Watson, Taney, C. C. 297.

But a surety is not entitled to an injunction on the ground of usury against a judgment confessed by him and his principal, where the principal is not made a party defendant in the injunction suit. Boughton v. Allen, 11 Paige, 321.

And in Shelton v. Gill, 11 Ohio, 417, it was held that where the warrant of attorney shows that the judgment confessed is usurious, the remedy by motion to set aside the judgment or by a writ of error will prevent an injunction on the ground of usury.

In Brown v. Swann, 36 U. S. 10 Pet. 497, 9 L. ed. 508, it was held that after a judgment is allowed to be taken without defense against usury the defendant is not entitled to an injunction, and a bill of discovery in usury against a judgment confessed with a saving of the defendant's equity, although Va. Stat. Nov. 23, 1798, § 8, provides for a bill in chancery, and that the lender shall be obliged to accept principal without interest. And although there was annexed to this judgment a reservation in terms for a resort to equity, the court had no authority to make it a part of the record, for the right to resort to equity exists independently of any reservation of the courts of common law, and the defense should have been made before judgment,—reversing Swann v. Brown, 4 Cranch, C. C. 247.

In Wistar v. McManes, 54 Pa. 318-323, 36 Am. Dec. 700, it was held that the denial of a motion to enjoin a judgment on confession and determine usury is not a bar to an equitable action for discovery. But as to res judicata this was overruled in Frauenthal's Appeal, infra.

In Frauenthal's Appeal, 100 Pa. 290, it was held that the decision on a rule to show cause why an execution should not be stayed, will prevent an injunction on the same grounds, against an execution sale (overruling Wistar v. McManes, supra, which was based on Simpson v. Hart, 14 Johns. 63), holding that a decision of a court of law upon a summary application is not such res judicata as to preclude chancery from examining the question, stating that no notice was taken in Wistar v. McManes of the fact that in New York, as well as in England, separate courts of chancery then existed,

A judgment rendered without a finding against parties before the court, and respecting a matter within its jurisdiction, is voidable only, and not absolutely void.

Doty v. Sumner Bros. 12 Neb. 878.

Where proceedings in attachment are irregular and amendable, but not void, and no objection is made thereto by the defendant, such proceedings cannot be questioned collaterally by third parties.

Connolly v. Miller (Neb.) 84 N. W. Rep. 76. See also Dullard v. Phelan, 83 Iowa, 471.

A decree cannot be attacked collaterally on the ground that it exceeds the relief asked for.

McCrillis v. Harrison County, 68 Iowa, 592; Ketchum v. White, 72 Iowa, 198; Eureka Iron & S. Works v. Bresnahan, 66 Mich. 489.

and the equity powers of the common-law courts were confined to narrow limits.

b. Compounding crimes.

Injunctions will be granted against the enforcement of judgments confessed that are contrary to public policy, as for compounding a crime.

In Given's Appeal, 121 Pa. 280, it was held that proceedings on a judgment by confession and execution will be enjoined in Pennsylvania where the consideration was stifling a prosecution for forgery, as such agreements subvert public justice. The court followed Wistar v. McManes, supra, and referring to Frauenthal's Appeal, 100 Pa. 290, it was said that in that case equity jurisdiction was recognized, but that the injunctions would not be granted when the matter was res judicata.

A judgment confessed by a person under a charge of arson in favor of his prosecutor on the representation that it would not be enforced if he suffered corporal punishment in consequence of the prosecution, was enjoined, but as it appeared that the prosecutor was not guilty of misconduct, but acted only on duress, and did nothing wrong except in the single fact of taking judgment from a man in the plaintiff's situation, and as the guilt of the complainant is clear, the judgment should stand a security for the debt, which may be recovered in an action of trespass. Heath v. Cobb, 8 Dev. Eq. 187.

c. Gambling consideration.

Where the consideration was a gambling debt an assignee for creditors was entitled to an injunction against the judgment entered on confession against his assignor. Thomas v. Watson, Taney, C. C. 297.

In Wilkerson v. Whitney, 7 Mo. 295, it was held that Mo. Rev. Code 1825, p. 410, providing that judgments given, granted, drawn, or executed contrary to the gambling act might be set aside by a court of equity, applies only to judgment by confession from the terms of it, and Mo. Rev. Code 1835, p. 290, providing that a judgment, when the consideration is a gambling debt, is void, and the defense may be made at law, is construed to mean also judgment by confession, and no other, and a failure to make a defense at law that the consideration of the judgment was a gambling debt will prevent an injunction where the judgment was not by confession.

V. Judgments against sureties.

A surety is entitled to an injunction against the enforcement of a judgment entered on confession against him on a proper showing.

As, where the surety was discharged by an extension of time for a consideration paid by the principal to the plaintiff before judgment without the surety's consent. Montague v. Mitchell, 28 Ill. 481.

And the same was held although the warrant of 30 L. R. A.

Pinney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We think that the findings of the circuit court against the substantive allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, except one, and that the judgments attacked by the plaintiff were founded upon bona fide debts of the defendants G. B. Hilbert and H. M. Johnson and of G. B. Hilbert, were warranted by the evidence. Certainly, there was no preponderance of evidence against its conclusions. The findings of fact must, therefore, be accepted as verities, and it would serve no useful purpose to set forth the substance of the evidence, or enter upon any discussion of it. The only question that remains for consideration is whether the plaintiff was entitled to attorney provided that no bill in equity should be filed to interfere in a manner with the operation of the judgment entered by virtue thereof. Kennedy v. Evans, 31 Ill. 258.

But in Glider v. Merwin, 6 Whart. 523, it was held that a surety cannot obtain an injunction against a judgment confessed, on the ground that since the judgment he has discovered that he was relieved by an extension granted by the principal where he has an adequate remedy in the court at law by application to open the judgment.

For judgments against surety, see also Philadelphia v. Dobson, 10 Pa. Co. Ct. 84, supra; L. Boughton v. Allen, 11 Paige, 331, supra, IV.; and Harner v. Price, 17 W. Va. 523, infra, IX.

VI. Judgments against corporations.

Where a board of directors had authorized the president of the company to confess a judgment for the debt, and it was not shown that the creditor knew that the company was insolvent at the time, and the authority to confess the judgment was legal, a stockholder will not be entitled to an injunction against the judgment. Kilgore v. Nicholson, 26 La. Ann. 638.

In Pennsylvania a corporation may prefer a creditor by confession of judgment, and the same will not be enjoined where confessed by a foreign corporation, although the general law of the state where incorporated prohibits a preference, but it can have no extraterritorial effect. Pairpoint Mfg. Co. v. Philadelphia Optical & Watch Co. 161 Pa. 17; Lowry v. Philadelphia Optical & Watch Co. Id. 123.

And a judgment by confession against a corporation will not be enjoined in a collateral attack on the ground that the officer had no authority to confess judgment, as this is not a sufficient charge of fraud to obtain relief, and there is a remedy in the court at law to vacate the same. Southern Porcelain Mfg. Co. v. Thew, 5 S. C. N. S. 5.

And the execution sale of corporate property upon a judgment bond preferring directors will not be enjoined, where it is not shown that the corporation was insolvent at the time, and fraud is not shown. Neal's Appeal, 129 Pa. 64.

But in Cape Sable Co.'s Case, 3 Bland, Ch. 606, it was held that a judgment confessed by the president of a flourishing corporation where the confession was not under seal, and was irregular, would be enjoined at the instance of the parties representing one third of the stock, where it was claimed that the judgment was through a fraudulent combination to sacrifice the property of the company.

For judgments against corporations, see also Harding v. Fiske, 25 Abb. N. C. 343, supra, I.; Stratton v. Allen, 16 N. J. Eq. 222, supra, I. and II.; Buroh v. West, 134 Ill. 253, supra, II.

VII. Judgments against partners.

An injunction will be granted against the en-any relief against the judgments by reason of the fact, found by the circuit court, that the answers of confession upon which these judgments were entered were not signed by the attorney, J. J. Dick, whose name appears thereto, in his own proper handwriting, but that his name was signed thereto by C. E. Hooker, the attorney for the plaintiffs entering the judgments, "in the absence of said J. J. Dick, for and at the special instance and request of J. J. Dick, he having duly authorized such signing, and ratified the same." The statute (Rev. Stat. § 2896) provides that, in the entry of judgments by confession, "the plaintiff shall file with his complaint an answer signed by the defendant, or some attorney in his behalf, confessing the amount claimed in the complaint, or some part thereof." The plaintiff insisted that the judgments were void, though the answers were so signed at Mr. Dick's special instance and request, and such signing had been ratified by him. The method in which the answers of confession were signed was clearly irregular, and one not to be encouraged; but we think it was an irregularity merely. There was in each case a sufficient warrant of attorney, and a release of errors, and the judgments were founded on valid debts. The circuit court would not have been justified in setting them aside on the ground alleged, on motion of the judgment debtors, or on petition of a judgment creditor, unless it were shown that they were unjust or inequitable, enforcement of a judgment confessed by one partner against the firm without the consent of his copartners, as such confession is beyond the power vested in partners generally. Christy v. Sherman, 10 Iowa, 636. See also Blackwell v. Rankin, 7 N. J. Eq. 153, and Shedd v. Bank of Brattleboro, 33 Vt. 709, supra, I.

But in McGee v. Bank of Mt. Pleasant, 7 Ohio, pt. 2, p. 175, it was held that where one partner makes a bond on the warrant of attorney to confess a judgment under seal, and in the name of the firm upon which judgment is taken, without the knowledge of the other partner as to such confession, the remedy by motion to vacate prevents an injunction against the judgment.

And in Cammack v. Johnson, 3 N. J. Eq. 163, a dormant partner was refused an injunction against a judgment confessed by the other partners for a valid debt, where the dormant partner was unknown at the time of the judgment.

For judgments against partners, see also Blackwell v. Rankin, 7 N. J. Eq. 153; Shedd v. Bank of Brattleboro, 33 Vt. 709, and Hier v. Kaufman, 124 Ill. 215, supra, I.; Schuster v. Bader, 13 Colo. 329, supra, I and II.

VIII. Judgments against executors and administrators.

A judgment confessed by an executor on the consideration to obtain time for the payment of money will not be enjoined on the ground that it was to have been a confession of judgment, to be paid when he should have assets, but which condition was not proved to have been a part of the agreement for such confession. Freelands v. Royall, 3 Hen. & M. 575.

And an injunction will not be granted to an administrator after two judgments de bonis testatoris and de bonis propriis have been successfully recovered at law, where a judgment was confessed intending to reserve the right of appeal, which was not done, as he did not attend court, on account of his wife's illness. Bostwick v. Perkins, 1 Ga. 136.

In Brenner v. Alexander, 16 Or. 249, it was said that an administrator confessing judgment admits that there are assets, and he cannot thereafter have such judgment enjoined on ascertaining subsequently that there is a deficiency; but if he had not confessed judgment it was said that he would not have been estopped.

So, where an administrator de bonis non made a defense to a writ of scil. fa., issued to revive a judgment against the former administrator, but voluntarily confessed absolute judgment of fiat, and four years afterwards asked for an injunction on the ground that he was mistaken as to the amount of assets, the injunction was refused on the ground that a court of equity will not relieve for negligence or mistake of law, unless the alleged mistake is conclusive as to the existence of the legal right. Kearney v. Sasser, 37 Md. 264.

For judgments against administrators, see also Roche v. Washington, 7 Humph. 142, supra, II.; Gardiner v. Hardey, 12 Gill & J. 365, infra, X.

IX. Statute of limitations.

And an injunction was granted where a judgment was confessed upon a note which was barred on its face by the statute of limitations.

As where the confession was made by one who was not an attorney of the defendant whose counsel was absent, and the party himself was unable to attend court on account of sickness, and there was a valid defense against the debt, and no steps had been taken to collect the debt for twenty-one years. Cheek v. Taylor, 23 Ga. 127.

So, where a note was made in Wisconsin, and the maker and holder were residents of that state, and in a suit in Illinois a judgment was obtained by confession, as the defense of limitation would have been a good defense in Illinois, it was held in an action in Wisconsin upon a transcript of the Illinois judgment, that as the latter court must have vacated the judgment or granted a perpetual injunction, this last power may be lawfully exercised by the courts of equity where suit was brought for the purpose of enforcing it. Brown v. Parker, 26 Wis. 21.

But the mistake of law of a surety in confessing a judgment for a debt barred by limitation will not entitle him to an injunction against the judgment. Harner v. Price, 17 W. Va. 523.

X. Consideration not due.

Injunctions will be granted against judgments entered on confession where there was no consideration, or the debt was not due.

So, a purchaser of land under title bond is entitled to an injunction against the collection of a judgment obtained on a purchase-money note by confession in another county entered without notice, where the vendor has not complied with the terms of his bond, and the vendee has never taken possession. Cooper v. Tyler, 46 Ill. 422, 95 Am. Dec. 442.

And where confession of the judgment was made with a reservation of the right to have the case heard in equity, the same may be enjoined where there is a total failure of consideration. Daveiss v. McKee, 1 Bibb, 381.

So, where a judgment is entered by confession, as a security for an unascertained debt, an injunction will be granted against the enforcement of the same if the proof is clear. Young v. Reynolds, 4 Md. 375.

And where an executrix in good faith confessed a judgment against the estate, the subsequent discovery of a receipt for the debt, of which she had and nothing was shown against them. Marshall & Lisle Bank v. Milwaukee Worsted Mills, 84 Wis. 23, 27; Horning v. E. Griesbach Brew. Co. 84 Wis. 71; F. Mayer Boot & S. Co. v. Falk, 89 Wis. 216. Granting that the judgments were void for want of jurisdiction, the result would have been the same. Courts of equity will not enjoin a judgment at law merely for want of jurisdiction in the court in which the judgment is rendered, and where a party can say nothing against the justice of a judgment equity will not interfere, but leave him to contend against it at law as best he can. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 898; Stokes v. Knarr, 11 Wis. 390. Courts of equity interfere in such cases only to prevent injustice, and upon equitable grounds. Walker v. Robbins, 55 U. S. 14 How. 584, 14 L. ed. 552; Knox County v. Harshman, 133 U. S. 152, 33 L. ed. 586. It follows that the judgment of the circuit court was rightly given, dismissing the plaintiff's complaint upon the merits.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

no knowledge at the time of confession, will entitle her to an injunction against the same. Gardner v. Hardey, 12 Gill & J. 365.

Under Ill. act Feb. 18, 1867, providing that an execution issued upon a judgment obtained by confession, upon a demand not due, may be enjoined until such demand shall have become due, a judgment so obtained should be enjoined, although the debt existed prior to this act, and, as chancery does not act by piecemeal, although one of the notes was due, proceedings on the judgment will be enjoined until the whole becomes due. Wood v. Child, 20 Ill. 309.

XL. Valid defense must be shown.

Before an injunction will be granted against judgments entered on confession, a valid defense must be shown. Killgore v. Nicholson, 26 La. Ann. 633; Southern Porcelain Mfg. Co. v. Thew, 5 S. C. N. S. 5; Neal's Appeal, 129 Pa. 64, supra, IV.; Robbins v. Mount, 3 Ga. 74, infra, XII.; Freeland v. Royall, 2 Hen. & M. 575, supra, VII.; Chambless v. Atchison, 2 La. Ann. 483; Beiley v. Johnston, 22 Wis. 279, and Burch v. West, 134 Ill. 258, supra, II.; Hier v. Kaufman, 184 Ill. 215, supra, I.; Stratton v. Allen, 16 N. J. Eq. 229, supra, II.

The payment of a mortgage for an unadjusted balance will not authorize an injunction against the enforcement of a judgment by confession for the remainder, entered with the reservation of the right to reduce the amount, where no errors in the amount are shown. Gear v. Parish, 46 U. S. 5 How. 163, 12 L. ed. 100.

And an injunction will not be granted where a judgment is confessed, and there is no fraud or collusion on the part of plaintiff, or some equity shown arising subsequent thereto. Moore v. Barclay, 23 Ala. 739; Ramseur v. Brownell (Ark.) 12 S. W. Rep. 200; Ashton v. Parkinson, 8 Phila. 333.

An injunction will not be granted to stay proceedings on a judgment confessed on the faith of an oral agreement to stay execution, where complainant did not use his remedy at law to have the execution recalled. Moulton v. Knapp, 85 Cal. 335, 88 Cal. 446.

An injunction will not be granted against a judgment by confession, on the ground that a note was given to and held by the judgment creditor which is claimed to be a novation, where such note was delivered prior to the judgment and was tendered back to the debtor. Sallis v. McLearn, 23 La. Ann. 192.

And where a confession of judgment has been entered by mistake, thereby preventing a review, an injunction will not be granted against the same where a valid defense to the action is not shown. Farmers' Bank v. Vanmeter, 4 Rand. (Va.) 558.

The burden of proof is on the party attempting to enjoin a judgment on confession, where it was claimed the warrant of attorney was forged, and, no error in the decision of the court refusing the injunction being shown, the decision will be affirmed. Daly v. Ogden, 26 Ill. App. 319.

Where an injunction was sought on the ground that a confession of judgment was obtained by the promise to give credit for all errors, which was afterwards refused, an injunction will not be granted where such errors are not established. Boone v. Poindexter, 12 Smedes & M. 640.

And a judgment confessed as a compromise will not be enjoined on the ground that complainant claims he was entitled to credits before judgment, where no cause for equitable relief is shown. Morehead v. D. Ford, 6 W. Va. 316.

XII. Negligence.

A party guilty of negligence is not entitled to an injunction against a judgment that might have been prevented by the use of diligence. Harner v. Price, 17 W. Va. 523.

And an injunction will not be granted where complainant was negligent, as where a judgment was confessed with an intention to enter an appeal, and one of the defendants was sent, within the proper time, to enter such appeal, but was prevented by the ignorance of the clerk, and the time elapsed so that an appeal could not be taken, if there is no special equity in the defense. Robbins v. Mount, 3 Ga. 74.

XIII. Remedy at law.

An injunction will not be granted if there is an adequate remedy at law. Southern Porcelain Mfg. Co. v. Thew, 5 S. C. N. S. 5, supra, VI.; McGee v. Bank of Mount Pleasant, 7 Ohio. pt. 2, p. 175, supra, VII.; Burch v. West, 134 Ill. 258, supra, II.; Shelton v. Gill, 11 Ohio, 417, supra, IV.; Brumbaugh v. Schenely, 2 Md. 320; Cammaek v. Johnson, 2 N. J. Eq. 163, supra, II.; Stratton v. Allen, 16 N. J. Eq. 229; Artman v. Giles, 155 Pa. 409, supra, I.

The remedy at law by motion to set aside an execution that has been levied, or to stay process for a year, will prevent an injunction against proceedings on a judgment obtained on confession on an agreement to stay process for a year, where such agreement was violated by the creditor. Moulton v. Knapp, 85 Cal. 335.

XIV. Other matters.

Under Nix. (N. J.) Dig. 97, § 11, providing that no injunction shall issue to set aside proceedings at law in any personal action after judgment on the application of a defendant, unless a deposit be made, or security given, an injunction will not be granted against a judgment entered by confession unless such conditions precedent are complied with. Mariatt v. Perrine, 17 N. J. Eq. 49.

And an injunction will not be granted to maintain, as a set-off, a claim for unliquidated damages, although it was claimed that the plaintiff in the judgment on confession was a nonresident. Smith v. Washington Gaslight Co. 31 Md. 12, 100 Am. Dec. 49.

There are many cases in which judgments by confession are attacked by a motion or suit to set aside, involving similar questions as in this note, but no cases are included except those in which the remedy by injunction is sought.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

ELI D. SMALL et al., Plffs. in Err.,

v.

Rebecca SMALL.

(.....Kan.....)

Subject to certain limitations not applicable to this case, and as against any post mortem claim of his widow, a married man, in Illinois or in Kansas, may during coverture give away to his children absolutely the bulk of his property, when the known effect of the gift will be to deprive the widow of the fair share of the property which otherwise would have fallen to her.

(November 9, 1896.)

ERROR to the District Court for Jackson County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce plaintiff's alleged rights as widow of Daniel Small, deceased, in property which he had conveyed during his lifetime in alleged fraud of her rights. Reversed.

Statement by Martin, Ch. J. :

On January 27, 1859, at Findlay, Ohio, Daniel Small married Rebecca Cone, the present defendant in error, as Rebecca Small. He was the father of five children by a former marriage, namely, Eli D., Daniel J., John D., William B., and Susan, now Susan McKenney; the oldest, Eli D., being about seventeen, and the youngest, the daughter, about three and one half years of age; and his home was at Wilmington, Will county, Ill. He had accumulated about $30,000, but Rebecca Cone's belongings were of trifling value. She went from Findlay to Wilmington, and took charge of the children, who soon became very much attached to her, and she was devoted to their welfare, and the relations of the entire family were always very harmonious up to the death of Daniel Small, which occurred April 14, 1888. The business of Daniel Small was the loaning of money on his own account. As early as 1869, Daniel Small conceived the idea of giving or leaving the bulk of his fortune to his said five children in equal shares (there being no issue of his second marriage) after providing a sum sufficient for the maintenance of his wife during her widowhood, but nothing in that direction was done until March 19, 1878, when he made an assignment of all the notes, bonds, mortgages, and securities held by him on or against persons or property in Illinois, and amounting to about $100,000, to his brother, Darius Small, of Herkimer county, N. Y., in trust for said five children, the trustee being authorized to collect the notes and securities and reinvest the proceeds in other interest-bearing securities or real estate in or outside of the state, and to divide the same, with the accumulations, at his death in equal shares, among said children. By the terms of this trust assignment Darius Small was authorized to appoint some discreet person, a resident of Will county, as his attorney in fact, to assist in carrying out the trust; and on the same day Darius Small accepted the trust, and also appointed Eli D. Small as such attorney in fact. Daniel Small had all these notes and securities in a safe. He took them out, and handed them to Darius Small, who in turn delivered them to Eli D. Small, and he put them back in the safe in the same condition as before. Darius Small was on a visit to his brother at the time, and in a few days afterwards he returned to New York, and never had anything more to do with the trust, except that on January 22, 1879, he executed a further power of attorney to Eli D. Small, authorizing him to sell and convey any real estate situated in Kansas or elsewhere, the title to which might be vested in him as such trustee. Daniel Small continued managing the investments as before, but Eli D. Small assisted him. Most of the notes secured by mortgages on real estate were taken in the name of Darius Small, trustee, and on payment of the same it was the custom for Eli D. Small to satisfy the mortgages as attorney in fact; but the loans made on personal security were principally in the name of Daniel Small. In 1879, and subsequently, part of what was called the "trust fund" was invested in two ranches (one of them consisting of between 3,000 and 4,000 acres in Jackson and Shawnee counties, Kan.; and another one, of more than 1,000 acres, in Wabaunsee county, Kan.) and in improving the same, and the title to these lands was taken in the name of Darius Small, trustee of Daniel Small, but Darius Small knew nothing of the transaction, and the lands were selected by Daniel Small, Eli D. Small, and the other sons. Part of the fund was also loaned through the American Bank in North Topeka, established by the sons. They, or some of them, resided upon the ranches, and the funds for their improvement were furnished in a large measure through the bank. In July, 1886, Daniel Small executed a quitclaim deed to his four sons and his daughter for said Kansas lands, and shortly afterwards Eli D. Small, as attorney in fact for Darius Small, executed deeds to Daniel Small and John D. Small for the large ranch in Jackson and Shawnee counties, and a deed to William B. Small for the smaller ranch in Wabaunsee county. About the same time, Susan McKenney quitclaimed her interest in the land to her brothers, and John D. Small and Daniel J. Small conveyed a one-third interest in the large ranch to Eli D. Small. The sons executed a promissory note to their sister for $8,740.25, an amount equal to one fifth of the money invested in the lands and the improvements. Rebecca Small did not join in the conveyance with her husband, and she knew nothing about it at the time, but was informed of the transfer to the sons some time in the autumn of 1886. She never resided in Kansas, but had been on visits with her husband to the sons, and knew that they occupied the lands. For several years prior to September 12, 1882, Daniel Small had loaned or advanced money in unequal amounts to his sons, and on or about that day he paid them the residue of what would make $20,000 each, and he charged the same on his book as advancements. At the same time he had each of his sons to sign a paper, agreeing that in the final division their sister, Susan, should have an equal one-fifth share with them, including said advancements. Susan was then married to W. J. McKenney of Brooklyn, N. Y., and her father afterwards advanced to her the sum of $15,500, which was principally used in the purchase of a home in Brooklyn. Rebecca Small knew that money was furnished to Susan for the purchase of a home, but she did not know of the advancements to the sons, and was not consulted in reference thereto. About January, 1888, Daniel Small was taken sick, and his son Daniel J. Small went from Kansas to Wilmington, and remained there until October, 1888. Susan McKenney was also there for some weeks before and after her father's death. When Daniel Small realized that he could not live much longer, he told his son Daniel J. to go to Judge Parks, a lawyer at Joliet, who was familiar with his affairs, and to tell him that if the trust arrangement of 1878 was not ironclad he wanted it made so, as he desired to leave $20,000 as a fund for the support of his widow, and that all the rest of his personal property should go in equal shares to his children, including the $20,000, the income only of which should be used for the support of his widow. Judge Parks suggested that he thought this could not be accomplished by will without the consent of Rebecca Small, but that all the notes and securities might be given away absolutely to the children in his lifetime, the remainder of the property to be disposed of by will; and he accordingly drew up two papers, one being in form a will, and the body of the other instrument reading as follows: "Conscious that I am now suffering from a malady likely to prove fatal, and deeming it expedient to make final distribution and disposition of my personal estate (save what I propose to set apart for the benefit of my wife) in my lifetime, I have determined to carry out my long and well-considered purpose by an immediate transfer and delivery of the same, consisting for the most part of securities, to my son Daniel J. Small, who is now with me, in trust, to divide equally amongst my five children, Daniel J., Eli D., John D., William B., and Susan McKenney, share and share alike. In execution whereof, in consideration of love and affection, I do hereby assign, transfer, and set over to said Daniel J. Small, in trust, as aforesaid, all my right, title, and interest in and to the notes, mortgages, and securities mentioned and described in the schedule hereto subjoined; to have and to hold to him and his personal representatives for the purpose above set forth." The will, as drawn, recites that the testator had already, by advancements and recent gifts to his children, disposed of all his personal estate except about $20,000, and that, being desirous of making a reasonable and adequate provision for the support of his wife, Rebecca Small, by whom he had no children, he did give and bequeath to his executor $20,000 as a fund to invest and reinvest in good interest-bearing securities at his discretion, and from the interest received therefrom to pay her the annual sum of $1,200 in such periodical instalments as he might see fit during her natural life, and upon her death to divide said fund among said five children, share and share alike; said provision for the widow to be in lieu and discharge of all her rights of dower, save in his real estate, which, together with his household furniture, and such articles of personal property as he had not in the will or otherwise disposed of, he left to the disposition of the law, Daniel J. Small being named as sole executor and trustee. On these papers being exhibited to Daniel Small, he directed that the will be changed so that the payments to Rebecca Small should continue only while she remained his widow, and in the event of her death or marriage the fund to be divided among the five children. The will was changed according to his desire, and a schedule of the notes, securities, etc., amounting to a little more than $100,000, having been made, was attached to the instrument of gift, and the notes and securities were delivered to Daniel J. Small, he having received written authority from his brothers and his sister to receive in their name and behalf any gift which their father might desire to make. The will and the instrument of gift were executed on March 26, 1888, and Daniel J. Small retained possession of said notes and securities until his father's death and afterwards, as also the $20,000 additional selected for the widow. The will was admitted to probate in Will county, Ill., April 21, 1888. Rebecca Small did not know of said trust arrangement of March 19, 1878, until after this action was commenced, the children having been requested by Daniel Small not to mention it to her, or in her presence. She did not know of the advancements of $20,000 each to the sons for a like reason, and she was kept in entire ignorance of the gift instrument and the will of March 26, 1888, until shortly before the will was probated. She knew that her husband had a large amount of money and property, but she was told by Daniel J. Small and Judge Parks, before the probate of the will, that Daniel Small had given substantially everything away except the $20,000 left for her support by the will. It does not appear that she made any inquiry as to the particular disposition of the property, although she was much dissatisfied with the provision made for her. She obtained a certified copy of the will in October, 1888, and then consulted an attorney as to her rights. On May 9, 1888, she entered into a written agreement with all the children, wherein they agreed that she should have $1,400 a year, payable in monthly instalments, in consideration of concessions made by her in relation to certain real and personal property which, under the will, would become as intestate property, this being allowable under the laws of Illinois. Daniel J. Small paid and Rebecca Small received the monthly instalments required by said contract from its date until very shortly before this action was commenced, when she, through her attorneys, tendered back to Daniel J. Small the amount received and interest thereon. Under the law of descents in Illinois, where a husband dies intestate, leaving surviving him a widow and children, the widow is entitled to one third of the personal estate as her absolute property. Advancements to children and lineal descendants are considered as part of the estate, so far as it regards the division and distribution thereof among the issue, and is to be taken by the child or descendant towards his share of the estate; but he is not required to refund any part thereof, although it exceeds his share. Any provision made by will for the widow, if not otherwise expressed therein, bars her of dower in the lands of the deceased, unless such provision be renounced within one year, in which case she is entitled to dower in the lands and to one third of the personal estate after the payment of all debts. But Rebecca Small never made any renunciation. On April 2, 1890, Rebecca Small commenced her action against Eli D. Small, John D. Small, William B. Small, Daniel J. Small, and Daniel J. Small as executor of the last will and testament of Daniel Small, deceased, for the cancellation of the several instruments referred to, except the trust agreement of March 19, 1878 (of which she was ignorant), and for an accounting as to all property received by the defendants from Daniel Small or his estate, praying that she be adjudged the owner of an undivided half of all said lands in Kansas, asking also for her share of the rents and profits thereof, and her share of the rents and profits of certain real estate in Illinois, and for decree of partition of the Kansas lands. The case was tried at November term, 1890. The court held that the plaintiff below could not recover any part of the Kansas lands, but that all the transactions were fraudulent as to her, and as to any interest she might have had in the estate of her husband upon his death the latter is to be held as having died intestate, and rendered money judgments against the defendants below aggregating $72,809.78. The defendants below prosecute their petition as plaintiffs in error in this court, and a cross petition in error has also been filed by Rebecca Small.

Under the statutes and decisions of Illinois, Daniel Small in his lifetime had the legal and undisputed right to give and dispose of his personal property to his children, free from any claim of his wife. If he had such legal and undisputed right, then no fraud can be predicated upon any act of his during his lifetime, in so giving and disposing of his personal property.

While the so-called trust assignment purports upon its face to be founded upon a valuable consideration, yet the undisputed testimony shows that it was in fact executed without any consideration whatever therefor.

Martin, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Many questions respecting rights as well as remedies have been presented, and very ably argued orally and in the voluminous briefs of counsel, but we have found it necessary to decide only one of them. The underlying question is whether, under the laws of Illinois or of Kansas, the several gifts and advancements made by Daniel Small to his children are to be treated as fraudulent and void as to his widow. Most of these gifts and advancements were made without the knowledge of Rebecca Small, and Daniel Small appears to have enjoined upon his children that the subject should not be mentioned to her, nor in her presence. Secrecy is often called a badge of fraud, but it is not fraud itself. If a man's disposition of his property is fair and lawful, the concealment of the transaction cannot render it fraudulent. If the rights of the children were dependent only upon the trust agreement of March 19, 1878, it is doubtful if they could stand the test of law and equity, for, notwithstanding the trust appeared upon its face to be a valid disposition of the property and securities therein mentioned, such as would be binding upon Daniel Small, yet the trusteeship of Darius Small seems to have been only nominal, and Daniel Small virtually controlled the property, and did as he pleased respecting it, just as he had done before; his son Eli D. Small, the nominal attorney in fact of the trustee, merely assisting in the transaction of the business of collecting and reinvesting. If Daniel Small had died while the securities were in this condition, and the Kansas lands in the name of Darius Small as trustee, probably it should be said that all belonged in equity to Daniel Small, and formed part of his estate upon his death; but a considerable portion of the so-called "trust fund" was invested in the Kansas lands and improvements thereon, and both Daniel Small and the trustee, through his attorney in fact, conveyed the lands to the sons and the daughter absolutely in 1886. The advancements were made in 1882 and prior thereto, and we suppose they formed part of said trust fund and its accumulations; and nineteen days before the death of Daniel Small he made the final gift, exceeding $100,000. On April 1, 1888, two weeks before his death, Daniel Small had no control, in law or equity, of the money advancements, the Kansas lands, nor the notes, securities, etc., which were the subject of the gift of March 26, 1888. All were valid as to him, and he could not have recovered a dollar thereof from his children. Upon his death they therefore formed no part of his estate, unless, upon some established principle of law or equity, his widow had a right to so consider them. And this brings us to the main question in the case, namely, Under the laws of Illinois and of this state may a married man, during coverture, as against any post mortem claim of the widow, give away to his children the bulk of his property when the known effect of so doing is to diminish the share which she would have been otherwise entitled to upon his death? In this state there are some limitations upon the right of disposition of real property by a husband where the wife is a resident of this state; but section 8 of our act concerning descents and distributions (Gen. Stat. 1889, §2599), which allows to the widow one half in value of all the real estate in which the husband at any time during the marriage had a legal or equitable interest, not sold at judicial sale, and not necessary for the payment of debts, and to which the wife has made no conveyance, provides, further, that the wife shall not be entitled to any interest under said section in any lands to which the husband has made a conveyance, when the wife, at the time of the conveyance, is not, and never has been, a resident of this state. And in Buffington v. Grovesnor, 46 Kan. 730, 13 L. R. A. 262, it was held that this proviso is constitutional. Under this decision Rebecca Small is cut off from any claim of right, title, or interest in the Kansas lands, and the court below was correct in so holding.

The advancements of money and the gifts of notes and securities of March 26, 1888, were made in Illinois, and, if lawful there, we should probably so consider them here, even though invalid if made in this state; and this leads us to a consideration of the laws of Illinois applicable to this subject. The controversy constituting the subject-matter of the cases of Padfield v. Padfield in its several aspects was three times before the supreme court of Illinois, and received very full consideration. 68 Ill. 210, 72 Ill. 322, and 78 Ill. 16. It was finally held in the last suit, which was brought by the widow, that any disposition of personal property and credits by a husband in good faith, where no right or interest is reserved to him, either present or ultimate, though made to defeat the rights of his wife, will be good against her; and that there is nothing in the statute respecting the estates of deceased persons that in the slightest degree prevents the husband from disposing of his personal property free from any claim of his wife, whether by sale, gift to his children, or otherwise, in his lifetime. The court quotes approvingly from a note in Kerr on Fraud and Mistake (page 220) as follows: "There can be no doubt of the power of a husband to dispose absolutely of his property during his life independently of the concurrence, and exonerated from any claim of his wife, provided the transaction is not merely colorable, and be unattended with circumstances indicative of fraud upon the rights of the wife. If the disposition by the husband be bona fide, and no right is reserved to him, though made to defeat the right of the wife, it will be good against her." And the court refers to Dunnock v. Dunnock, 8 Md. Ch. 140; Cameron v. Cameron, 10 Smedes & M. 394, 43 Am. Dec. 759; Lightfoot v. Colgin, 5 Munf. 42; Stewart v. Stewart, 5 Conn. 317; and Holmes v. Holmes, 3 Paige, 363,—as fully supporting the doctrine. The court further says: "Again, the act of 1861, known as the 'Married Woman's Law,' confers upon femes covert the power of disposing of their separate property, absolutely and as they may choose, free from the control of their husbands. It was manifestly the intention of the general assembly to confer on married women the same, and no greater, rights, in regard to their property, as were possessed by their husbands. It would be singular, and we cannot suppose that the legislature could have intended to confer other or greater power on the wife than upon the husband. To hold that a feme covert has a vested interest in her husband's personal estate, that he is unable to divest in his lifetime, would be disastrous in the extreme to trade and commerce. Owing to commercial necessities, personalty must be left free for exchange, and, to be so, some one must be vested with full power to sell and transfer it free from latent and contingent claims." It is contended by counsel for Rebecca Small that section 4 of the Illinois statute of frauds was amended in 1874, after the rights in the Padfield Cases had vested, so that gifts made with intent to defraud "creditors or other persons" (the last three words having been added) were declared void, and that a widow comes within the designation of "other persons," and therefore the doctrine in the last Padfield Case is changed by statute; and that this is recognized in Tyler v. Tyler, 136 Ill. 525. In that case it appears that William A. Tyler, in anticipation of proceedings by his wife against him for separate maintenance, in Broome county, N. Y., went to Conneaut, Ohio, and assigned and delivered to his son, John B. Tyler, a large amount of notes, bonds, and mortgages, and also indirectly transferred to him certain lands. The suit was brought by the wife soon after the transfer. Afterwards William A. Tyler commenced an action in Illinois against his son to compel a reassignment of said notes, bonds, and mortgages and a reconveyance of the lands; but it was held by the supreme court of Illinois that the action could not be maintained, said William A. Tyler having transferred the property with intent to defraud the wife, and to render any judgment for separate maintenance ineffectual, the wife coming within the designation of "other persons" in said section 4 of the statute of frauds as amended. The Padfield Cases are not overruled, distinguished, nor otherwise referred to, but the case follows Draper v. Draper, 68 Ill. 17, where it was held that a conveyance, after bill filed for divorce and alimony, with intent to deprive the wife of alimony, was fraudulent, and should be set aside. The phrase "other persons" probably would not include a widow seeking to enforce her rights under the statute of descents and distributions. When general words follow particular and specific words, the former must be confined to things of the same kind. Sutherland, Stat. Constr. §§ 268, 273, 277; Guptil v. McFee, 9 Kan. 30, 37; White v. Isely, 84 Ga. 189, 199; State v. McGarry, 21 Wis. 496, 498. The word "creditors" serves to limit and control the generality of the following words "other persons" so as to include only those of like or similar kind and nature to creditors.

There seems to be a distinction between the rights of a widow and those of a wife driven by the aggressions of her husband to a suit for alimony or separate maintenance. In the latter case the wife is seeking to establish an unliquidated claim against her husband for money or property, and her relation to him is that of a quasi creditor. This dissimilarity is pointed out by Agnew, J., in Bouslough v. Bouslough, 68 Pa. 495, 499, as follows: "So the rule that forbids the wife to avoid the voluntary assignment or gift of her husband must change when her relation to him changes. There is no reason why a wife whose husband has deserted her, and refused to perform the duty of maintenance, or who, by cruel treatment, has compelled her to leave his house and commence proceedings for divorce and maintenance, should not be viewed as a quasi creditor in relation to the alimony which the law awards to her. So long as she is receiving maintenance, and is under his wing as it were, she is bound by his acts as to his personal estate; but when she is compelled to become a suitor for her rights, her relation becomes adverse, and that of a creditor in fact, and she is not to be balked of her dues by his fraud." Recognizing this distinction, it would seem that Rebecca Small, while residing with her husband in the most amicable relations, could not have maintained an action to set aside or annul the advancements and gifts to the children, nor to compel either her husband or the children to account to her for the same; and, as these advancements and gifts were valid as to her and valid as to Daniel Small when made, they formed no part of the estate at his death. But we need not go so far in this case. The reasoning in Padfield v. Padfield, supra, as to the married woman's law in Illinois is of much force here. In some states property acquired during coverture is known as "community property," and partakes to some extent of the nature of partnership property between husband and wife; but our legislation is in the opposite direction, manifesting a purpose to maintain, as far as practicable, the separate rights of husband and wife as well to accumulations during as before the existence of the married relation, and each is entitled to dispose of his or her own goods and chattels, with a slight modification as to mortgaging the same. Some of our former decisions have accorded in spirit with the doctrine established in Illinois. Butler v. Butler, 21 Kan. 521, 525, 526, 30 Am. Rep. 441; Munger v. Baldrige, 41 Kan. 241-244. The cases of Busenbark v. Busenbark, 83 Kan. 572, and Green v. Green, 34 Kan. 740, 55 Am. Rep. 256, both relate to protection of the husband and wife respectively during coverture from fraudulent alienation of real estate by the other, and are only remotely analogous to the case now under consideration. In Williams v. Williams, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kansas (40 Fed. Rep. 521), Foster, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The main question, in its broadest sense, is simply this: Can a married man give away his property, during coverture, for the purpose of preventing his wife from acquiring an interest therein after his death? The law seems to be that if such gift is bona fide, and accompanied by delivery, the widow cannot reach the property after the donor's death. . . . Neither the wife nor children have any tangible interest in the property of the husband or father during his lifetime, except so far as he is liable for their support, and hence he can sell it or give it away without let or hindrance from them. Of course the sale or gift must be absolute and bona fide, and not colorable only. And if the sale or gift would bind the grantor it would bind his heirs." We are aware that the authorities are not all in harmony upon this subject, but the cases asserting a contrary doctrine are generally under statutes or customs different from those of Illinois and Kansas, and we think the weight of authority in states having statutes upon this subject of the same general nature as our own establishes the doctrine herein announced. We cite some authorities in addition to those hereinbefore given, viz.: Pringle v. Pringle, 59 Pa. 281; Lines v. Lines, 142 Pa. 149; Richards v. Richards, 11 Humph. 429; Sanborn v. Goodhue, 28 N. H. 48, 59 Am. Dec. 898; Ford v. Ford, 4 Ala. 142, 146; Smith v. Hines, 10 Fla. 258, 285; Stewart, Husb. & W. § 301; Thornton, Gifts, § 488. We are of opinion that the rights of Rebecca Small are controlled by the will and the contract of May 9, 1888. If there was any real estate or personal property in Illinois or elsewhere not disposed of by the will nor included in the contract, of course she is entitled to her proper share of the same.

The judgment will be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

All the Justices concur.

Rehearing denied December 21, 1895.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

MISSOURI PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Pf. in Err.,
v.

George MEEH.

(59 Fed. Rep. 753.)

1. Filing a plea to the merits before filing a plea in abatement to the jurisdiction of the court, upon the ground of citizenship, is not a waiver of the question of jurisdiction under the act of Congress of March 3, 1875, § 5, making it the duty of the Federal circuit courts to dismiss or remand a suit not involving a dispute properly within the jurisdiction.

2. Two states cannot by joint action create a corporation which will be regarded as a single corporate entity, and for jurisdictional purposes a citizen of each state which joined in creating it.

3. The result of creation by one state of a corporation of a given name, and the declaration of the legislature of an adjoining state that the same legal entity shall be or become a corporation of that state, and be entitled to exercise within its borders all of its corporate functions by the same board of directors, is not to create a single corporation, but two corporations of the same name having a different paternity.

4. An interstate corporation having but one board of directors, formed by process of consolidation or otherwise, acts in each of such states as a domestic, and not as a foreign, corporation.

5. A Federal court has no jurisdiction of an action by a citizen of the state against a consolidated railway company organized under the statutes of that and adjoining states, for personal injuries inflicted within the state, as such corporation is a domestic corporation for jurisdictional purposes.

(September 2, 1895.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Before Caldwell, Sanborn, and Thayer, Circuit Judges.

Mr. B. P. Waggener, for plaintiff in error:

When a consolidated company is formed by union of several corporations chartered by different states, it is a citizen of each of the states which granted the charter to any one of its constituent companies, and when sued in one of those states it cannot claim the right of removal on the ground that it is also a citizen of another state.

A corporation is the creature of the state bringing it into existence; it cannot migrate nor have a citizenship in two or more states at the same time, for the purpose of avoiding the process of the Federal courts therein, any more than an individual can be a citizen of two or more states at the same time, and for the same reason.

Thayer, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The question for consideration in this case is whether a citizen and resident of the state of Kansas can maintain in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kansas a suit against a railroad company for personal injuries sustained within the state of Kansas in consequence of the negligent conduct of the said railroad company, it appearing that, when the injuries were so sustained, said railroad company was duly incorporated under the laws of Kansas, and was operating a line of railroad in that state, and that it was also duly incorporated under the laws of the states of Missouri and Nebraska. The question arises in this wise: George Meeh, the defendant in error, sued the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, the plaintiff in error, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kansas, alleging that he was a citizen and resident of the state of Kansas, that the defendant company was a citizen and resident of the state of Missouri, and that he (the plaintiff) had sustained certain personal injuries, to his damage in the sum of $10,000, in consequence of the negligent operation by the defendant company of one of its trains near the town of Admire, in Lyon county, Kan. At the return term, on April 7, 1894, the defendant company appeared, and filed an answer to the complaint, which alleged, among other things, that it was a railway corporation "duly chartered, incorporated, and organized under and by virtue of the laws of the states of Kansas, Nebraska, and Missouri, and, as such corporation, operates a line of railway into and through the counties of Lyon and Leavenworth, in the state of Kansas." Later, on June 8, 1894, it filed a plea to the jurisdiction, alleging that the plaintiff was "a resident, citizen, and inhabitant of the state of Kansas, and the said defendant, the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, was a corporation made up by the consolidation of three or more separate and distinct corporations, one incorporated under the laws of the state of Missouri, another under the laws of the state of Kansas, and another under the laws of the state of Nebraska, and that its articles of incorporation have been duly filed with the secretary of state of the state of Kansas, and it was at the date of the institution of this suit, and still is, a corporation incorporated under the laws of each of the states of Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska, and the requisite diverse citizenship does not exist to give this court jurisdiction, and there is no Federal question involved." No action appears to have been taken on this plea. Later, on June 11, 1894, the defendant company filed an amended answer to the complaint, the second and third paragraphs whereof were as follows:

"Second. For further answer defendant says that this court has no jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine the matters herein; that at the commencement of this action, and prior to the alleged injuries complained of by the plaintiff, the plaintiff was, and ever since has been, a citizen, resident, and inhabitant of the state of Kansas; that at the commencement of this suit the defendant was, and ever since has been, a corporation chartered and incorporated under the laws of each the states of Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska; that the said Missouri Pacific Railway Company was originally incorporated under the laws of the state of Missouri, but subsequently, and before the institution of this action, the said company, as so incorporated under the laws of Missouri, was duly and legally consolidated under the laws of Kansas with certain railway companies duly and legally incorporated under the laws of the state of Kansas, and subsequently such consolidated company was also consolidated under the laws of Nebraska with certain corporations incorporated under the laws of Nebraska, and such consolidated company then and there took the name of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, the defendant herein; that the said defendant as consolidated had and has but one board of directors, and operates its system of railroad into and through the states of Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska; and said defendant at the commencement of this suit was, and ever since has been, a resident citizen and inhabitant of the state of Kansas.

"Third. Defendant further says that this court has no jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine the question in controversy; that the state of Missouri is not included in or a part of the district of Kansas."

The plaintiff demurred to the second and third paragraphs of the amended answer, for the reason that the same were not sufficient in law, and the circuit court sustained the demurrer. Subsequently there was a trial before a jury, and a verdict was returned and a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff.

Preliminary to a discussion of the main question in the case, noted above, we will notice two points urged by counsel for the defendant in error.

It is insisted that the jurisdictional question was waived, and does not arise upon the present record, because the defendant company filed a plea to the merits before filing a plea in abatement to the jurisdiction of the court. This point is not well taken, and must be overruled. It is true that it was once held that an objection to the jurisdiction of the court upon the ground of citizenship, in actions at law, should be made by a plea in abatement, and that, if a plea to the merits or the general issue was filed, it was a waiver of the plea in abatement, and that a plea of the latter character came too late and was of no avail if filed after or in connection with a plea to the merits. De Sobry v. Nicholson, 70 U. S. 8 Wall. 420, 18 L. ed. 263; D'Wolf v. Rabaud, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 476, 7 L. ed. 227; Smith v. Kernochen, 48 U. S. 7 How. 198, 216, 12 L. ed. 666, 678; Sheppard v. Graves, 55 U. S. 14 How. 505, 510, 14 L. ed. 518, 520 Wickliffe v. Owings, 58 U. S. 17 How. 47, 15 L. ed. 44; Conard v. Atlantic Ins. Co. 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 886, 450, 7 L. ed. 189, 217. But this rule was abolished by section 5 of the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. at L. p. 473, chap. 137), which makes it the duty of the Federal circuit courts to dismiss a suit at any time, or to remand it to the state court if it was originally removed therefrom, when it appears "to the satisfaction of the court . . . that such suit does not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of said circuit court, or that the parties to said suit have been improperly or collusively made or joined either as plaintiffs or defendants for the purpose of creating a case cognizable" by the Federal courts. By virtue of this statute, the time within which an objection to the jurisdiction may be taken is not limited as heretofore. The right to make such an objection is not waived by filing a plea to the merits, but the objection may be taken at any time after the suit is brought, in any appropriate manner, either by motion or plea; and it is the duty of the Federal courts at all times either to dismiss or to remand a cause for want of

It is further insisted in behalf of the defendant in error that, when the demurrer to the second paragraph of the answer was sustained, the answer simply alleged that the Missouri Pacific Railway Company was a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of Kansas "at the commencement of the suit," and that this averment in the answer did not meet the general allegation of the complaint that the defendant company "was a citizen and resident of the state of Missouri." We need not stop to decide whether this view is sound or unsound, because the second paragraph of the answer containing the plea to the jurisdiction was immediately amended by leave of court so as to state that the Missouri Pacific Railway Company was a Kansas corporation, operating a line of road in that state, when the alleged injuries were sustained, as well as when the suit was commenced; and the case went to trial on the amended special plea alleging this fact, which was neither denied by the reply nor the sufficiency thereof challenged by demurrer. The case was obviously tried by the circuit court, and the demurrer to the second and third paragraphs of the answer was obviously sustained, on the ground that the fact that the defendant company had been incorporated in Missouri as well as in Kansas entitled a citizen of Kansas to sue it in the Federal circuit court of that state for an act of negligence there committed. We must accordingly consider and decide whether that view is tenable.

At this day it must be regarded as settled beyond doubt or controversy that two states of this Union cannot by their joint action create a corporation which will be regarded as a single corporate entity, and, for jurisdictional purposes, a citizen of each state which joined in creating it. One state may create a corporation of a given name, and the legislature of an adjoining state may declare that the same legal entity shall be or become a corporation of that state as well, and be entitled to exercise within its borders, by the same board of directors and officers, all of its corporate functions. Nevertheless, the result of such legislation is not to create a single corporation, but two corporations of the same name, having a different paternity. This was decided in Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Wheeler, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 286, 297, 17 L. ed. 130, 133, where Mr. Chief Justice Taney, speaking for the Supreme Court, said: "It is true that a corporation by the name and style of the plaintiffs appears to have been chartered by the states of Indiana and Ohio, clothed with the same capacities and powers, and intended to accomplish the same objects; and it is spoken of in the laws of the states as one corporate body, exercising the same powers and fulfilling the same duties in both states. Yet it has no legal existence in either state, except by the law of the state, and neither state could confer on it a corporate existence in the other, nor add to or diminish the powers to be there exercised. It may, indeed, be composed of and represent, under the corporate name, the same natural persons. But the legal entity or person, which exists by force of law, can have no existence beyond the limits of the state or sovereignty which brings it into life and endues it with its faculties and powers. The president and directors of the Ohio & Mississippi Railroad Company is, therefore, a distinct and separate corporate body in Indiana from the corporate body of the same name in Ohio, and they cannot be joined in a suit as one and the same plaintiff, nor maintain a suit in that character against a citizen of Ohio or Indiana in a circuit court of the United States."

The doctrine of this case was afterwards reaffirmed in Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Whitton, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 270, 283, 20 L. ed. 571, 575, where Mr. Justice Field used the following language, speaking of a corporation that had been duly incorporated under the laws of Illinois and Wisconsin: "But it is said—and here the objection to the jurisdiction arises—that the defendant is also a corporation under the laws of Illinois, and therefore is also a citizen of the same state with the plaintiff. The answer to this position is obvious. In Wisconsin the laws of Illinois have no operation. The defendant is a corporation, and as such a citizen, of Wisconsin, by the laws of that state. It is not there a corporation or a citizen of any other state. Being there sued, it can only be brought into court as a citizen of that state, whatever its status or citizenship may be elsewhere. Nor is there anything against this view, but, on the contrary, much to support it, in the case of Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Wheeler [supra]."

These cases have since been referred to, and the doctrine enunciated therein has been approved, in Muller v. Doves, 94 U. S. 444, 447, 24 L. ed. 207, 208; in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. St. Louis, A & T. H. R. Co. 118 U. S. 290, 298, 30 L. ed. 88, 88; and in Nashua & L. R. Corp. v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 136 U. S. 856, 876, 877, 34 L. ed. 868, 868, 869. They have also been cited and followed by the supreme courts of Michigan and Illinois in Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Auditor General, 53 Mich. 91; in Racine & M. R. Co. v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 49 Ill. 331, 348, 95 Am. Dec. 595; and by Judge Caldwell on the circuit in Fitzgerald v. Missouri P. R. Co. 45 Fed. Rep. 813.

Chief Justice Cooley remarked in Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Auditor General, supra, that "it is impossible to conceive of one joint act, performed simultaneously by two sovereign states, which shall bring a single corporation into being, except it be by compact or treaty. There may be separate consent given for the consolidation of corporations separately created; but, when the two unite, they severally bring to the new entity the powers and privileges already possessed, and the consolidated company simply exercises in each jurisdiction the powers the corporation there chartered had possessed, and succeeds there to its privileges."

And in the case of Quincy Railroad Bridge Co. v. Adams County, 88 Ill. 615, 619, Mr. Justice Breese said, speaking of a corporation that had been incorporated both by the states of Illinois and Missouri: "The states of Illinois and Missouri have no power to unite in passing any legislative act. It is impossible, in the very nature of their organizations, that they can do so. They cannot so fuse themselves into a single sovereignty, and as such create a body politic which shall be a corporation of the two states, without being a corporation of each state or of either state. As argued by appellee, the only possible status of a company acting under charters from two states is, that it is an association incorporated in and by each of the states, and when acting as a corporation in either of the states it acts under the authority of the charter of the state in which it is then acting, and that only, the legislation of the other state having no operation beyond its territorial limits. We do not, and cannot, understand that appellant derives any of its corporate powers from the legislature of the state of Missouri, but wholly and entirely from the general assembly of this state."

Assuming, then, that there are three distinct legal entities known as the Missouri Pacific Railway Company,—one a corporation of Missouri, another a corporation of Kansas, and another a corporation of Nebraska,—we turn to consider whether, on the state of facts disclosed by this record, the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kansas had jurisdiction of the case at bar. We think that this question was practically decided in the cases heretofore cited. Thus, in Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Whitton, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 270, 283, 20 L. ed. 571, 575, the plaintiff, who was a citizen of Illinois, sued the railway company, which had been incorporated by the states of Wisconsin and Illinois, in the courts of Wisconsin, for a negligent act committed in Wisconsin. Subsequently the plaintiff removed the case to the circuit court of the United States for the district of Wisconsin, and the question arose whether the latter court had jurisdiction. It will be noticed that in the paragraph of the opinion above quoted Mr. Justice Field said: "The defendant is a corporation, and as such a citizen, of Wisconsin, by the laws of that state. It is not there a corporation or a citizen of any other state. Being there sued, it can only be brought into court as a citizen of that state whatever its status or citizenship may be elsewhere."

So, in the case of Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Wheeler, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 286, 17 L. ed. 180, the plaintiff company described itself as a corporation created and existing under the laws of the states of Indiana and Ohio, having its principal office in Cincinnati, Ohio. It sued Wheeler, describing him as a citizen of Indiana, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Indiana; but the supreme court held that the action could not be maintained, saying in substance that in the character in which the company had sued, as a corporation of Indiana and Ohio, it could not maintain a suit against a citizen of Ohio or Indiana in a circuit court of the United States. The decisions in Nashua & L. R. Corp. v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 186 U. S. 856, 865, 84 L. ed. 868, 864, and in Muller v. Dows, 94 U. S. 444, 447, 24 L. ed. 207, 208, do not conflict with the prior decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, for in the former of these cases the New Hampshire corporation, the Nashua Railroad, which had been created a corporation of the state of Massachusetts, sued the Massachusetts corporation in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, to adjust certain differences that had arisen, growing out of a contract in which the two companies had dealt with each other as separate legal entities; and it was held that the suit could be maintained. So, in Muller v. Dows two citizens of New York and a citizen of Missouri united in bringing a suit against two railroad corporations in the district of Iowa. Both of the defendant corporations were incorporated under the laws of Iowa, but one of them, by consolidation proceedings, had also become a corporation of the state of Missouri. This fact was supposed to destroy the jurisdiction of the court. But the supreme court held otherwise, saying that the consolidated company "in the state of Iowa [where sued] . . . was an Iowa corporation existing under the laws of that state alone." The rule, we think, that may fairly be extracted from these cases, is this: That whenever a corporation of one state, by legislative sanction, becomes also a corporation of another state, either by the process of consolidation or otherwise, whatever acts it subsequently does or performs in the latter state it does and performs as a domestic, and not as a foreign, corporation. It derives all of its powers to act as a corporation in the state of its adoption from local laws. If it is there sued for an act done within the state, it is sued and must answer as a domestic, and not as a foreign, corporation. The same thought was expressed by Mr. Justice Breese in the passage quoted from Quincy Railroad Bridge Co. v. Adams County, supra, when he said: "The only possible status of a company acting under charters from two states is, that it is an association incorporated in and by each of the states; and when acting as a corporation in either of the states, it acts under the authority of the charter of the state in which it is then acting, and that only, the legislation of the other state having no operation beyond its territorial limits."

Nor is there anything new or strange in the view that a foreign corporation, when created a corporation by the laws of some other state, must thereafter act in the latter state and be there dealt with as a domestic corporation. It was long ago said in Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168, 181, 19 L. ed. 857, 860, that a "corporation, being the mere creation of local law, can have no legal existence beyond the limits of the sovereignty where created. . . . The recognition of its existence even by other states, and the enforcement of its contracts made therein, depend purely upon the comity of those states, — a comity which is never extended where the existence of the corporation or the exercise of its powers are prejudicial to their interests or repugnant to their policy. Having no absolute right of recognition in other states, but depending for such recognition and the enforcement of its contracts upon their assent, it follows, as a matter of course, that such assent may be granted upon such terms and conditions as those states may think proper to impose. They may exclude the foreign corporation entirely; they may restrict its business to particular localities, or they may exact such security for the performance of its contracts with their citizens as in their judgment will best promote the public interest. The whole matter rests in their discretion." Instead of merely licensing a foreign corporation to operate a railroad or to transact any other business within its borders, a state may, for reasons of its own, adopt the foreign corporation by creating it a domestic corporation with the same franchises and powers that it exercises in the state which originally created it, or with powers that are less or more extensive. When a state pursues the latter course, and adopts the foreign corporation as one of its own creation, it follows, we think, that all of its subsequent acts and transactions within the state of its adoption are the acts of a domestic corporation, that the franchises and powers there exercised were conferred by local laws, and that process served upon its officers or agents within the state is served upon the domestic corporation rather than upon the foreign corporation of the same name.

It follows from what has been said that the parties to the suit at bar must be regarded as citizens and residents of the same state. The averments contained in the amended answer are sufficient to show that the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, which figured as the defendant in the circuit court and as the plaintiff in error here, is in reality a domestic corporation of the state of Kansas. The injuries complained of were inflicted upon a citizen of the state of Kansas while the defendant company was operating its road in that state. Under these circumstances, we hold that the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kansas had no jurisdiction of the case, and that, upon the state of facts disclosed by the present record, the suit should have been dismissed.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is accordingly reversed, and the case is remanded to that court for a new trial.

*A city of the second class is vested with power to construct at its own expense, or to require the construction by a railroad company at its expense, of a viaduct or bridge over railroad tracks within the city, where the safety and convenience of the public make it necessary; and, when it is deemed to be just that the cost of such a structure should be divided between the city and the railroad company, the city may contribute or bind itself to pay a share of such cost.

ERROR to the District Court for Wyandotte County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover money which defendant had contracted to contribute toward the building of a bridge. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Waters & Waters for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. A. A. Hurd and Mills, Smith, & Hobbs, for defendant in error:

The acceptance of the terms of the Ordinance No. 240 by the railroad, and the building of the viaduct, were a dedication of it to the public as a street.

The city had ample power to pass the ordinance and enter into the contract it did for the building of the viaduct.

It would be contrary to equity and good conscience for the city to repudiate the payment of the amount it agreed to pay, and it is estopped from so doing.

by the railroad company, and which the city had agreed to pay. It appears that prior to the settlement of Argentine the railroad company had established large yards, with many tracks, at that location, and that afterwards people settled and built homes on both sides of the railroad yards. Two streets were laid out and opened across the yards, which the inhabitants of the city used in going from one side of the yards to the other. When the city reached a population of 5,000, and had within its limits a smelter and a number of elevators, making a great deal of business in the yards, crossing over the same at grade was deemed to be inconvenient and dangerous. An ordinance was then adopted by the city directing the railroad company to construct a viaduct over all the railroad tracks operated by it, at a point near a certain avenue, to be selected by the city council, and which was to be 20 feet wide, and, with the approaches, would be about 1,333 feet long. It was to be constructed according to certain plans and specifications which had been prepared, at an estimated cost of $15,000. A further provision was that the railroad company should also build a foot viaduct over the same tracks at another point; and it was provided that, on the completion of both viaducts in accordance with the plans and specifications, the city of Argentine should pay to the railroad company $3,000 of the cost thereof. It was provided that, on the completion of the viaducts, they should be public highways, to be used by the public instead of the grade crossings, and should be forever maintained and kept in repair by the city, without expense to the railroad company. Other provisions were made with respect to the change of the grade of the streets to correspond with the approaches to the viaducts, as well as for the reconstruction or widening of the same in certain contingencies, and for the laying of water and gas mains under the tracks of the railroad company. It was finally ordained that if, within thirty days after the passage of the ordinance, the railroad company should file in the office of the city clerk a written acceptance of the provisions of the ordinance, it should then become a contract between the city and the railroad company, binding upon both parties. Within the time limited, the terms and conditions of the ordinance were accepted by the railroad company. The city selected the locations for the viaducts, and they were built by the railroad company in compliance with the provisions of the ordinance, and with the plans and specifications which had been prepared, at an actual cost to the railroad company of about $15,700; and, if the usual charges for transportation of material were made, it would add to the amount named from $1,600 to $2,000. The city and its officers knew of the building of the viaducts, and no legal steps were taken to prevent it, and since then the viaducts have been in constant use by the inhabitants and others for teams, vehicles, and pedestrians. At a special election in the city, bonds to pay the $3,000 claim of the railroad company, and for the construction of certain sewers and the building of a city hall, were voted upon. The bonds have been issued and sold for such purposes. Taxes have been levied in the city to pay these bonds, and the sum of $3,000 is in the hands of the city treasurer, set apart as the viaduct fund, having been derived from the sale of the bonds voted for the purpose of paying the $3,000 claim of the railroad company. The claim was duly presented in writing by the railroad company to the mayor and council, with a full account of the items thereof, duly verified as required by law, but payment was refused by the city, when the present action was brought. The railroad company recovered the full amount claimed, and the city complains and presents the single proposition that it had no power to make the contract which was made with the railroad company.

Argentine is a city of the second class, and, although there is no statute which in express terms provides for the building of viaducts in cities of that class, there appears to be ample authority for such a city to build or require the building of viaducts or bridges over railroad tracks where the convenience and safety of the public make it necessary. In the act governing cities of the second class, authority is given to open and improve streets, avenues, and alleys, and to build bridges, within the city. Gen. Stat. 1889, ¶ 788. It is also provided that the city may provide for the passage of railways through the streets and grounds of the city, regulate depots, depot grounds, the crossing of railway tracks, the running of railway engines, cars, and trains within the limits of the city, and make any other and further provisions to prevent accidents at crossings and on the tracks of railways. Paragraph 821. In addition to these, there are provisions vesting the care, management, and control of the city in the mayor and council, authorizing them to open, widen, extend, or otherwise improve the streets and avenues of the city, and to prevent all encroachments upon them, and granting authority to them to enact all such ordinances as they shall deem expedient for maintaining the good government and welfare of the city, its trade and commerce. Paragraphs 787, 811, 812, 824. Under these general provisions, we think there is ample power in a city of the second class to construct or require the construction of viaducts over railroad tracks. In addition to these, however, there is express authority given for the construction of bridges. In the more enlarged sense of that word, viaducts over railroad tracks are included. Worcester defines the word "bridge:" "A pathway erected over a river, canal, road; etc., in order that a passage may be made from one side to the other." Webster defines it as "a structure, usually of wood, stone, brick, or iron, erected over a river or other watercourse, or over a ravine, railroad, etc., to make a continuous roadway from one bank to the other." The last-named authority defines the word "viaduct" as "a bridge." According to modern usage, the term "bridge" may be appropriately applied to the viaducts which were constructed by the railroad company; and we think it may be fairly said that the term was used in that sense in the statute. Gen. Stat. 1889, ¶ 788; State v. Gorham, 37 Me. 461.

It is conceded by the city that it had the power to compel the railroad company to build the viaducts wholly at the expense of the company, and that the city can build them at its own expense under the provisions mentioned there can be little doubt. As the city may construct them entirely at its own expense, no reason is seen why it may not contribute a part of the expense of viaducts determined to be necessary. The questions of necessity and expediency of viaducts, the character and cost of those which the safety and convenience of the public may require, and the means of providing them, including what proportion of the expense should be borne by the city and what by the railroad company, are for the determination of the mayor and council, rather than the court. The fact that the city can compel the railroad company to build a viaduct upon certain conditions at its own expense does not prevent the city from sharing the expense under other circumstances where it is deemed to be just that a division of the expense should be made; and that question, like the others which have been mentioned, so far as the municipality is concerned, rests with the legislative authority of the city.

It is contended that the viaduct is not a public highway, but is constructed over the private property of the railroad company, and for this reason, also, the power of the city is questioned. The viaducts were to be constructed at a place to be designated by the city, and to connect with the streets on each side of the tracks and yards. They were supported by posts of iron, resting on foundations of masonry, braced with iron bolts and sway rods, so as to make a safe and substantial structure. It was provided that the viaducts, when constructed, should be and remain public highways, for the use of the public. The railroad company, having accepted the provisions of the ordinance and constructed the viaducts over its yards, has effectually dedicated the land as a public highway, and would be estopped from interfering with the easement so long as it is maintained as a public highway.

Our opinion is that the district court reached a correct conclusion in holding that the city had the power to contract with the railroad company for the construction of the viaducts, and that it is liable for the share of the cost of the same which it agreed to pay. It is unnecessary to determine the validity of the provisions as to future maintenance, and upon that question we express no opinion.

The judgment of the District Court will be affirmed.

WILMINGTON & WELDON RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(.....N. C.)

1. He who has the last clear chance, notwithstanding the negligence of the adverse party, is considered solely responsible for injuries resulting from his failure to exercise reasonable care.
2. The failure of an engineer to perform his duty to maintain a reasonably vigilant lookout along the track in front of the train renders the railroad company liable for killing a human being lying on the track apparently helpless from any cause, when the engineer could have seen him by the exercise of ordinary care.
3. It is proper to instruct the jury that plaintiff's negligence is immaterial if they find that the defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.
4. The qualification of a witness to give an opinion is for the court to decide.
5. An instruction that the measure of damages for the loss of a human life is the net moneyed value of the intestate's life to those dependent upon him is not sufficient to cure a refusal to instruct that it would be the present value of accumulations arising from his net income based upon his expectancy of life.
6. A new trial solely for the purpose of inquiring as to the damages may be granted on a reversal for errors affecting damages only.

(November 12, 1895.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Duplin County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. R. Allen and H. L. Stevens for appellant.

Messrs. A. D. Ward and N. J. Rouse for appellee.

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The most important question presented by the appeal is whether the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that if the plaintiff's intestate deliberately laid down upon the track, and either carelessly or intentionally fell asleep there, the defendant was not liable, unless the engineer actually saw that he was lying there in time, by the reasonable use of the appliances at his command, to have stopped the train before it reached him. In the headnote to Smith v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 114 N. C. 729, 25 L. R. A. 237, it seems that the intelligent reporter deduced from the opinion of the court the principle that, while the mere going upon the track of a railroad is not contributory negligence, any injury subsequently inflicted by a collision with a passing train is deemed to be due to the carelessness of the person who goes upon it, unless it is shown that he looked and listened for its approach. While such an abstract proposition may be fairly drawn from the reasoning upon which the opinion is founded, the new trial was in fact awarded, because the court below refused to instruct the jury that if the plaintiff's intestate was drunk, though he was lying apparently helpless upon the track, the defendant was not liable, unless its engineer actually saw that he was in danger in time to avert the injury by reasonable care. The learned counsel who argued this case for the defendant, without citing Smith's Case in support of his contention, obviously invoked the aid of the principle there decided when he rested his argument upon the proposition that one who carelessly or purposely falls asleep on a railway track is not only negligent in exposing himself upon first going there, but that, though he afterwards becomes utterly unconscious, there is, in contemplation of law, a continuing carelessness on his part up to the moment of a collision, which is, concurrently with the fault of the defendant, a proximate cause of an ensuing injury, or operates to acquit the carrier of what would have been culpable carelessness and a causa causans if the injury had been inflicted on a horse, a pig, a cow, or a person rendered insensible in any other manner than by drunkenness or deliberately or carelessly falling asleep. So that we are again called upon to review Smith's Case, and to determine whether we will modify the principle there laid down, or extend its operation to other cases coming within the reason upon which it is founded.

The language of Judge Cooley which is cited in Clark v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 109 N. C. 449, 14 L. R. A. 749, is that, "if the original wrong only becomes injurious in consequence of intervention of some distinct wrongful act or omission by another, the injury shall be imputed to the last wrong as the proximate cause, and not to that which was more remote." If, in the case at bar, the plaintiff's intestate was in fault in lying down upon the track, and his carelessness culminated in doing so, then it is clear that the engineer was in fault in failing to keep a proper lookout if he could by doing so have seen the deceased in time through the reasonable use of the appliances at his command to have averted the injury, and his carelessness, of course, intervened after that of plaintiff's intestate. If he had looked and stopped the train, the collision would have been prevented, notwithstanding the previous want of care on the part of the boy who was killed.

In Herring v. Wilmington & R. R. Co. 10 Ired. L. 402, 51 Am. Dec. 895, this court followed what was at the time the generally accepted doctrine,—that persons who went upon railroad tracks at places other than public crossings were trespassers, to whom the carrier owed no duty of watchfulness, and for whose safety it was in no wise liable, unless its engineer actually saw that there was danger of injury from a collision, and wilfully refused to use means by which he could have averted it. In Gunter v. Wicker, 85 N. C. 310, this court gave its sanction to the principle first distinctly formulated in Davies v. Mann, 10 Mees. & W. 545, that "notwithstanding the previous negligence of the plaintiff, if, at the time the injury was done, it might have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable care and prudence on the part of the defendant, an action will lie for damages." This doctrine was subsequently approved in Sautter v. New York & W. S. S. Co. 88 N. C. 123, 48 Am. Rep. 736; Turrentine v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 92 N. C. 638; Meredith v. Cranberry Coal & I. Co. 99 N. C. 576; Roberts v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 88 N. C. 560; Farmer v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. Id. 564; Bullock v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 105 N. C. 180; Wilson v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 90 N. C. 69; Snowden v. Norfolk Southern R. Co. 95 N. C. 98; Carlton v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 104 N. C. 365; Randall v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 104 N. C. 410. And it was repeatedly declared in those cases that it was negligence on the part of the engineer of a railway company to fail to exercise reasonable care in keeping a lookout, not only for stock and obstructions, but for apparently helpless or infirm human beings on the track, and that the failure to do so, supervening after the negligence of another, where persons or animals were exposed to danger, would be deemed the proximate cause of any resulting injury.

It was after all of these precedents following Gunter v. Wicker, supra, that the court in Deans v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 107 N. C. 686, was confronted with the question whether a railway company was liable where, by ordinary care, its engineer could have stopped its train in time to prevent its running over a man lying asleep upon its track, under the doctrine of Gunter v. Wicker, or whether, the accident having occurred at a place other than a public crossing, the company could be held answerable, under the rule as stated in Herring v. Wilmington & R. R. Co. only where it was shown that the engineer actually saw the trespasser, and had reasonable ground to comprehend his condition. Upon mature consideration, the court overruled Herring's Case, and stated the rule applicable in such cases to be that "if the engineer discover, or by reasonable watchfulness may discover, a person lying upon the track asleep or drunk, or see a human being, who is known by him to be insane, or otherwise insensible to danger, or unable to avoid it, upon the track in his front, it is his duty to resolve all doubts in favor of the preservation of life, and immediately use every available means, short of imperiling the lives of passengers on his train, to stop it." This rule was approved in express terms in Meredith v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 108 N. C. 618; Linkle v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 109 80 L. R. A.

N. C. 472; Clark v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 109 N. C. 444, 445, 14 L. R. A. 749; Norwood v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 111 N. C. 240; Cawfield v. Asheville Street R. Co. 111 N. C. 600.

In Smith's Case, supra, the same questions were again presented, and this court was asked to overrule the doctrine of Deans v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. and reinstate Herring v. Wilmington & R. R. Co. as authority. The court declined to overrule Deans's Case and others which had followed it, but held that in so far as the opinions purported to bring within the protection of the rule a person who is lying upon the track, in an insensible state brought about by drunkenness, they were entitled only to the weight of dicta. No member of the court adopted this particular view but the chief justice, who delivered the leading opinion. The other members of the court were either in favor of sustaining without any modification, or of overruling in toto, the principle as enunciated in Deans's Case. The learned counsel for the defendant now contends that one who deliberately incurs the risk of lying down upon the track is no more entitled to the protection of the law than a drunken person, and that, where he is killed, his personal representative cannot invoke the benefit of a rule which subverses the purpose of shielding even brutes from the same unnecessary peril. At common law, in England, the owner of cattle was required to keep them in or restrain them from trespassing on the lands of others. 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 418, 626, 627. But in this country the rule has been either modified by statute or in a much larger number of states entirely disregarded, because the reason upon which it was founded, under different conditions, had ceased to operate. 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 419-422. The principle deduced from Davies v. Mann, as is said by discriminating law writers, is that "the party who has the last clear opportunity of avoiding the accident, notwithstanding the negligence of his opponent, is considered solely responsible for it." 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. p. 165. This rule has now been adopted in almost all of the southern and western states, but has been construed in some of them and by a number of text-writers as applying to injuries done by moving trains only, where the engineer actually sees an animal or a person. But this court, soon after adopting the rule laid down in Davies v. Mann (in Gunter v. Wicker, supra), construed it in its application to animals in Wilson v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 90 N. C. 69 (followed by Snowden's, Carlton's, Bullock's, and Randall's Cases, supra), to mean that an engineer was not only negligent in failing to avert an injury to animals actually seen, but those which might by proper vigilance have been seen by him, in time by the use of the appliances at his command, and without peril to the safety of persons on the train, to avert the accident.

It is settled irrevocably in North Carolina that a railway company is answerable in damages for an injury to any valuable domestic animal due to the failure of the engineer to exercise reasonable care in observing the track in his front, and to passengers on a train when caused by a want of similar vigilance on the part of the same servant in keeping an outlook for obstructions. The question presented in this case, therefore, as in Smith's Case, is whether, by any sort of legal fiction, we can hold a servant faultless for failure to see one who has voluntarily fallen upon the track, and yielded to the influence of sleep, or who, overcome with drunkenness, lies prostrate in the way of a train when either or both are sandwiched between obstructions; also, animals, children, or persons unconscious from sickness, or known by the engineer to be deaf, whom the law declares it is his duty to see, if it is possible for him, by the exercise of ordinary care, to do so. The opinion of the court in Smith's Case not only concedes, but adduces much authority to sustain, the correctness of the ruling in Deans v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. and the later opinions approving it, as therein interpreted, but proceeds upon the idea that, in so far as any previous opinion had stated that a railway company owed the duty of watchfulness to drunken persons lying on its track, or became liable for failure to discharge it, unless actually seen by the engineer, they were dicta only. It was true, however, as to Deans's and Clark's Cases, that there was some evidence tending to show that, in the one instance, the person who fell asleep on the track was drunk, and, in the other, that the man killed was intoxicated when he went upon the trestle.

To illustrate the operation of the conflicting rules as they now stand, suppose that the engineer is approaching a straight cut, through which he can see for one fourth of a mile, or for a sufficient distance to stop his train without breach of his duty to those on it before reaching the cut, and that at the entrance nearest him a sleeping child, 10 feet further a cow, and 10 feet further still a large boulder with a drunken man, or one who has deliberately laid down, resting, asleep, and unconscious, upon it, are ranged successively. Suppose, then, that the engineer carelessly fails to look out and see the sleeping child, the cow, or the boulder, and, by successive collisions, kills the child, the cow, and the man on the boulder, and the train is wrecked by striking the boulder, so that a number of passengers are likewise killed. The result would present a legal paradox under the law as it now stands. The servant who represents the company would render it liable for his omission of the duty of keeping a lookout, for which the company could be mulcted in damages by the personal representatives of the child and of the passengers and by the owner of the cow, and yet, though the engineer could not discharge the duty, which never ceased, of watching for the boulder without seeing the drunkard or the sleeping man, the failure to see either is, in contemplation of law, no culpable breach of duty. The learned counsel for the defendant has given, it seems to us, quite as cogent reasons for holding that a railroad company is absolved from duty to one who wilfully or carelessly exposes himself to peril by sleeping upon a track as to one who falls down in a state of utter unconsciousness, superinduced by drinking, and cited equally as strong and numerous authorities in support of his contention. But the reasons and the authority relied upon emanate generally from courts which hold that both persons and animals upon a track are trespassers, and entitled to consideration only where actually seen in time to save them. It is not strange that courts, where it is held that railway companies owe no duty to any one who goes on their track and is not seen, should have sought support for their position where a drunken man happened to be the victim of carelessness, in the theory that he was deemed to be still concurring up to the time of the accident, and was less deserving of consideration than a sober trespasser. But it must not be forgotten that in the last analysis, notwithstanding the additional reason assigned, the drunkard in the states holding to the principle that we have repudiated, is excluded from the right to recover because he is a trespasser, just as his sober neighbor would be barred of the right if he were injured by his side, and, when actually seen, the same duty of protection arises as to both.

The admitted test rule to which we have adverted, that he who has the last clear chance notwithstanding the negligence of the adverse party, is considered solely responsible, must be applied in contemplation of the law which prescribes and fixes their relative duties. The law, as settled by two lines of authorities here, imposes upon the engineer of a moving train the duty of reasonable care in observing the track; and if, by reason of his omission to look out for cows, horses, and hogs, he fails to see a drunken man or a reckless boy asleep on the track, it cannot be denied that he is guilty of a dereliction of duty. If he is guilty of a breach of duty, we cannot controvert the propositions which necessarily follow from the admission that but for such omission, or if he had taken advantage of the last clear opportunity to perform a duty imposed by law, the train would have been stopped and a life saved. It cannot be denied that in a number of the states which have adopted the doctrine of Davies v. Mann, it has also been held that both man and beast were trespassers when they went upon a railway track, and, except at public crossings or in towns, it was not the duty of the engineer to exercise care in looking to his front with a view to the protection of either. Where the law does not impose the duty of watchfulness, it follows that the failure to watch is not an omission of duty intervening between the negligence of the plaintiff in exposing himself and the accident, unless he be actually seen in time to avert it. The negligence of the corporation grows out of omission of a legal duty, and there can be no omission where there is no duty prescribed. But, when this court declared it the duty of an engineer to exercise reasonable care in looking out for animals on the track, it became equally a duty as to all those classes of persons who, if actually seen by him, would be entitled to demand that he use all the means at his command to avert injury to them. Where the rule prevails that no liability attaches for a failure of the engineer to keep a lookout except in towns and at crossings, the same test is applied by the courts. So soon as the duty arises, the failure to perform it, if intervening after the negligence of a person in exposing himself to peril, is held to be the last clear opportunity to discharge it, and therefore the proximate cause of the injury, if it could have been averted by the use of the means at his command after the law required him to have seen it. As we hold that the duty on the part of the engineer of watchfulness to protect life is an ever present one, attending him everywhere, and extending to the people in the remote country as well as in the towns, it necessarily follows that the opportunities that grow out of duty performed are coextensive with the duty prescribed, and may arise wherever it exists.

We are of opinion that when, by the exercise of ordinary care, an engineer can see that a human being is lying apparently helpless, from any cause, on the track in front of his engine, in time to stop the train by the use of the appliances at his command, and without peril to the safety of persons on the train, the company is liable for any injury resulting from his failure to perform his duty. If it is the settled law of North Carolina (as we have shown) that it is the duty of an engineer on a moving train to maintain a reasonably vigilant outlook along the track in his front, then the failure to do so is an omission of a legal duty. If, by the performance of that duty, an accident might have been averted, notwithstanding the previous negligence of another, then, under the doctrine of Davies v. Mann and Gunter v. Wicker, the breach of duty was the proximate cause of any injury growing out of such accident; and, where it is a proximate cause, the company is liable to respond in damages. Having adopted the principle that one whose duty it is to see does see, we must follow it to its logical results. The court committed no error of which the defendant could justly complain in stating the general rule which we have been discussing.

Considered in connection with other portions of the charge, the statement of the distances, as proved by defendant's witnesses, was but a fair submission of the view argued by defendant's counsel, and affords no ground for exception. Under the general principle laid down in Emery v. Raleigh & G. R. Co., 102 N. C. 236, and the numerous cases which have followed it, it was within the sound discretion of the court to frame the issues, and the defendant must show that the exercise of that discretion operated to his injury, if he would assign it as error. But in Scott v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 96 N. C. 428, and Denmark v. Atlantic & N. C. R. Co., 107 N. C. 185, and other cases, it has been declared that the judge was clothed with discretion to submit one, two, or three issues, where the controversy hinges upon a controverted allegation of negligence, as he might think best, provided he should give appropriate instructions. Where the first issue (here the second) raises not only the question whether the defendant was negligent, but also whether it was the proximate cause, the judge is at liberty to tell the jury if they should find that the defendant was negligent, and its negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, it was immaterial to determine whether or not the plaintiff had been previously negligent.

The question propounded to the witness Wilson was intended to elicit an opinion, which it was the province of the court to decide that he had not qualified himself to give. State v. Hinson, 103 N. C. 874.

The court below was requested, however, in substance, to instruct the jury that the measure of damage for the loss of a human life was the present value of the net income which would be ascertained by deducting the cost of living and expenditures from the gross income, and that the jury could not allow more than the present value of accumulations arising from such net income, based upon the expectancy of life. The court, in lieu of the instruction asked, told the jury that the measure of damage was the reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit from the continued life of the deceased to those who would have been dependent on him had he continued to live out his natural life; that the expectation of one-seventeen years old would be forty-four and two-tenths years, and the damage would be the net moneyed value of intestate's life to those dependent upon him had he continued to live out his appointed time. Though the court stated the abstract proposition, as we find it formulated in the books, in the first clause of that portion of the charge relating to damages, we think that the substitution of the subsequent portion of it for the more specific instruction to which the defendant was entitled, and for which he asked, was erroneous. The instruction given, viewed without reference to the prayer of the defendant, was objectionable, in that it left the question of the date which should be the basis of the final calculation, to say the least, uncertain, if his language was not susceptible of the construction that the net income would be estimated as of the period when those dependent on him would have realized the benefits of his labor had he not come to an untimely end.

We are of opinion, therefore, that, following as a precedent Tillett v. Lynchburg & D. R. Co., 115 N. C. 662, a new trial should be granted for the error complained of, only as to the issue to which the erroneous instruction related. The jury found the fact upon full instruction as to the law in connection with other issues, which left the defendant no just reason to complain. But another opportunity must be given to assess the damage in the light of a more explicit statement of the law applicable. A new trial is granted, therefore, solely for the purpose of inquiring as to damages. The case will be remanded to the end that the jury may ascertain what is the present value of intestate's life.

Partial new trial.

W. H. WORTH, State Treasurer, Appl.

(.....N. C.....)

1. A committee appointed by the general assembly to make an examination and find the facts from the evidence, with authority to make the report after adjournment of the assembly, cannot draw per diem or mileage after such adjournment, unless the resolution appointing it provides therefor.
2. A resolution by the general assembly providing that a committee created thereby shall find the facts from the evidence in an examination to be made by it, set out the evidence in full, and report such facts to the general assembly "if it is possible to do so before its adjournment, and if not then said report shall be made to the supreme court," confers on such committee no power to act after adjournment of the general assembly except to make the report.
3. A state treasurer properly refuses to pay a warrant drawn on him by the auditor for an illegal claim under Code, § 8856, subsec. 2, requiring him to pay "all warrants legally drawn on him by the auditor."

(October 22, 1895.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Wake County in favor of plaintiff in a mandamus proceeding to compel defendant to pay an order for money, directed to him by the state auditor. Reversed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. A. Guthrie for appellant.

Messrs. T. R. Purnell and J. N. Holding for appellee.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is not controverted that the legislature may create a special commission, as, for instance, to examine the treasury accounts, and require that it shall consist of members to be designated from its own body, and fix its compensation. Code, §§ 8860, 8861. Such special commissioners are not disqualified to hold other offices, as members of the general assembly, for instance, being expressly excepted by art. 14, § 7, of the Constitution. Nor can it be denied that the legislature has power to authorize a committee of their body to sit during vacation, and fix its compensation. The question before us does not turn upon the power of the legislature, which is undeniable, but upon the construction of their action. The uniform action of Congress and the legislature, so far as our researches extend, has been to expressly authorize such committee to "sit in vacation." Inasmuch as the existence of all committees, in the absence of legislation, necessarily determines upon the adjournment of the body to which they belong, certainly there must be an explicit enactment that the sessions of the committee can be held after such adjournment, or, at least, a clear, unmistakable implication to that effect from the words used in the act or resolution creating the committee. We do not find such to be the case here. The resolution (Laws 1895, p. 502) simply provides that the committee "shall find the facts from the evidence, and report said facts, and also set out the evidence in full in said report, and make their report to the general assembly if it is possible to do so before its adjournment." So far there is nothing to distinguish this committee from any other, or to prolong its existence beyond the adjournment of the body to which it belonged. Then follow the only words which can be construed to give such power: "And, if not, then said report shall be made to the supreme court." This confers no power on the committee to do any act after the general assembly should adjourn, except to make their report if it should not be ready. There is no explicit provision or clear implication that the committee should take any other action. Had the legislature so desired, it would, according to precedent, have provided that the committee could sit in vacation, as they plainly provided that they could report in vacation, if necessary, which necessarily seemed to be considered doubtful. When a committee is empowered to sit in vacation, the resolution must provide the compensation, and for the expenses of the same; otherwise, there is no authority of law for their payment. Certainly, the members cannot draw per diem as members of the legislature; for, by the Constitution (art. 2, § 28), the per diem is allowed only during the session of the general assembly, and is limited to sixty days, which the members of this committee had already drawn, as well as their mileage allowed them in such capacity. We must look to the resolution itself for any authority for payment of either compensation or expenses. That provides only for "the necessary expenses of the said committee while actually engaged in said investigation." Since, as stated above, the meaning of the resolution was that the investigation should be made during the session, merely leaving the report to be filed (if it should be necessary) after adjournment, the necessary expenses would seem to be those of making the investigation; i. e. summoning and expense of witnesses, stationery, etc. But it is not required here to say what would be embraced in necessary expenses, for this warrant on its face is for "per diem and mileage." The per diem is compensation which is not provided for by the resolution, and the mileage is not necessary for members who are simply to remain over a short while to file a belated report, since they drew mileage as members to return home. Whether the reasonable board bills of the committee while detained in making up the report would not be included in "necessary expenses" is not before us, but probably that would be conceded. It was urged on one side that, this resolution being passed so short a time before adjournment, the legislature must have intended the committee to sit during vacation; and, on the other side, that, the resolution having been introduced long before,

NOTE.—The rarity of decisions upon the rights and powers of legislative committees makes the above decision somewhat noteworthy. See also the case of Purnell v. Worth, post, 262.

its passage at this late hour indicated an intention that the committee should get rid of the matter by simply reporting that it could not investigate for lack of time. There is nothing in the resolution to show how long or how short the investigation would be. We are authorized to make no surmises. The legislature had power to authorize the committee to sit in vacation and to allow compensation to the members of it. They chose not to do so. They only authorized such continuance for the purpose of filing the report and necessary expenses. The failure to authorize per diem or some compensation is additional evidence that the committee was expected to finish its labors (except, possibly, as to filing the report) while the assembly were still in session.

It was strenuously, and it would seem seriously, argued before us that, the auditor having given his warrant, the treasurer had no choice but to pay it. The auditor gives no bond, and if the treasurer must pay any and every warrant that is presented to him, the state treasury is at the mercy of the judgment of that officer, who might mistake or misconceive (as in this instance) the meaning of an act. The laws of this state do not bear that construction. The auditor examines the items and amounts, and passes upon them, and can require the claimant to be sworn and examined as to the correctness of the account. Code, § 3850, subsec. 17. If he finds the amount correct, and, further, that payment is provided for by law (Id. § 3850, subsec. 9), he is required to draw his warrant on the treasurer for payment thereof, but he is also required to put in the face of each warrant drawn by him the act authorizing such payment. This is to give notice to the treasurer that he may act understandingly, for he is not required to pay any and every warrant which the auditor may sign, but only "to pay all warrants legally drawn on the treasurer by the auditor." Id. § 3856, subsec. 8. Should the treasurer have reasonable doubts, he should consult the attorney general, or, if he think proper, refuse payment, as in this case, and let the matter be determined by the courts. Our government is one of checks and balances. It is not intended that payments out of the public funds should be made on the judgment of the public treasurer alone or the auditor alone. The auditor examines as to the amounts and the performance of the work. It would seem that as to the facts his finding is conclusive (Id. § 3850, subsec. 5); certainly it is sufficient protection, in the absence of any collusion or notice of fraud, to the treasurer. But the auditor goes further. He examines as to whether the payment of the claim is authorized or provided for by law. If he so finds, his conclusion as to the law is not binding on, nor is it a protection to, the treasurer. The auditor is required to set out the act providing for payment in the face of the warrant (Id. § 3850, subsec. 9); and, on the application of such statute, the treasurer must also pass before payment; and he has authority to take the opinion of the attorney general (Id. § 3863, subsec. 4), or he can act without it at his own risk, either in paying or refusing payment of a warrant which, in his judgment, is not authorized by any statute. It is thus that the lawmaking power hedges about the safekeeping of the public funds. The treasurer's bond (Id. § 3857) is a safeguard, not only against his misuse or misappropriation of the funds committed to him, but against his payment of illegal claims; for the bond provides for the "faithful execution of the duties of his office," and one of those duties is to pay out no money except on warrant drawn by the auditor, and to pay all legal warrants drawn by him. Illegal warrants, not authorized by law, the treasurer pays at his peril. The duty of the special commissioners appointed under section 3861 of the Code is not limited merely to examining whether all warrants are signed by the auditor,—a very simple matter,—but they are required by that section to examine also to see whether such payments were authorized by law as well as by the auditor. In directing the mandamus to issue, there was error.

A committee appointed by the legislature to make an examination, and find the facts from the evidence, and report the facts and the evidence in full, is not entitled to an attorney as a necessary expense.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The other points arising in this case are disposed of in Commercial & F. Bank v. Worth (N. C.) 23 S. E. Rep. 160. The sole point remaining to be decided in this case is whether an attorney is a "necessary expense" for a committee, for we put out of view for this purpose the admitted fact that these services were rendered after the adjournment of the legislature, and we have held that the committee were authorized to sit after that time only for the purpose of making their report. The legislature have unquestionably authority, should they deem it necessary, to authorize a committee to employ counsel. But they did not do so. There is no implication even that this committee should employ counsel. On the contrary, the committee were not authorized to pass upon any legal question or make any judicial determination. Their duties were those of a jury, to "find the facts from the evidence, and report said facts, and also set out the evidence in full in said report." There is certainly no indication here of a necessity for the assistance of counsel "learned in the law." It is witnesses "learned in the facts" only who are needed. But we would not be understood as holding that, if the committee had been called on by the terms of the resolution to pass on legal questions, in such case counsel would have been a necessary expense. Non constat but the committee might be composed of lawyers, or the assembly might be willing to trust the committee's legal judgment in the first instance, since the reports of committees are subject to the action of the house appointing them. The plaintiff's remedy, if any, to procure compensation for his legal services, is by application to the next general assembly. His honor rightly held that the employment of counsel was not provided for by the resolution.

No error.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. D. Huffmaster and Shields & Mountcastle for appellant.

Messrs. James G. Rose and W. S. Dickson for appellee Murphy.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The very interesting question is presented in this case as to the effect of certain proceedings had in the circuit court of Hamblen county to have Charles J. Portrum adopted and legitimated as the child of John Portrum; the query being whether the property of said Charles J., upon his death without issue, brothers, or sisters, went to his mother, Catherine Noe, or to the brothers and sisters of John Portrum, the adopting parent. Complainants are purchasers from Catherine Noe, the mother of the said Charles J., and the defendants are the brothers and sisters of John Portrum, the adopting father. The bill was demurred to, and demurrer overruled; the chancellor being of opinion that the mother inherited the property from her son, and had good title to it. Defendants refusing to answer or make further defense, final decree was entered fixing the rights of the parties, and defendants appealed and assigned errors. The cause has been heard by the court of chancery appeals, and that court has affirmed the chancellor's decree, and defendants have appealed to this court.

The facts are that John Portrum died intestate and unmarried, leaving brothers and sisters and other collateral kin, and also

Charles J. Portrum, reputed to be his son, and so recognized and acknowledged by him; the mother being Catherine Noe, an unmarried woman. John Portrum, at the December term, 1877, of the circuit court of Hamblen county, instituted proceedings in that court to have said Charles J. legitimated and adopted as his lawful heir. Petition was filed, summons issued and was served on the mother and child, guardian ad litem was appointed, and the cause was heard. The decree sets out the petition in full, the substance being that petitioner was desirous of adopting and legitimating said Charles J., so as to create the relation of parent and child between him and petitioner; the child being then about four years old, and living with its father, and the mother being in poor circumstances, and having relinquished her claims to the custody of the child. The prayer was for a proper judgment of legitimation and adoption, fully legitimating the child, and making it the child of petitioner, by the name of Charles John Portrum, giving to the child all the rights and privileges of a legitimate child, with capacity to inherit and succeed to the real and personal estate of petitioner, as his heir and next of kin, and for general relief. The decree recites that the court was fully satisfied with the reasons assigned in the petition for the adoption of the child as prayed for in the petition by the name of Charles John Portrum, and adjudges and decrees that his adoption as prayed for be sanctioned by the court, and proceeds to vest the child with all the rights and privileges of a child of said John Portrum, with capacity to inherit and succeed to the real and personal estate of said John Portrum, as his heir and next of kin, in case of his intestacy, and changing his name to Charles John Portrum, etc. Upon the death of John Portrum his adopted son, Charles, took possession of his estate, and subsequently died, unmarried and intestate, and without issue; and his mother, the said Catherine Noe, claims the property, against the brothers and sisters of the adopting father, and has sold two pieces of the real estate to complainants Murphy & Rippetoe.

The first error assigned is that the judgment of legitimation or adoption was invalid; and, second, that if valid the mother could not inherit from the child property derived from the adopting parent, but the property would go to the next of kin of the father, John Portrum. There can be no question but that under Mill. & V. Code, §§ 4881, 4885-4891, the circuit court of Hamblen county had jurisdiction of proceedings to legitimate and adopt children, in proper cases; that the parties were properly before the court by subpoena; and that the decree and record are sufficiently formal to comply with the statutes. But the insistence is that the proceeding in this case was one for legitimation, and not one for adoption, while the decree was for adoption alone. It will be noted from recitals heretofore made that the petition and prayer was for both legitimation and adoption, and this was proper in the case of a natural born child. But the decree did not go to the extent of legitimating, but only adopting; and we are constrained to hold that this was the extent of the relief granted, and the child was adopted, and not legitimated, by the terms of the decree. This was, we think, altogether proper, under the petition, which asked for both legitimation and adoption; the court reciting that it was satisfied with the reasons assigned for the desire to adopt, but making no utterance as to the matter of legitimation. The differences between adoption and legitimation are marked, and in some contingencies far-reaching. By legitimation the child acquires such a legal status as will enable it to inherit from its father, and through him from the father's next of kin, direct and collateral. Mill. & V. Code, § 4887; McKamsie v. Baskerville, 86 Tenn. 459. Whereas by adoption he only acquires such legal status as enables him to succeed to the real and personal estate of the adopting parent, and beyond this gives him no inheritable right. He cannot inherit from the father's next of kin, nor can the father or his next of kin inherit from such child. Helms v. Elliott, 89 Tenn. 446, 10 L. R. A. 535; McKamsie v. Baskerville, supra. We think that the fact that the petitioner prayed for more extended relief than the court saw proper to grant will not render void the decree granting relief prayed for, and proper under the facts, even though not as full and complete as desired. The decree, as rendered, gives the child, by its terms, the capacity to succeed to and inherit the real and personal estate of the adopting father, and this would have been the effect of the decree of adoption under Mill. & V. Code, § 4890, without such recitals. And by the same section it is provided that the adoption shall give to the person seeking it no right of inheritance or succession, nor any interest whatever in the estate of the person adopted.

The child being adopted, and the father dying, the property descended to and vested in the child, and it necessarily follows that in no event could the next of kin of the father inherit from the adopted child, as it had no inheritable blood as to them, and they none as to the adopted child. To whom, then, does the property go upon the death of the adopted child? We answer that under section 3273, Mill. & V. Code, it must go to the mother. That section is as follows: "When an illegitimate child dies intestate without child or children, husband or wife, his real and personal estate shall go to his mother if living, then equally to his brothers and sisters by his mother, or descendants of such brothers and sisters." See also Webb v. Webb, 8 Head, 69; Woodward v. Duncan, 1 Coldw. 568; Scroggins v. Barnes, 1 Leg. Rep. 58. A very learned and elaborate argument is made upon the theory that the child could not inherit the property derived from the father in such cases, but only such as was acquired by the illegitimate child by his own labor, or in some way other than inheritance, else the effect will be to divert the property from the inheritable blood of the father to the illegitimate blood of the mother.

This is a matter which if true addresses itself to the lawmaking power, and not to the courts. Much argument is also made upon what the effect would be if the decree had been for legitimation instead of adoption, but this we need not consider under this record, as the child was adopted, but was not legitimated.

There is no error in the decrees of the chancellor or Court of Chancery Appeals, and they are affirmed, with costs.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, NINTH CIRCUIT.

Isaac L. HEWITT, Appt.,

v.

Warren STORY et al.

(64 Fed. Rep. 510.)

1. Mere declarations of parties who have acquired rights to the use of water in an irrigating ditch are insufficient to preserve those rights without any act or deed in vindication or maintenance of them, when for a period prescribed by the statute of limitations they take no water from the ditch except what is distributed to them as shareholders in an older ditch owned by an unincorporated association which has assumed entire control and use of the later ditch as a part of the older system.

2. The rights of the locators of a ditch for irrigation to the use of waste water after supplying prior appropriators are lost by permitting the exclusive possession, management, and beneficial use of the waste-water ditch to be enjoyed during the season of irrigation for more than the statutory period of limitation as part of an older system, without any use of water therefrom by such locators except what is distributed to them by virtue of their ownership of shares in the older ditch.

3. Rights in a ditch location lost by nonuser cannot be reasserted so as to acquire any right therein, except by continued and adverse use for the statutory period of prescription or by a new and valid appropriation.

(Knowles, District Judge, dissents.)

NOTE.—Abandonment or loss of rights of prior appropriators of water.

An abandonment of the rights of one who has appropriated water upon the public domain will not be decreed for trivial matters.

So long as he in good faith intends to retain his claim, and manifests that intention by use of the water or preparations to use it, his right will remain intact. But he will not be permitted to retain a claim which he neither uses nor intends to use, merely for the purpose of preventing others from using it.

The law will not presume an abandonment of property in a dam and ditch for mining purposes from the lapse of time. Partridge v. McKinney, 10 Cal. 151.

Rights thus acquired may be abandoned or lost by the same means as a right of the same character issuing out of lands to which a private title exists. The rights of the first appropriator may be lost by the adverse possession of another. Yankee Jim's Union Water Co. v. Crary, 25 Cal. 504, 85 Am. Dec. 145 (1894).

To abandon a water right acquired by the use of water by appropriation there must be a concurrence of the act of leaving it so that it can be appropriated by the next comer and the intention not to repossess it. The mere intention to abandon it, not coupled with a giving up of possession and cessation of user, is not sufficient, nor will nonuser alone without intention to abandon be held to amount to abandonment. Utt v. Frey, 108 Cal. 303.

Relinquishment of possession by an appropriator subjects the water to reappropriation. Smith v. Green (Cal.) 41 Pac. Rep. 1022.

Thus, after the water has been allowed to return into a natural channel the appropriator cannot claim it as against a subsequent appropriator. Eddy v. Simpson, 3 Cal. 249, 68 Am. Dec. 408.

If water is turned into a stream without the intention of recapturing it, it is publici juris and belongs to the one having the prior right of appropriation to it. Davis v. Gale, 88 Cal. 23, 91 Am. Dec. 554.

Water which has been appropriated for a mill, 80 L. R. A.

and after use is allowed to flow down in its accustomed channel, is abandoned so as to be subject to appropriation by others. Ortman v. Dixon, 18 Cal. 83.

But turning artificial water into a natural water-course for the purpose of conducting it to the place of use is not an abandonment of it, but it may be taken out of the stream at that point if the quantity of natural water of the stream is not thereby diminished to the injury of prior appropriators of it. Butte Canal & D. Co. v. Vaughn, 11 Cal. 143, 70 Am. Dec. 789.

So, one who puts water into a stream may take it out again if he can do so without injury to a prior appropriator. Burnett v. Whitesides, 15 Cal. 85.

And merely using the bed of a dry gulch as part of the system of ditches to conduct the water to the place where it is to be used does not constitute an abandonment of it. Hoffman v. Stone, 7 Cal. 44.

So, the right of an appropriator to take out of the stream the amount of water originally appropriated by him cannot be defeated by his letting a portion of it go back into the stream after use, which is appropriated by a subsequent locator, although the latter may not be able to get at all times the full amount which he obtained at the time of his first appropriation. Brown v. Mullin, 65 Cal. 89.

Abandonment is a matter of intention, and there is no such thing as abandonment to a particular person or for a consideration. A conveyance, by an instrument in writing sufficient for that purpose, of the usufruct of the water for a valuable consideration, is clearly not an abandonment. Middle Creek Ditch Co. v. Henry, 15 Mont. 558.

The mere fact that several persons joined in a ditch have not accurately defined their rights therein or in the water flowing in it, and have selected a person to distribute the water among them, does not operate as a dedication of the ditch to the public. Cate v. Sanford, 54 Cal. 24.

(November 1, 1894.)

A PPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of California in favor of defendants in an action brought to establish the rights of complainant to a portion of the water flowing in an irrigation ditch. Affirmed.

Before McKenna, Circuit Judge, and Knowles and Hawley, District Judges.

Statement by Hawley, District Judge:

This is a suit in equity. The bill of complaint alleges the wrongful and unlawful diversion of certain waters by the appellees, sixty-seven in number, including certain corporations, companies, associations, and individuals, using and claiming water by appropriation from the Santa Ana river, in San Bernardino county, Cal. It prays for a decree entitling appellant to a specific quantity of water, and for an injunction, etc. The bill was filed in January, 1887. Appellant claims to be the owner in possession, and entitled to the possession and use, of 883½ inches, under a 4-inch pressure, of the waters of the Santa Ana river, which he alleges were appropriated by his predecessors in interest through and by means of a certain ditch known as the "Berry Roberts Waste-Water Ditch." The Santa Ana river is an unnavigable stream of running water, flowing through sundry wild cañons and ravines in the San Bernardino mountains, and emerging therefrom into the San Bernardino valley through the mouth of a steep ravine near the eastern boundary of the valley; and the waters thereof have been and are held and owned, for many miles above and below the entrance to the Berry Roberts ditch, exclusively by right of appropriation, and used generally for the purpose of irrigation. Long prior to the location of the Berry Roberts ditch, two appropriations had been made of the waters of the Santa Ana river,—one by means of the North Fork ditch, owned by the North Fork Water Company, a corporation, which taps the river near the point where it debouches from the mountains into the valley; the other by means of the South Fork ditch, owned by an association of individuals designated in the bill of complaint as the South Fork & Sunnyside Division of the Santa Ana river, which takes water from the river some distance lower down. The owners of these ditches have, at all times since acquiring their water rights, kept these ditches in repair. Prior to 1860 there were but few people using the water from the ditches, but, before the Berry Roberts ditch longing to real estate and are not lost by mere non-user short of the necessary time to acquire rights by adverse possession, but the right may be lost by an act showing an intention to surrender and forsake the right. Dodge v. Marden, 7 Or. 456.

But it has been held that a failure to use water is evidence of an intention to abandon; and if continued for an unreasonable period it creates a presumption of an intention to abandon; but this presumption is not conclusive but may be overcome by other sufficient proof. Sieber v. Frink, 7 Colo. 148.

So, after a ditch by which water was diverted for mining purposes has fallen into disuse and has been abandoned, the water right is destroyed, and after it has remained in this condition for many years no person claiming under the original appropriators can divert the water through it beyond the water shed of the creek to the injury of a riparian owner. Kirman v. Hunnewell, 98 Cal. 519.

That after the purposes for which the water is appropriated has been accomplished and the appropriators have dispersed and the water has been allowed to go to waste for a long time, after which it is sold for a nominal price, may be received as evidence of abandonment. Davis v. Gale, 32 Cal. 26, 91 Am. Dec. 554.

In Hewitt v. Story, 51 Fed. Rep. 101, the court says that the mere assertion of title to water embraced by an appropriation is not sufficient to prevent an abandonment if it is unaccompanied by acts in vindication and maintenance of it.

A ditch constructed by running a furrow and cleaning it out with a shovel will be abandoned if it is not used for many years and becomes so obliterated as not to be perceptible by persons driving over or plowing the land across which it was run, while the owners permit another person to construct a ditch and take water from the stream without notifying him of the prior appropriation. Dorr v. Hammond, 7 Colo. 79.

That the rights of an appropriator have been settled by a judicial decree will not entitle him to use the whole of the water as against subsequent appropriators when for more than eighteen years after his original appropriation, and for more than nine years after the decree, he used only part of the water allotted to him, and the subsequent appropriators made use of the excess. Mew Mercer Ditch Co. v. Armstrong (Colo.) 40 Pac. Rep. 308.

The mere fact that miners abandoned the water and tailings from their flumes for a particular length of time, on the faith of which other persons constructed flumes to utilize the water and tailings, does not render it obligatory upon them to continue to do so, but they may decide to sell them to a third person and divert them in another direction so that the persons who have been accustomed to use them will be deprived of them. Dougherty v. Creary, 30 Cal. 280, 99 Am. Dec. 116.

The owner of a mining claim whose flume discharges the refuse water into a ravine on his land may extend his flume so as to prevent the appropriation of the water by a third person who has attempted to construct a ditch over his land to the mouth of the flume to take the abandoned water. Correa v. Frietas, 42 Cal. 390. This is put on the ground that the owner of a claim has a right to every part of it, and may prevent others from coming onto it.

Attempt to change use.

The question of the right to change the place and manner of use is treated in a note to McGuire v. Brown (Cal.) post, —.

But so far as such attempted change has been held to be or not to be an abandonment, the cases are inserted here.

Surveying a line for a new ditch will not constitute an abandonment of a right to appropriate at a point where the water is actually taken out and applied to purposes of irrigation. Cole v. Logan, 24 Or. 304.

Where an appropriation of water rights has been properly made, the change of the head of the ditch to a point higher up on the stream, or the building of a new ditch to carry the water, will not work a forfeiture of the right. Greer v. Heiser, 18 Colo. 303.

Appropriation under the California statute will was located, the number had been largely increased. The ditches have since been enlarged, and many thousands of dollars have been expended thereon. The actual extent of the appropriation by the North Fork and South Fork ditches, prior to the location of the Berry Roberts ditch, is not clearly defined, and, under the views hereinafter expressed, the precise amount of water which each ditch is entitled to need not be determined. Subsequent to the location of the Berry Roberts ditch, two appropriations of water from the Santa Ana river nearer its head have been made: One, the Brown and Judson ditch, owned by the Redlands Water Company, a corporation, which was located in the spring of 1881, and conveys water to the town of Redlands for irrigation and domestic purposes. Every year since its construction, extensions and improvements, involving large expenditures of money, have been made. The other, the Bear Valley dam and reservoir, owned by the Bear Valley Land & Water Company, a corporation, was located in June, 1883. This corporation, in the spring of 1883, bought 3,000 or 4,000 acres of land situated in the lower portion of Bear valley, and constructed a dam at the point where the lower edge of the valley adjoins the head of Bear cañon, for the purpose of obtaining, above that dam, the water that would otherwise have run to waste in the winter and spring months. This dam is of granite masonry, 20 feet thick at its base, about 60 feet high, and 800 feet long, forming a lake about 5 miles long and over $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile wide, of an average depth of about 18 feet. Bear creek is fed by small tributaries which come into it, at different points, all of the way from where it leaves Bear valley down to its junction with the Santa Ana river. The construction of the dam does not appear to have affected the flow of water down Bear creek during the irrigating season. The Berry Roberts ditch was located in 1869, by Berry Roberts, Henry Suverkrup, and George A. Crow, as a waste-water ditch appropriating "the waste water of the Santa Ana river" remaining therein after the North Fork and South Fork ditches should be fully supplied. The locators of the Berry Roberts ditch, at the time of its location, occupied, possessed, and claimed separate and distinct portions of land situated in section 16, township 1 S., range 3 W. of the San Bernardino meridian. Roberts claimed 160 acres, and Suverkrup not defeat or extinguish any prior right. Alta Land & W. Co. v. Hancock, 55 Cal. 212.

The posting of a second notice of appropriation while diligently prosecuting work to complete the appropriation under the first notice does not abandon the first claim. Osgood v. El Dorado Water & D. G. Min. Co., 56 Cal. 371.

If the appropriation is for mining purposes generally, to be used at various points, an abandonment cannot be claimed when the mine to which it is first applied is exhausted. Lowden v. Frey, 67 Cal. 474.

If the appropriator constantly uses the water which he has appropriated for irrigation purposes, the mere fact that from time to time he changes the ditches from which it is taken will not constitute an abandonment of his right. Kleinschmidt v. Greiner, 14 Mont. 484.

The sale by a mill owner to the owner of a ditch higher up on the stream does not abandon his right as against an appropriator below his mill, but if the upper ditch owner permits the water to flow down past the mill, the mill owner is entitled to use it. McDonald v. Askew, 29 Cal. 200.

The attempt to convey a water right by an imperfect deed operates as an abandonment of the title obtained by appropriation thereof. Barkley v. Teleka, 2 Mont. 59.

Abandonment prevented by use.

The facts that but little water was used from a ditch, and that the ditch became so obstructed that but little water would flow in it, do not establish an abandonment where it appears that the ditch was used continuously to convey water for domestic purposes and to some extent for irrigation, and that the intention of the owner to retain a right was made manifest to the one claiming the abandonment. Utt v. Frey, 160 Cal. 392.

Where a person gains a right in one appropriation of water for irrigation purposes as a tenant in common, and then proceeds with reasonable diligence to get his land under cultivation, the mere fact that for the land tilled he utilizes water from another stream which is more convenient and continues to do so for seven years until all the land near the other stream is under cultivation, when he immediately proceeds to utilize the water of the first appropriation for the remainder of the land, will not constitute abandonment of the rights to that water. Moss v. Rose (Or.) 41 Pac. Rep. 666.

A person may abandon an irrigating ditch without abandoning his water rights. Such rights may be abandoned by nonuser, but so long as the appropriator continues to use such rights without any unreasonable voluntary cessation, an abandonment will not be presumed against him. Nichols v. McIntosh, 19 Colo. 23.

Abandonment will not be shown by the fact that a ditch was permitted to be filled up under the agreement that the one filling it should clean it out which he was never compelled to do, nor from the fact that the portion of the ditch beyond the fill was allowed to remain unused, if the water was put to a beneficial use elsewhere. Wimer v. Simmons (Or.) 39 Pac. Rep. 6.

Failure for thirteen years to enlarge the acreage first put under cultivation will work an abandonment of the water appropriated for the portion of the land which has not been reduced to cultivation. Low v. Rizer, 25 Or. 551 (1894).

But failure to use the water for the purpose for which it was appropriated will not constitute an abandonment if during the years in which it was not used there was not a sufficient quantity to supply the requisite amount for that purpose. McCauley v. McKelg, 3 Mont. 389.

Decisions under statutes.

Under the California statutes mere nonuser of the appropriator's right for a period of five years will constitute a forfeiture of it as against persons who have acquired the government title since the appropriation. Smith v. Hawkins (Cal.) 43 Pac. Rep. 463.

If the end of a ditch is filled up by a landslide and not opened or used again for nine or ten years there will be an abandonment of the right under the Oregon statute, providing that if a ditch is abandoned and thereafter for one year the claimant shall cease to exercise acts of ownership over the same he shall be deemed to have lost all claim thereto. Ison v. Nelson Min. Co. 47 Fed. Rep. 199.

and Craw, in the aggregate, 240 acres. The ditch constructed by them, and through which they appropriated the waste water, tapped the river on the south side between the head of the North Fork and the South Fork ditches. At the time the Berry Roberts ditch was located, and for many years thereafter, there existed in San Bernardino county a board of water commissioners, created by an act of the legislature of the state of California, whose duties were to regulate the distribution of water in accordance with the rights of the parties in interest, and they were invested with authority to appoint water overseers, etc. In the records kept by this board appears the following entry:

"By request of Henry Suverkrup, Berry Roberts, and G. A. Craw, W. T. Morris and E. Kerfoot, water commissioners for San Bernardino county, California, located a water ditch to be known as the 'Berry Roberts Ditch.' The water claimed by the aforesaid parties for this ditch is the waste water of the Santa Ana river, taken out in the southeast bank of said river about 4 miles northeast from section 16, township No. 1 south, range No. 8 west, San Bernardino meridian, running thence nearly a southwest direction to the said 16th section, and to be used for irrigating, and to be equally apportioned among said parties on the land of the said 16th section owned by said parties; and also Berry Roberts was appointed overseer for the aforesaid ditch for the present year.

"Done on the 19th day of February, A. D. 1870.

"W. T. Morris.

"E. Kerfoot."

Roberts thereupon took charge of the Berry Roberts ditch, and with Suverkrup and Craw conducted the waste water running therein to their respective lands, in section 16, for irrigation and domestic purposes. The lands which they then had under cultivation amounted, in the aggregate, to not exceeding over 100 acres, about 50 acres thereof being in grain, and the balance in fruit trees and vegetables. They permitted one or more of their neighbors to participate in the use of the water on condition that they should contribute to the necessary repairs of the ditch. In 1870, Roberts conveyed his interest in the 160 acres of land claimed by him, together with his interest in the Berry Roberts ditch and the waste water, to one Ball, who thereupon succeeded Roberts as water overseer. In 1872, Craw conveyed his interest in 160 acres of land claimed by him to Suverkrup, and also his interest in the Berry Roberts ditch and in the waste water. During the years 1870, 1871, and 1872, the then owners of the Berry Roberts ditch used the waste water running therein, at all times when they could get any water, for the irrigation of the lands which they then had under cultivation; but the waste water running in said ditch was wholly insufficient to supply their needs.

There is more or less confusion in the testimony as to the name of the South Fork ditch. It is sometimes called "South Fork," sometimes "Sunnyside Division of South Fork," but more frequently, in relation to its connection with the Berry Roberts ditch, it is designated as the "Timber Ditch," by which name it will hereafter be called. Upon ascertaining the fact that no reliance could be placed in the supply of waste water from the Berry Roberts ditch during the irrigating season, Ball purchased 40 shares in the Timber ditch and in the water appropriated therein, and Suverkrup purchased 80 shares in the Timber ditch and in the water flowing therein. The quantity of water thus acquired by them was diverted through the Berry Roberts ditch to their respective tracts of land in section 16. Subsequently, by the consent of Ball and Suverkrup, various other owners of shares in the Timber ditch appropriation diverted and conducted the quantity of water to which they were respectively entitled, by virtue of their interests in the Timber ditch, through and by means of the Berry Roberts ditch. The Berry Roberts ditch continued in charge of the water overseers appointed by the board of water commissioners. In June, 1874, Suverkrup conveyed his interest in the 240 acres of land then claimed and possessed by him, together with his interest in the Berry Roberts ditch and in the waste water, and also the 80 shares in the Timber ditch, to one Borron, the immediate predecessor of appellant. During the year 1874, while Ball and Borron were diverting and using the water belonging to them as share owners in the Timber ditch through the Berry Roberts ditch, some of the other owners of shares in the Timber ditch applied to them for permission to divert and conduct the water belonging to their shares in the Timber ditch through the Berry Roberts ditch. Permission was given upon the condition that the parties should contribute and aid in enlarging and repairing the Berry Roberts ditch, which condition they complied with. After the year 1874, no water was taken from the river through the Timber ditch; but all of the water theretofore diverted through and by means of the Timber ditch was thereafter diverted through and by means of the Berry Roberts ditch, and the owners of shares in the Timber ditch appropriation (with but few, if any, exceptions) continued to use the water, to which they were entitled by virtue of that appropriation, through the Berry Roberts ditch. It is not shown that permission to make this change was granted to any considerable number of the shareholders in the Timber ditch appropriation; but it does affirmatively appear that the shareholders in the Timber ditch took actual possession and control of the Berry Roberts ditch, and through it diverted and conducted the water that had theretofore been diverted and conducted by means of the Timber ditch. As early as 1877, if not before, all of the water diverted through the Berry Roberts ditch was distributed by the water overseer in charge, and was used by the respective claimants of it, including Ball and Borron, in proportion to the number of shares held by them in the Timber ditch appropriation. The Berry Roberts ditch was enlarged and kept in repair by the parties so using it, and during the year 1877, upon application to the board of water commissioners, a change was made in its route, and in the place of its diversion of the water from the river, in order to avoid a sand wash which caused a loss of water. The board of water commissioners then directed that the ditch should thereafter be known as the "South Fork of Santa Ana." In 1878 another change was made, by the construction of what is designated by some of the witnesses as the "Stone Ditch," and referred to by others as the "South Fork Sunnyside Division Ditch." After this change was made, the water running in the Santa Ana river during the irrigating season was all absorbed and taken in nearly equal quantities by the North Fork and South Fork ditches. The Sunnyside Division of the South Fork ran into the old Berry Roberts waste-water ditch about one mile from where the water was taken out of the river. The water diverted and conveyed by means of the South Fork or Timber ditch, with its divisions and systems of conducting the water, continued to be allotted to the respective claimants therein in the proportion of the number of shares held by them. It was so allotted, diverted, and used for more than five years during Borron's ownership, and during all that time Borron in person, or by his authorized agent, Col. Tolles, acquiesced in and accepted such allotment of the waters flowing in the ditch. In October, 1881, Borron contracted to sell his land and water rights to appellant, and the sale was perfected, and the deed therefor was executed and delivered in the spring of 1882; and the water was continuously thereafter allotted, diverted, and used the same as before the sale. It appears from the testimony that an inch of water is sufficient to irrigate from 5 to 6 acres of land, and is considered to be of the value of $1,000 for the purposes of irrigation.

The circuit court, upon a review of the facts, found, as a conclusion of law, "that there was an abandonment by the immediate grantor of the complainant, as well as by the complainant himself, of the water embraced by the appropriation upon which the suit is based," and upon this ground, without any consideration of the other points involved in the case, dismissed the bill of complaint, and rendered judgment in favor of appellees for their costs. Hewitt v. Story, 51 Fed. Rep. 101.

Messrs. W. F. Herrin and H. L. Gear for appellant.

Mr. R. E. Houghton for appellees.

Hawley, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The argument of this case extended over a very wide range, embodying within its scope nearly every principle that has ever been enunciated by the courts, touching in any manner upon the question of the rights of appropriation of water from the public streams or upon private lands,—the incipieny of such rights, the manner of their acquisition, how they may be kept up and maintained, and in what manner and under what circumstances such rights may be lost. We consider the law to be well settled that the right to water flowing in the public streams may be acquired by an actual appropriation of the water for a beneficial use; that, if it is used for irrigation, the appropriator is only entitled to the amount of water that is necessary to irrigate his land by making a reasonable use of the water; that the object had in view at the time of the appropriation and diversion of the water is to be considered in connection with the extent and right of appropriation; that if the capacity of the flume, ditch, canal, or other aqueduct, by means of which the water is conducted, is of greater capacity than is necessary to irrigate the lands of the appropriator, he will be restricted to the quantity of water needed for the purposes of irrigation, for watering his stock, and for domestic use; that the same rule applies to an appropriation made for any other use or purpose; that no person can, by virtue of his appropriation, acquire a right to any more water than is necessary for the purpose of his appropriation; that, if the water is used for the purpose of irrigating lands owned by the appropriator, the right is not confined to the amount of water used at the time the appropriation is made. He would be entitled, not only to his needs and necessities at that time, but to such other and further amount of water, within the capacity of his ditch, as would be required for the future improvement and extended cultivation of his lands, if the right is otherwise kept up; that the intention of the appropriator, his object and purpose in making the appropriation, his acts and conduct in regard thereto, the quantity and character of land owned by him, his necessities, ability, and surroundings, must be considered by the courts, in connection with the extent of his actual appropriation and use, in determining and defining his rights; that the mere act of commencing the construction of a ditch with the avowed intention of appropriating a given quantity of water from a stream gives no right to the water unless this purpose and intention are carried out by the reasonable, diligent, and effectual prosecution of the work to the final completion of the ditch, and diversion of the water to some beneficial use; that the rights acquired by the appropriator must be exercised with reference to the general condition of the country and the necessities of the community, and measured in its extent by the actual needs of the particular purpose for which the appropriation is made, and not for the purpose of obtaining a monopoly of the water, so as to prevent its use for a beneficial purpose by other persons; that the diversion of the water ripens into a valid appropriation only where it is utilized by the appropriator for a beneficial use; that the surplus or waste water of a stream may be appropriated, subject to the rights of prior appropriators, and such an appropriator is entitled to use all such waters; that, in controversies between prior and subsequent appropriators of water, the question generally is whether the use and enjoyment of the water for the purposes to which the water is applied by the prior appropriator have been in any manner impaired by the acts of the subsequent appropriator. These general principles are of universal application throughout the states and territories of the Pacific coast. They have, in one form or another, been declared, upheld, and maintained by the courts by a uniform current of decisions in California ever since the decision in Eddy v. Simpson, 8 Cal. 249, 58 Am. Dec. 408. We cite a few of the many cases upon this subject: Kelly v. Natoma Water Co. 6 Cal. 106; Kimball v. Gearhart, 12 Cal. 28; Ortman v. Dixon, 18 Cal. 84; Weaver v. Bureka Lake Co. 15 Cal. 274; McKinney v. Smith, 21 Cal. 874; Hill v. Smith, 27 Cal. 476; Nevada Water Co. v. Powell, 84 Cal. 109, 91 Am. Dec. 685; Nevada County & S. Canal Co. v. Kidd, 87 Cal. 283; Mitchell v. Amador Canal & Min. Co. 75 Cal. 482; Perego v. McKisick, 79 Cal. 572; Cal. Civ. Code, §§ 1410 et seq. The same rules prevail in Nevada: Loddell v. Simpson, 2 Nev. 274, 90 Am. Dec. 587; Ophir Silver Min. Co. v. Carpenter, 4 Nev. 594, 97 Am. Dec. 550; Proctor v. Jennings, 6 Nev. 88, 8 Am. Rep. 240; Barnes v. Sabron, 10 Nev. 218; Simpson v. Williams, 18 Nev. 432. In Colorado: Wheeler v. Northern Colorado Irrigation Co. 10 Colo. 588; Platte Water Co. v. Northern Colorado Irrigation Co. 12 Colo. 525; Combs v. Agricultural Ditch Co. 17 Colo. 146; Fort Morgan Land & C. Co. v. South Platte Ditch Co. 18 Colo. 1. In Idaho: Conant v. Jones (Idaho) 82 Pac. Rep. 250. See also Atchison v. Peterson, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 507, 22 L. ed. 414; Basey v. Gallagher, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 670, 22 L. ed. 452; Broder v. Natoma Water & Min. Co. 101 U. S. 276, 25 L. ed. 791; Gould, Waters, §§ 228 et seq.; Kinne, Irrigation, §§ 160 et seq. In the light of these principles and authorities, it is evident that neither appellant nor his predecessors in interest ever acquired any right by appropriation to the extent of water now claimed by him.

But the contention of appellees is that appellant is not entitled to any amount whatever, under or by virtue of any appropriation that was made of the waste water flowing in the Berry Roberts ditch upon which this suit was brought; that such rights as were ever acquired by such appropriation were either abandoned or lost by nonuser, by the statute of limitations, which is specially pleaded, and by the prescriptive rights acquired by a portion of the appellees, and that appellant is estopped, by the line of conduct and action of himself and his predecessor in interest from asserting any right or claim to such waters for the purpose of irrigating his lands. Grouping these questions together for the brevity of discussion, it may be said that, if any of them are well founded in fact, the judgment of the circuit court in dismissing the bill should be sustained. The legal principles in regard thereto are well settled. The general principles pertaining to an abandonment of water rights, which are applicable to this case, are clearly summed up in Black's Pom. Water Rights, § 96, where it is stated that the previous sections "recognize the fact that there may be an abandonment of the exclusive right to divert and use water acquired by or resulting from a prior appropriation; that such an abandonment may be made either after the prior appropriation has become perfect and complete, and the right under it vested, or while it is yet imperfect and incomplete, and the right under it remains inchoate; and, finally, that an abandonment may be express and immediate, by the intentional act of the appropriator, or may be implied from his neglect, failure to use due diligence in the construction of his works, nonuser of them after completion, and the like. The general doctrine concerning the effect of such an abandonment, at whatever time or in whatever manner made, is well settled. The prior appropriator thereby loses all of his exclusive rights to take or use the water which he had acquired, or might have acquired, by his appropriation; and he cannot, after an abandonment, reassert his original right to the same, or the same amount of water, as against a second or other subsequent claimant who has taken proper steps to effect an appropriation thereof."

In Yankee Jim's Union Water Co. v. Orary, 25 Cal. 509, 85 Am. Dec. 145, the court said: "The right of the first appropriator may be lost in whole or in some limited portions, by the adverse possession of another. And when such person has had the continued, uninterrupted, and adverse enjoyment of the watercourse, or of some certain portion of it, during the period limited by the statute of limitations for entry upon lands, the law will presume a grant of the right so held and enjoyed by him."

In Davis v. Gale, 32 Cal. 84, 91 Am. Dec. 554, the court said: "A party acquires a right to a given quantity of water by appropriation and use, and he loses that right by nonuse or abandonment. Appropriation, use, and nonuse are the tests of his right."

In Smith v. Logan, 18 Nev. 154, the court said: "The findings show that from the year 1861 until 1867, inclusive, Logan irrigated from 10 to 85 acres of land. During the years 1868, 1869, and 1870 he made no use of the waters, and in 1871 and 1872 he irrigated but 5 acres. During these five years plaintiff and his predecessors in interest used the waters of the creek under their appropriations adversely to Logan. They therefore acquired the right to so much of the waters appropriated by Logan as he failed to use during the period limited by the statute of limitations."

Section 1007 of the Civil Code of California provides that "occupancy for the period prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure is sufficient to bar an action for the recovery of the property, confers a title thereto, denominated a title by prescription, which is sufficient against all."

Section 1411, under the title of "Water Rights," declares that "the appropriation must be for some useful or beneficial purpose, and when the appropriator and his successor in interest cease to use it for such a purpose, the right ceases."

The acts and conduct of appellant and of his predecessors in interest, relative to the use of the Berry Roberts ditch by the owners of the South Fork Company as part of their system for conveying the water which belonged to the South Fork ditch by right of prior appropriation, are inconsistent with the claim made in the bill of complaint. In order to avoid the force and effect of this evidence, appellant contends that the original right of appropriation, as acquired by the locators of the Berry Roberts ditch, has been preserved and maintained by the assertions of Borron and appellant at various times during their respective ownership of the land, and during the time they were exclusively using the 30 inches of water from the South Fork or Timber ditch, "that they were entitled to the water embraced by the waste-water appropriation." Such declarations by word of mouth, unaccompanied by any act or deed in vindication and maintenance of them within the period prescribed by the statute of limitations, are wholly insufficient to keep alive the rights they had previously acquired by the appropriation and use of the waste water in the Berry Roberts ditch for the purpose of irrigation during the irrigating season. In Cox v. Clough, 70 Cal. 347, the court said: "If the defendants used and held the water adversely for five years next before suit was brought, the mere disputing their right to such possession by the plaintiffs would not prevent the bar of the statute. . . . The seventh finding might be literally true,—that is, defendants and their grantors might have 'claimed the right to the exclusive use of all the waters,'—and yet they may never have been for a moment in possession of any such waters."

No heed was ever given—no attention ever paid—to the asserted claim of ownership made by Borron or appellant. The asserted claim was never recognized or in any manner respected by any of the appellees, nor by any of the parties using the Berry Roberts ditch for the purpose of conveying the water of the South Fork ditch therein. The contention of appellant that the use of the Berry Roberts ditch was consented to by appellant and his grantor, and only amounted to a temporary license, which was revocable at their will and pleasure, is not sustained by the facts. The suit is without merit, and devoid of any equity whatever. Appellant's rights to water for the purpose of irrigation have not been impaired. Whatever rights he or his grantor ever had to the waste water during the irrigating season have been lost by their conduct and by their nonuse of the water, and appellant is not in a position to complain of the use of the waters of the Santa Ana river by other parties.

To recapitulate: The locators of the Berry Roberts ditch claimed the waste water of the river to irrigate their lands situate in section 18. After a few years they discovered that such waters were wholly insufficient for such purpose, that said ditch and the water rights acquired by its construction could not be relied upon to furnish water during the dry or irrigating season; that, to quote the language of one of the witnesses, the water was so scarce that the land was liable to "dry up and blow away." The locators then, for the purpose of obtaining the necessary quantity of water to irrigate their lands which were fit for cultivation, procured, by agreement and purchase, certain interests in the waters flowing in the South Fork or Timber ditch, which, with the North Fork ditch, had a prior right to the waters of the Santa Ana river, as against the Berry Roberts ditch. After acquiring the waters of this ditch, they and their grantees stopped using any of the water they had formerly appropriated. They succeeded in making an agreement with some other owners of the South Fork to convey the waters from said ditch over into the channel of the Berry Roberts ditch, and prior to 1877 all the owners consented to this change of the waters, and united in its use. The owners of the South Fork ditch took absolute, complete, and exclusive possession, use, and control of the Berry Roberts waste-water ditch,—whether rightfully or wrongfully, by consent or otherwise, need not be here determined. They appointed overseers, or "water masters," as they are sometimes called, who issued time cards to the shareholders, and upon such cards allotted and distributed to the owners in the South Fork or Timber ditch all of the water which was taken and conveyed through the Berry Roberts waste-water ditch, to the entire exclusion of any and all other waters and water rights. After a few years' use of the water in this way, it was discovered, that a great saving of water could be made by changing the course of the ditch, and taking the water out at a point further up the river, so as to avoid sandy places in the river bed. This change did not give the full relief anticipated, and another change was made. From the year 1874 up to the time of the commencement of this suit, in 1887, all of the water used upon the 240 acres of land now owned by appellant, for the purpose of irrigating the same, was water represented by the 30 shares in the Timber ditch owned by appellant and his predecessors in interest, and this amount of water is sufficient to irrigate said lands. The diversion and use of this water in the way and manner stated were with the knowledge, consent, and acquiescence of Borron, the immediate predecessor of appellant, and were claimed by the other owners of the South Fork ditch to be adverse to any right or claim under the original location and appropriation of the waste water in the Berry Roberts ditch. The testimony shows that the use of the waste water in the Berry Roberts ditch was abandoned, in so far as it had, prior to 1878, been used as a source of water supply during the irrigating season; that in 1874 the Berry Roberts ditch was taken possession of and used by the South Fork Ditch Company; that ever since that time the South Fork Company has had the sole and exclusive possession, use, management, and control of it; that all the water which has run through it has been the water actually appropriated by the South Fork Company; that during the full time of Borron's occupancy of the land, from June, 1874, to the fall of 1881, he never questioned the right of the South Fork Company to the waters flowing in the Berry Roberts ditch, or to any part or portion thereof; that during all this time he only received water to irrigate his land through the Berry Roberts ditch on his 30 shares from the South Fork Ditch Company. Substantially the same state of facts continued to exist after appellant purchased the land, in 1883. One witness, the son of appellant, testified that he protested, on behalf of appellant, against the use of the Berry Roberts waste-water ditch being taken by the South Fork Company, and that appellant occasionally used such water for irrigating his lands; but this use of the waters, it is admitted, was confined to the nonirrigating season in the early spring or late fall of the year. Col. Tolles testified that the expense of constructing what was called the "South Fork" of the Santa Ana ditch in 1877 was laid upon the basis of the shares in the waters of the South Fork ditch; that the original Berry Roberts ditch was thereafter used to convey the waters of the claimants in the South Fork of the Santa Ana continuously, so far as he knew, until the injunction which was issued in this proceeding; that the South Fork or Timber ditch water filled the Berry Roberts ditch to its full capacity; that repairs were subsequently made upon the Berry Roberts or South Fork ditch pro rata, according to the ownership of the respective parties; that Mr. Borron and appellant paid their proportionate share; that the water was apportioned pro rata on the basis of ownership of the South Fork shares; that there was no distribution of waste water, to his knowledge, to either Borron or Ball, other than during the rainy season, at which time it was not the custom to confine distribution to the water tickets, but each party was then allowed to continuously use the water; that during the irrigating season no waste water was used or distributed in the Berry Roberts ditch. All the testimony of the several water overseers or water masters and time-keepers and others was substantially to the same effect. The waste-water rights of the Berry Roberts ditch location, having been lost by nonuser upon the part of Borron prior to the time when appellant acquired the land, could not be reasserted so as to acquire thereafter any right therein, except by the continued and adverse use of such rights for the period of five years, or by a new and valid appropriation of the water. In Cannon v. Stockmon, 36 Cal. 540, 95 Am. Dec. 205, the court, in relation to this subject, said: "A party who has been in the continued, exclusive, adverse possession for five years is entitled to the benefit of the statute of limitations, although the five years are not next preceding the commencement of the action."

As against the appellees who have acquired rights to the waters of Bear creek and the Santa Ana river subsequent to the location of the Berry Roberts ditch, the question here is, as stated in Hill v. Smith, 27 Cal. 476: "Have the plaintiff's use and enjoyment of the water for the purpose for which he claims its use been impaired by the acts of defendant?"

This suit, it must continuously be borne in mind, is exclusively founded upon the alleged rights of appellant for water for irrigating purposes during the irrigating season, and not for any deprivation of water during the rainy season, or the waste waters then flowing in the Santa Ana river, or through any of the many ditches or canals that have been mentioned. It is therefore necessary for appellant, in order to sustain this action as against the subsequent appropriators, to affirmatively show that his right to the waste waters of the Berry Roberts ditch for use during the irrigating season has been impaired by the wrongful and unlawful acts of the appellees to his injury. This he has not done. No injury has been shown. The absorption of the right to flow water into the Berry Roberts ditch by the South Fork Company, and the use of said ditch for the conveyance of the water were really beneficial, instead of detrimental, to appellant. Instead of the uncertain and insufficient quantity of water which then flowed in the Berry Roberts ditch, he has, under the agreements and changes in the condition, as before stated, obtained a valuable right amply sufficient to supply his wants, and to enable him to cultivate, irrigate, and improve his land. It cannot, in the light of all the facts and circumstances set forth in the voluminous record on file herein, be consistently claimed that his rights have in any manner been injured or impaired by the acts of appellees. In Sharp v. Hoffman, 79 Cal. 406, the court said: "The gravamen of plaintiff's action being the deprivation of water for irrigation during the irrigation seasons in the years 1883, 1884, and 1885, whereby he suffered loss, it is incumbent upon him to show by satisfactory evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 1835) a right to use of the waters of the creek during each of such seasons, an interference with such right, and a consequent injury."

The same general principles are announced by the Supreme Court in Atchison v. Peterson, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 514, 23 L. ed. 416. Mr. Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the court, after citing and reviewing certain cases in the courts of California and Nevada, said: "What diminution of quantity, or deterioration in quality, will constitute an invasion of the rights of the first appropriator, will depend upon the special circumstances of each case considered with reference to the uses to which the water is applied. . . . In all controversies, therefore, between him and parties subsequently claiming the water, the question for determination is necessarily whether his use and enjoyment of the water to the extent of his original appropriation have been impaired by the acts of the defendant."

Upon a review of the evidence, and of the principles of law applicable thereto, we are of opinion that the conclusion reached by the circuit court is correct.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed, with costs.

Knowles, District Judge, dissenting:

The first question presented for consideration is as to the jurisdiction of the court in which the suit was instituted. The suit was commenced in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of California. The first bill was filed on January 10, 1887. To this bill, answers were filed, and issue joined. Subsequently, considerable evidence was taken in the case. On the 5th day of November, 1888, complainant came into court, and asked to be allowed to withdraw his original bill of complaint, and to file an amended bill, which request was granted. On March 7, 1889, it was stipulated that the respondents in the suit might amend their answers to the amended bill of complaint on or before the 18th of that month. Other matters were also provided for in said stipulation. On the said 18th day of March, one of the respondents, named Brown, filed, instead of an amended answer, a plea in abatement to the jurisdiction of the court. The matters alleged were, (1) that the complainant was a citizen of the state of California, and not of New York, as alleged in the bill, and that respondents were all citizens of the first-named state; (2) that other persons claiming, under the same title with complainant, interest in the property which is the subject of this suit, are citizens of the state of California, but are not made parties complainant or defendant to said bill, and it is not in said bill made to appear that such other persons, or any of them, were requested to and refused to join with said complainant in bringing his said bill of complaint; (3) that such suit or bill does not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of said honorable court, in this, that parties have been improperly or collusively made and joined as defendants for the purpose of creating a case cognizable by said court. Complainant moved to strike out this plea as improperly filed, subsequent to the filing of an answer by said Brown to the merits in the cause, and as a pleading not authorized by the stipulation in the case. The court sustained this motion, and the plea was stricken out. The cause was tried, and judgment entered for respondents. Complainant alone has appealed the cause to this court. This ruling of the court is not assigned as error; there was no hearing as to the facts presented in this plea. Had the motion to strike out been overruled, complainant would have had the right to have joined issue upon the facts set forth in the same. This court cannot consider any alleged error in this ruling of the court in striking out said plea. It is now urged that this court must consider the allegations set forth in said plea on account of the provisions of the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. at L. 472); that by virtue of that act, the practice as to pleas in abatement involving jurisdiction have been changed. The practice which has heretofore prevailed in the Federal courts is that any plea in abatement should be filed and heard before any answer is made to the merits of the bill. It seems to be urged that this plea can be made at any time during the progress of the suit. The provisions of said act which it is urged have this effect are as follows: "That if in any suit commenced in a circuit court or removed from a state court to a circuit court of the United States it shall appear to the satisfaction of said circuit court, at any time after such suit has been brought or removed thereto, that such suit does not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of said circuit court, or that the parties to said suit have been improperly or collusively made or joined either as plaintiffs or defendants for the purpose of creating a case cognizable or removable under this act, the said circuit court shall proceed no farther therein, but shall dismiss the suit, or remand it to the court from which it was removed, as justice may require."

There is nothing in this statute which would show that there was any intention of changing the order in which a defendant or respondent may make his pleadings. It does seem, however, that this statute has changed the mode in which the objection to the jurisdiction of the court may be made. Formerly the practice was to make it by plea; now it may be made in different ways. In the case of Morris v. Gilmer, 129 U. S. 815, 33 L. ed. 690, the Supreme Court says: "The statute does not prescribe any particular mode in which such fact may be brought to the attention of the court. It may be done by affidavit, or the depositions taken in the cause may be used for that purpose. However done, it should be upon due notice to the parties to be affected by the dismissal."

In the case of Nashua & L. R. Corp. v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 136 U. S. 356, 34 L. ed. 863, it was held that the rule requiring the question of jurisdiction to be raised by demurrer or plea had been changed by said act of March 3, 1875. In the case of Anderson v. Watt, 138 U. S. 701, 34 L. ed. 1080, the Supreme Court again considered this point, and said: "Under the act of March 3, 1875, determining the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States (18 Stat. at L. 470, 472) the objection to the jurisdiction upon a denial of the averment of citizenship is not confined to a plea in abatement or a demurrer, but may be taken in the answer; and the time at which it may be raised is not restricted."

I think, upon a review of these decisions, it will be seen that the mode in which the objection to the jurisdiction may be made is changed by the statute, but not the order in which a plea in abatement to the jurisdiction may be filed. Except so far as the matters were presented in the discussion of this plea in abatement, the jurisdiction of the circuit court was not raised. There cannot be much doubt as to the ruling of that court as the case was presented. There does not seem to be any doubt but that the very questions sought to be presented by the said plea in abatement may be raised in this court without such plea. In the case of Morris v. Gilmer, supra, the Supreme Court said: "At the present term it was held that whether the circuit court has or has not jurisdiction is a question which this court must examine and determine, even if the parties forbear to make it or consent that the case be considered upon its merits." Metcalf v. Watertown, 128 U. S. 586, 33 L. ed. 543.

About the same questions as were presented in the plea in abatement were presented in the answers of respondents. It is proper that they should be considered. It is urged that the evidence shows that complainant was not a citizen of New York, but of the state of California, when suit was commenced. This is the evidence adduced to establish this fact: Harvy Hewitt, son of complainant, said, in giving in his evidence: "Q. Where has your father resided since he returned to the state? A. A greater portion of the time he has resided on the ranch in section 16. Q. Is he a married man? A. My father? Q. Yes, sir. A. Yes, sir. Q. Has he had a family with him? A. Why, I should say he had."

There is some other evidence bearing upon this point. In speaking of a deed desired to be introduced in evidence, the complainant, in giving in his evidence, said: "Q. Mr. Hewitt, since the taking of the testimony last fall, have you made any search for that deed? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where did you make that search for that deed? A. I have made it during—I made it among my home papers at New York."

The evidence shows that the complainant had been engaged in the mercantile business in Cleveland, Ohio, for twenty-five years, and that for the eighteen years previous to his coming to California he had been in business in New York city. In speaking about his taxes he said he paid taxes on a house and lot in New York and on a house and lot in Cleveland. He made a contract to purchase the ranch, irrigated, from time to time, by the water in dispute, in 1881. At that time complainant was in California for a short time, from two weeks to a month. In the spring of 1882 he was again in California for a time. In the fall of 1881 he placed a son, Harvy Hewitt, upon the said ranch, and entered into a partnership agreement with him for the cultivation of the same, and for a sale of one half thereof. This was to continue for five years. In October, 1885, he came to California, and seems to have remained there most of the time until the bringing of this suit. At times, it would appear from the evidence, before and after the bringing of the suit, he went to New York for some purpose. The partnership agreement with his son was terminated in the month of July, 1886. On the 10th day of January, 1887, this suit was commenced. It should be observed that there was no evidence introduced which seems to have been intended for this issue of citizenship. The evidence came out casually when examining the witnesses upon other points. The evidence bears only upon the point of residence, and not upon that of citizenship. "Residence" and "citizenship" are not synonymous terms. Robertson v. Cease, 97 U. S. 646, 24 L. ed. 1057. In the case of Grace v. American O. Ins. Co. 109 U. S. 278, 27 L. ed. 982, the Supreme Court said of the plaintiffs: "They may be doing a business in and have a residence in New York without necessarily being citizens of that state." There are numerous cases which show that a man may reside with a family in a place, and not be a citizen of the place. Citizenship rests very much in intention coupled with acts. There is perhaps a serious question arising in considering this point, owing to the fact that citizenship in

New York is alleged in the bill and denied in the answer, and an allegation that complainant "was and is a citizen of the state of California." Upon whom does this cast the burden of proof as to citizenship,—the complainant or respondents? Before the act of March 3, 1875, above referred to, the rule in the Federal courts was well established, that, whenever the jurisdictional facts were averred in the bill or declaration, it should be taken as prima facie true upon this point, and the objection thereto should be taken by plea in abatement, and the burden of proof was upon the party making the plea. Sheppard v. Graves, 55 U. S. 14 How. 505, 512, 14 L. ed. 518, 521; De Sobry v. Nicholson, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 420, 18 L. ed. 263. I see no objection to continue this rule. As the matter now stands I apprehend it would not be sufficient to simply deny that complainant was a citizen of New York. That would not show a want of jurisdiction. Complainant might be a resident of some other state, where none of the respondents reside. The allegation that he was a citizen of California at the date of the suit is an affirmative allegation, and material. If the denial of the averment in the bill of citizenship casts the burden of proof on complainant, then all the former rules upon this point have been reversed, and it cannot be told whether or not a court has any jurisdiction of a cause until that question is established. Really, in an action at law, the question would be left to a jury. It could not be considered that a court had, prima facie, any jurisdiction to make any order in a case until this question of jurisdiction was settled. Holding, as I do, that the burden of proof is cast upon the respondents to establish, under the circumstances, want of jurisdiction in the circuit court, it must be held that they have failed upon this issue.

It is urged that the bill should be dismissed for the further reason that one Story, who, it appears, owns one third of the Berry Roberts ditch, and the waste-water right used through the same, should have been made a party complainant in the suit. If he was a necessary party complainant in the bill, then this point may be well taken. It appears that Story was a citizen of the state of California, and was not only interested in the Berry Roberts ditch, but claimed some interest in the South Fork ditch of the Santa Ana river, Sunnyside Division. In the bill it is charged that the parties owning in this ditch had diverted, with others, water to which complainant was entitled. If the respondent Story was associated with the owners in that South Fork ditch, and had co-operated with them and others in diverting the water to which complainant was entitled, he was a proper party respondent. It seems to be urged, however, that, because Story was a one-third owner in the Berry Roberts ditch, complainant could not proceed without making him a party complainant, or showing some reason for not doing so. This presents the question, Could the rights of Hewitt be determined, as far as the Berry Roberts ditch is concerned, without making Story a party, so that his rights would also be determined therein? This point was presented in the Mining Debris Case, 8 Sawy. 628, 638, 16 Fed. Rep. 25. In rendering a decision upon demurrer to the bill in that case, Judge Sawyer said: "I am satisfied, also, that the complainant is entitled to maintain the suit without joining his cotenant, or making him a defendant. His interest—his estate—is several. There is but a unity of possession. His interest, or estate, is capable of being injured, and he is entitled to have it protected from irreparable injury, whatever course his cotenant may see fit to pursue. He claims nothing against his cotenant. The cotenant is not an indispensable party to a determination of his rights. In this state, both before the Code, under the common-law rules, and after the adoption of the Code, by express provision carrying the former rule into it, it was settled that tenants in common could sue alone."

When a tenant in common is given the privilege, by a state statute, to sue alone to protect his rights, I do not see but this comes within the rule recognized by the Federal courts,—that, where a right is given by a state statute, a Federal court may be called upon to enforce it. The following cases maintain that one tenant in common can sue for an injury to his estate or interest: Good-enough v. Warren, 5 Sawy. 494, Fed. Cas. No. 5,534; Himes v. Johnson, 61 Cal. 259; Little Creek Water Co. v. Perdue, 65 Cal. 447. The diversion of water from one entitled thereto is in the nature of a private nuisance. Parke v. Kilham, 8 Cal. 79, 68 Am. Dec. 310; Tuolumne Water Co. v. Chapman, 8 Cal. 392. All the rights of Hewitt in the Berry Roberts ditch can be adjudicated without joining with him his cotenant Story. It does not seem to me necessary that he should have been made a party complainant.

But it is also urged that certain parties who were owners in the South Fork and Sunnyside Division ditch, and whose names were suggested by the answers of respondents, were not made parties respondent; that these parties were necessary parties, and therefore the bill should be dismissed. The claim is that the cause cannot proceed to judgment without these parties. This action is one in the nature of a suit to abate a nuisance. The nuisance is one that has existed, and is threatened to be continued. It is for the diversion of water from complainant's ditch and land, to which he is entitled, and the threatened continuation of this diversion. Complainant asks for an injunction to restrain and prevent this diversion. This being the nature of the suit, then the rule is that only those persons can be made parties respondent against whom an action at law can be maintained for damages for creating such a nuisance. Wood, Nuisances, § 795. If we turn to the law, we find that, in an action for damages for the creation and maintenance of a nuisance, the persons who create and maintain the same are jointly and severally liable, and an action can be maintained against one or any number of the offending parties. Pom. Rem. & Rem. Rights, § 261. The creating of a nuisance is in the nature of a tort. It is difficult to see upon what ground an injunction could be asked against any one who it did not appear was engaged in the diversion of the water, although he might be an owner in the ditch into which the water was diverted. In the Mining Debris Case, supra, Judge Sawyer said: "I can perceive no sound reason, in the established principles of equity jurisprudence and practice, why two or more of the parties injured by the common nuisance should not be permitted to unite, and two or more of those co-operating to commit it should not be joined in one suit, to redress the injury, and enjoin a continuance or increase of the nuisance thus in common inflicted."

The respondents, in their several answers to the bill, made certain denials of having diverted the waters of the Santa Ana river so as to prevent any of them from flowing down to the Berry Roberts ditch and to complainant's land; but these denials involve what is termed a "negative pregnant," and, as a fact, they admit such diversion. They are to the effect that they have not diverted, appropriated, or used any quantities of the water of the Santa Ana river in excess of the quantities lawfully belonging to any prior or subsequent appropriators, or any other waters than such as said respondents are entitled to as appropriators. They deny that they threaten to divert, appropriate, or use any waters of said Santa Ana river, except such as they are legally entitled to divert. They deny that the said respondents prevent any water flowing to the complainant's land to which he is legally entitled, or in any manner entitled. Now, as to all these parties, there can be no doubt they were made respondents properly, as they admit, as I have said, the diversion complained of. Whether in doing so they have interfered with any of the rights of complainant is the matter to be determined in this action. I do not see how any statement in the answers as to the other parties shows that they are necessary parties in this action, but that without them the case cannot proceed to judgment. Considering all these matters, I do not think the respondents have shown any lack of jurisdiction in the circuit court or in this court.

We come now to the merits of the case. It appears that the first appropriators of any of the waters of the Santa Ana river constructed a ditch commencing at a point about 8 miles below the ditch of complainant. This ditch was called the "Timber Ditch," and was divided into two forks,—one called the "North Fork," and the other the "South Fork." The persons taking out water in what was known as the "North Fork" changed their point of appropriation to a point near the mouth of the cañon at which the Santa Ana river comes into the San Bernardino valley. They enlarged a ditch, which had the name of the "Cram and Van Leuven Ditch," or the "Van Leuven Ditch." This was done some years before the Berry Roberts ditch, in which complainant claims a two-thirds interest, was dug. In about 1869, Berry Roberts, George A. Crow, and Henry Suverkrup constructed the Berry Roberts ditch. In 1870 they had a record made by what are termed "water commissioners" of their location of a water right. This record shows that the appropriation was of the waste waters of the Santa Ana river. The evidence tends to prove the same fact,—that it was the waters that were not then appropriated by those who had constructed the Timber ditch, and the North Fork ditch that were thereby secured. These parties used these waste waters through this ditch for some time. Their grantees used them at times, certainly up to 1874. Prior to 1874, parties who owned in the South Fork of the Timber ditch began to sell out their interest in the waters appropriated thereby. The sale was of so many shares in the waters of the South Fork of that ditch. A Mr. Borron, who had become the owner of some 240 acres of the land for the irrigation of which this Berry Roberts ditch was constructed, with one Ball, who also owned an interest in this ditch, and some land irrigated therewith, obtained some of the shares of this Timber ditch water, and began to divert in the dry season, in the summer, their share of the Timber ditch water through this ditch. In 1874 certain other parties, owners in the Timber ditch water, desiring to do the same thing, but not owners in the Berry Roberts ditch, made an agreement with the Berry Roberts ditch that upon certain conditions, to be hereafter stated, they were to be allowed to run their shares of water in the Timber ditch through this Berry Roberts ditch. In 1877 or 1878 the owners of the Timber ditch constructed a new ditch, commencing about 8 miles above the Berry Roberts ditch on the said Santa Ana river, called the "South Fork Ditch." Most of those who owned Timber ditch water, and who had been using the same through the Berry Roberts ditch, had their water interests turned into this new ditch. Since that time other ditches have been dug, which take out more or less of the waters of the said river.

It is, I think, well established that up to 1874, when the owners of the Timber ditch water began to divert their water through the Berry Roberts ditch, there was a waste-water right used through that ditch; that is the water left in the stream after the South Fork and the North Fork or Van Leuven ditches were filled. Unless abandoned, two thirds of that right has been vested in complainant through proper conveyances. The right of complainant in this waste water and the Berry Roberts ditch is now denied, and the use thereof prevented, by some of the respondents at least. It is contended that this right was lost by abandonment. The decision and judgment in the circuit court were based upon this finding. Abandonment takes place of a water right when one having the right to use the same, and who is the owner thereof, gives the same up without any intention of using the same or exercising any ownership over or concerning it. St. John v. Kidd, 26 Cal. 264; Bell v. Red Rock Tunnel & Min. Co. 86 Cal. 214; Judson v. Malloy, 40 Cal. 299. The law does not presume abandonment; it must be established by the party alleging it. There has not been shown in evidence a declaration on the part of any owner in the Berry Roberts ditch showing an intention of abandoning the same. While it was held by Justice Field, in the case of Keane v. Cannovan, 21 Cal. 291, 303, 83 Am. Dec. 738, that an abandonment might be inferred from lapse of time, and the delay of the first occupant in asserting his claim to the possession against parties subsequently entering upon the premises, he qualified this rule by the following: "But in such cases the leaving of the premises must have been voluntary, and without any express intention of resuming the possession."

In that case the claimant of the premises left an agent in charge; and in regard to the effect of this he said: "This circumstance is of itself sufficient to rebut the presumption of abandonment arising from the fact that he ceased to occupy them."

In this case, Borron, the grantor of claimant, left Col. Tolles as his agent in charge of his property, including his water rights. The facts of the owners of Timber creek water getting into possession of the Berry Roberts ditch appear to be about these: According to the evidence of Col. Tolles, a respondent in this case, an agreement was made between the parties, which he says was as follows: "The agreement, in substance, was that, if (they having first forbid our use of water in that ditch by putting in a dam to shut it off from our use) we would contribute to the enlargement and the repair of the ditch, we could then divert our interest, and receive our water pro rata from the Timber ditch."

He stated also that it was in contemplation, at the time this agreement was made, that a new ditch should be constructed to convey the water of the South Fork or Timber ditch to the different owners. Witness Glover, called as a witness for complainant, said of this agreement: "Mr. Ball was acting as water master, and he asked a question,—the parties were all together,—if this was a permanent thing. The answer given was that, as soon as the new ditch was built, they would have no more use for this Berry Roberts ditch. Well, under that understanding, the water went in, and no objection was made."

The evidence shows that the ditch was enlarged to double its former capacity, and the Timber ditch water owned by certain parties put into it. For the first year there seems to have been no regular apportionment of the water to different claimants. The next year (1875) there was, and the water tickets took notice of this waste-water right. Mr. Borron was there that year, and looked after the matter, it is presumed, himself. In 1877 or 1878 the new ditch was built, called the "South Fork Ditch," and most of those who had owned water in the Timber ditch took their water out of the Berry Roberts ditch, and into this new ditch. Borron left his place, in 1875, in the hands of his agent, Tolles, one of the respondents. Borron writes to him to look after his waste-water right. In 1880, or before that time, there is a talk, it would appear from letters in evidence in the case, of bringing a suit to determine his rights in regard to this waste water. Tolles, his agent, and one of the respondents, writes him his waste-water right is in about the same condition as when he left. We find from the evidence of Glover that after the new ditch was built, in 1878, and the Timber ditch water turned into the same, there arose some dispute about this waste-water right, and that it was then used on the Hewitt place. The evidence is that at all times Borron was a great stickler for his waste-water right. Col. Tolles, a witness for respondents, said: "He was particular to advise me to maintain intact all his water rights and interests, referring also to his claim in the waste-water right."

Again, Col. Tolles, in regard to certain language in a letter he wrote to Borron in 1880, said, when a witness: "Q. In your letter to Borron, dated November 22, 1880, which you have identified as being your handwriting, you speak of the waste-water right of Borron being retained the same as when he was there? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, what right did that have reference to, and right in what ditch? A. Well, the right was one which he always maintained after his purchase of the Suverkrup property, and the use of it through the Berry Roberts ditch."

On redirect examination he again testified: "Q. You have just stated, in answer to the gentleman, that the waste-water right referred to there was one that had been maintained, as I understood you, by Mr. Borron. Maintained in what way, do you mean? What do you mean by the word 'maintained'? A. I meant to convey the idea that he had claimed such a right and interest, not strictly as maintaining it by its use, but by setting up that claim."

Again, Col. Tolles, upon cross-examination, after having testified that Borron had employed him as his agent, said, in response to the following questions: "Q. You accepted that employment, and he left you as his agent in charge of the property, did he not? A. Yes, sir. Q. To protect his rights? A. Yes, sir. Q. In this matter that you are testifying to, as the privilege of putting in the water which you claim from the Timber ditch, Mr. Borron didn't propose to release you any rights which he may have had, did he? He did not intend to give you any of his rights, did he, as you understood it? I mean to water. A. Not to water. Q. He did not intend to create in you any ownership of water, did he? A. No, sir. Q. It was simply as to whatever water you might have the right to bring from Timber ditch? A. Yes, sir. Q. So that substantially it was this: Whatever water you have a right to of the Timber ditch water you may put into our canal or our ditch? A. Yes, sir. Q. That, and nothing more, was it? A. That was all. Q. Provided you keep up the repairs as stated? A. Yes, sir. Q. That was the substance of it? A. Yes, sir."

This sort of questions and answers might be referred to for some time.

When Borron conveyed his property to Hewitt, he conveyed this waste-water right. The agreement for a conveyance was made in 1881, but the deed does not appear to have been signed until 1882. In 1881, Hewitt went into the possession of the property. The evidence of Harvy Hewitt is that he used this waste-water right on claimant's place in 1881, 1882, 1883, and 1884. Valdez, a witness for respondent, states that, in 1884 and 1885, Hewitt used the waste water in the Berry Roberts ditch whenever he wished to, and it was not used on time tickets. Water in South Fork ditch was generally used on time tickets. The witness said that Harvy Hewitt, who was acting for his father, the complainant, always claimed that waste water, and used it whenever he wanted it. The evidence of both Borron and Hewitt is that they never at any time did anything looking to the abandonment of that water right. Tolles, as the agent of Borron, certainly had no authority to abandon that water right. I do not see how it can be maintained that either Borron or Hewitt ever intended to abandon that water right. But it is claimed that they lost it because they allowed the owners of the Timber ditch to use the Berry Roberts ditch for more than five years for running their water through the same. If I understand the claim, it is that these parties obtained the right to the Berry Roberts ditch by adverse possession. Mr. Borron, as has been stated, owned a two-thirds interest in that ditch in 1874 by purchase from one Suverkrup. Ball owned one third by purchase coming from one of the locators and constructors of the Berry Roberts ditch. They had segregated the interest they had in the Timber ditch water, and diverted it through this Berry Roberts ditch. They were the legal owners of that ditch and that water. Tolles and other parties owning other interests in the same Timber ditch water were allowed, as has been sufficiently detailed, to put their water also into that ditch. But I do not see how it can be maintained, under the evidence stated, that they acquired any interest in the Berry Roberts ditch by virtue of that agreement. That ditch was to be used until New South Fork ditch was constructed, when the use of it was to be relinquished. Certainly, under the evidence, Borron used that ditch to carry his Timber ditch water up, until 1878. It should be borne in mind that the South Fork Water Company was not a corporation, but an association. Whatever titles or rights they acquired was as individuals in their individual capacity, and not in an associated capacity. As to this Timber ditch water they were tenants in common. They acquired their rights generally by purchase, and in their several names, as appears in evidence. The respondents have been particular to prove that, whenever required, Borron paid his share of all improvements and repairs on the Berry Roberts ditch, that through Tolles he paid his pro rata share of the building and maintaining the New South Fork ditch, and keeping that in repair. Under these circumstances, no adverse possession could arise in any of the South Fork ditch claimants, for certainly, with the others, Borron must have had possession of the Berry Roberts ditch and the New South Fork ditch all the time.

Under the statute of limitations it was held by the Supreme Court, in the case of Dowell v. De la Lanza, 61 U. S. 20 How. 29, 15 L. ed. 834, that the possession "must be, in the language of the authorities, actual, continued, adverse, and exclusive for the space required by the statute." Could this possession be said to be exclusive when Borron and Ball were holding possession with the other claimants of water in the timber ditch? "To render possession adverse, so as to set the statute of limitations in motion, it must be accompanied with a claim of title, and exclusive of every other right." McCracken v. San Francisco, 16 Cal. 594, 636, 637. At what time the respondents made a claim of title to the Berry Roberts ditch, I think it will be difficult to determine, and at no time was Borron or Hewitt denied the right to use it for Timber ditch water. It is said that the water was used under the supervision of a water master. He was no more than an agent of the parties holding these water rights. His possession of these ditches was their possession, if he ever had what is called "possession" of them. He was as much an agent of Borron as of the other parties. His duties, I think, only pertained to the apportioning of water by virtue of an agreement between the parties. There were certain parties—Tolles, Bates, and Dr. Barton—who went into the possession of the Berry Roberts ditch under an agreement with the owners. Their possession was that of the owners until they commenced to hold adversely. When did they commence to hold adversely? I am unable to tell from the evidence. But under the circumstances under which they went into the possession, before they could claim to be holding adversely, they would have to give Borron some notice that they were holding adversely. It is said that this notice was given to Col. Tolles, his agent. But Col. Tolles is one of the parties claiming adversely, according to the contention of respondents. I hardly think a court ought to consider a notice to him a notice to Borron. He was a man trusted and employed, according to his own evidence, to look after and preserve Borron's property, and yet he joined in with others to take away from him, according to the claims of respondents, without compensation, a valuable property interest Borron intrusted to his keeping. He was always a prominent member of the South Fork Ditch Company. I do not think that a court ought to hold that notice to him was notice to Borron. There is no other kind of notice claimed. "A silent possession accompanied with no act which can amount to an ouster, or give notice to his cotenant that his possession is adverse, ought not, we think, to be construed into an adverse possession." McClung v. Ross, 18 U. S. 5 Wheat. 116, 124, 5 L. ed. 46, 49.

Taking into consideration that Borron must have been in possession of the Berry Roberts ditch to the extent that he used it for Timber ditch water, and we reach another point in the case that I think is conclusive, as far as the adverse possession of this ditch is concerned. "The rule is that, where there is a mixed possession,—that is, where there are two or more persons in possession, each under a separate conveyance or color of title,—the possession will be treated as being in him who has the better title, upon the ground that the seisin is in him who has the best title, and, as all cannot be seised, the possession follows the title." Wood, Lim. Act. § 261; Langdon v. Potter, 3 Mass. 215; Bellis v. Bellis, 123 Mass. 414. I think the case of Hunnicutt v. Peyton, 102 U. S. 333, 368-369, 26 L. ed. 118, 119-121, supports this doctrine. I do not see how it can be held that the respondents held any distinct and definite part of that ditch as against Borron. As tenants in common of the Timber ditch water, they had a unity of possession, perhaps, of the Berry Roberts ditch. If there was any possession with Ball and Borron by the other parties using water in the Berry Roberts ditch, it was a mixed one, and hence the above rule must prevail. As I said before, one of the main issues in this case is as to the waste water. When did any of the respondents set up any claim to the waste water? Undoubtedly, that waste-water right was preserved up to 1875. The evidence seems to be conclusive that from that time up to 1878 the ditch was always filled, during the irrigating season, with Timber ditch water. In 1878 most all of those owning Timber ditch water transferred it to the New South Fork ditch. Then we hear again of this waste-water right. Glover, in his evidence, says that in 1878 most of the parties turned their water into this New South Fork ditch, and the question was asked him: "Q. And did they cease, then, from taking any water through the Berry Roberts ditch? A. Well no, sir; there was a claim set up then to that water as waste water. Q. Well, what was done about it? A. Well, there were parties, who owned their water in what was called the 'New Ditch,' claimed they had a right in the other ditch, and this was disputed by representatives of the Berry Roberts ditch, and it worked along that way for quite a number of years. Q. Well, what did the owners or claimers of the Berry Roberts ditch do in regard to the water in that ditch, or through that ditch? A. They undertook to use it. Q. Well, did they use it? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, where was that water used, and who by? A. Well, it was used principally on what is now known as the 'Hewitt Ranch,' and what was known as the 'Berry Roberts Ranch,' or on this section 16."

The Berry Roberts ranch is the same as the Ball ranch. On the 1st day of January, 1882, Borron conveyed his rights to Hewitt. It seems Hewitt had gone into possession of all Borron's ranch, and property connected with his ranch, in San Bernardino county, in the fall of 1881. This was less than four years after we hear of any claim to this waste-water right. This is what Harry Hewitt says as to his use of this right: "Q. Now, state what use has been made, if any, of the waters of the Santa Ana river during the years from 1881 down to the present time by your father, if you know, and where has the water been used? A. The water has been used by my father in his place in section sixteen, township one south. Q. Well, how? A. Used for the purpose of irrigation. Q.

For the last few years? A. In 1881 it was not used continuously because the ditch did not run the entire year through, but all the time that the water was in the ditch it was used. Q. You mean that the ditch did not run, or that the river didn't run, or that the water didn't run? A. The water didn't run. Q. Well, how in 1882, 1883, and 1884? Go right along. A. In 1882 we used the water with some exceptions. At some times the water was taken. We turned it back, and used it. Q. Well, how about the other years right along? Oh, state generally whether you used it. A. Well, generally in 1883. In the spring of 1884 the ditch— There was considerable water, and the Sunnyside water master took possession of it. Q. With your consent or without? A. Without our consent and under my protest."

The witness Valdez, called by respondents, said, in answer to questions of counsel for them: "Q. How did you get your water? A. From Mr. Rob Roberts. Q. What is the name of the ditch.—Berry Roberts? A. Berry Roberts ditch and Sunnyside ditch. Q. Were you working there on time cards? A. I don't understand you. Q. Were you working there, having water issued to you then, or delivered to you on time, which was represented by a card? A. Well, not Berry Roberts ditch. I don't recollect we ever used it in that way. He always claimed that as his water, and we always used it whenever we wanted to."

On cross-examination he testified: "Q. You said, in your direct examination about this Berry Robert ditch, he used that water whenever he had a mind to, didn't he? A. Yes, sir. Q. And irrespective of any time tickets, as far as you know? A. Not that I knew that there was any tickets of that water. Q. That was your understanding, was it? A. Yes, sir; that is the way I understood. Q. That there were no tickets? A. Yes, sir. He always claimed that water, and we used it whenever— He seemed to send the water whenever he wanted it."

This evidence pertained to the years 1884 and 1885. His evidence and that of Hewitt is corroborated by that of Glover upon this point.

I cannot find that as to this waste-water right it was definitely contradicted by any other evidence. There was never any location of a waste-water right by the South Fork Ditch Company. The action that was done in 1877 by the water commissioners cannot affect any title to the Berry Roberts ditch or the waste-water right. The recitation that they acted upon a petition of the owners of the Berry Roberts ditch does not prove the fact. This was a location of another ditch to be constructed from another point, and was used to convey these peregrinating water rights of the Timber ditch evidently as understood when they were put into the Berry Roberts ditch. The record says "E. A. Crow and William Curtis met at the mouth of the Santa Ana cañon, and did change the location of the Berry Roberts ditch in the following manner," etc. This is not a location of the Berry Roberts ditch. Its head is near 3 miles above that of the Berry Roberts ditch, and it covered and ran through different ground for most of its course. It seems, however, these parties claiming to own the Berry Roberts ditch, after they had changed its location, did not seem to want to give up the former location thereof. They now claim both. There is shown no right, as far as Borron is concerned, in these commissioners, to change the location of that ditch. At all events, it cannot be held to be a location of the waste-water right of Borron and Ball.

A contention of some kind seems to be made to the effect that the appropriation of the waste-water right was not valid because an appropriation of water must be for some beneficial purpose, and that it appears that more water was appropriated than would irrigate the land sought to be irrigated thereby. There is evidence that in that locality 1 inch of water will irrigate 7 acres of land, and one witness gave evidence that, in cultivating some fruits, 1 inch would irrigate 10 acres of land. If this would make the Berry Roberts waste-water right void, at the date of its appropriation, for the reason assigned, then the appropriation of water in the Timber ditch was also void. The claim that 1 inch of water suffices generally to irrigate 7 acres or 10 acres of land in the San Bernardino valley, where the soil is a sandy loam, and the atmosphere dry, does seem to me to tax even the credulity of one accustomed to irrigation in other sections of country to a considerable extent. When acquired, I do not think there is any doubt but that the Berry Roberts waste-water right was a valid one. The change of notions concerning irrigation and the quantity of water needed for irrigation cannot affect it. It should be observed that the facts constituting an adverse possession are not pleaded. It should be observed that no facts showing adverse possession of either the ditch or water right in dispute are pleaded. The general rule is that the facts constituting the adverse possession should be stated. McCloskey v. Barr, 38 Fed. Rep. 165. There is no difference between a plea and an answer in this particular. The allegation that the action did not accrue within five years presents the question as to whether the action for the diversion of the water accrued within that time. There is no doubt but that respondents had diverted the water complainant claims within five years. The contention that the ceasing to use any parcel of property in its nature real estate, or an appurtenance thereto, for five years, would constitute abandonment thereof, cannot be sustained. No such arbitrary rule is applied in the consideration of this question. Time may be an element in determining intention, but not alone absolute proof of abandonment. Partridge v. McKinney, 10 Cal. 181; Moon v. Rollins, 86 Cal. 883, 95 Am. Dec. 181; Judson v. Malloy, 40 Cal. 300. It devolved upon the respondents to show abandonment, and the rule is that it should be clearly established. Neither for this assigned reason do I find abandonment, and then the evidence does not show a ceasing to use the waste water for any one five years.

There is one further clause in the evidence of Col. Tolles I will recite as bearing upon this question: "Q. What consideration, if any, has he had in this distribution as to the matter of waste water? A. There was no distribution of waste water, to my knowledge, to the parties mentioned,—Mr. Borron or Ball,—during that time, other than was during the rainy season, when all parties shared alike in the surplus water.”

This is followed up by several answers.

Now, if the waste water was used at any time during the year by Ball and Borron, or either, that right was preserved. But, as I think I have shown before, there were no five years when this waste water was not used by some of the owners thereof in the irrigating season. It would seem to me that the act of allowing the owners of Timber ditch water to put their water into the Berry Roberts ditch by Ball and Borron was an act of neighborly kindness and accommodation, and the attempt of those thus favored to use this act to show that the owners thereof had thereby abandoned their right to the same, with the water right connected therewith, and that the respondents herein so accommodated had acquired all of the same, should not appeal with much force to a court of equity and conscience. Considering this case as best I could, I have been unable to reach the conclusion that either the ditch or waste-water right to which complainant asserts title has been abandoned by his predecessor in interest or himself. I will say that the record is an unsatisfactory one. Maps used on the hearing were left out by stipulation. They were needed to explain evidence. The evidence is so mixed up with objections and motions and immaterial evidence as to be confusing.

Complainant also makes claim to certain other water originally used in the Timber ditch. This is urged upon the ground, as I understand, that this water was abandoned by the owners thereof. The Timber ditch was undoubtedly abandoned, and all water used in the same, and not transferred, may be considered perhaps as abandoned. If the equitable title in the same had been conveyed in any manner, undoubtedly this would not occur. But, allowing that it was abandoned, there is no showing that complainant ever appropriated the same. From 1875 to 1878 the Berry Roberts ditch was filled, most of the time, with Timber ditch water. There was no chance, up to that time, to appropriate the same by the user; but, if there was, it would not suffice.

In 1878 the Civil Code of California went into effect. Section 1415 of said Code, upon the subject of irrigation, provides: “A person desiring to appropriate water must post a notice in writing in a conspicuous place at the point of intended diversion stating therein, (1) that he claims the water there flowing to the extent of (giving the number) inches measured under a 4-inch pressure; (2) the purpose for which he claims it, and the place of intended use; (3) the means by which he intended to divert it, and the size of the flume ditch, pipe, or aqueduct in which he intends to divert it. A copy of the notice must within ten days after it is posted be recorded in the office of the recorder of the county in which it is posted.”

There are other provisions of the statute not necessary to be here referred to. Then follows this provision: “Sec. 1419. A failure to comply with such rules deprives the claimants of the right to use the water as against a subsequent claimant who complies therewith.”

There were notices of the location of all such water by other parties. Neither complainant nor his grantors complied with this statute in making any appropriation to any of the abandoned waters of the Timber ditch. This claim is therefore not maintained.

The locators of the Berry Roberts ditch claimed a waste-water right. The water commissioner noted this claim. The evidence shows what was meant by this term, “waste water.” It was the water that was left after the North Fork and the Timber ditch or South Fork ditches were supplied from the waters of the Santa Ana river. It is not an easy matter to determine from the evidence how much water was in fact appropriated as this waste water through the Berry Roberts ditch. Berry Roberts was of the opinion his ditch would carry about 175 inches of water, miners’ measurement. Glover claimed that at one time it would carry about 300 inches, and at another time 200 inches, of water under miners’ measurement. Tolles said that, at times Timber ditch water was put into it, it would not carry more than 100 or 150 inches of water, miners’ measurement, but that the ditch was then out of repair. The evidence shows that, about the time the Timber ditch water was put in, the ditch was enlarged to double its capacity. There were measurements of the ditch after it was enlarged, that would appear to be reliable, that made the capacity of the ditch about 480 inches, measured as above stated. There is one thing to be noticed concerning the evidence estimating the number of inches of water in any ditch from 1860 to 1878. The early estimates of water were much less than the later, and the actual measurements seem to have shown at all times a much larger amount of water than the estimates. Hence I think it would be safe to find that the Berry Roberts ditch appropriated 200 inches of water. There is no dispute but that during certain months the Timber ditch and the South Fork ditch took all the water in the Santa Ana river. What was the exact time this occurred cannot be easily determined from the evidence. Some seasons this period was much shorter than others. I find that from about the 15th of June to the 1st of September of each year, as a rule, these ditches took all the water in the river. As I said before, it seems to be admitted by the answers of all the defendants that they did divert this waste water. If the respondents had each set out the amount of water he or it claims, there might have been a determination of the case to show who are the exact parties who diverted the water owned by claimant. As the case stands, the only decree that can be entered is an injunction enjoining all of the defendants from diverting this waste-water right from the 1st of September to the 15th of June of each year. My opinion is that the judgment of the circuit court should be reversed, and the cause remanded, and the circuit court directed to enter a decree according to this view.

This opinion was written with the thought that it might be adopted as the opinion of the court in the case. Finding that the majority of the court do not agree with the conclusions I have reached, I present the same as my individual views and as a dissenting opinion.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Anthony KELLY et al., Appts.,

v.

City of MINNEAPOLIS et al., Repts.

(.....Minn.....)

- *1. Held, that certain certificates calling for the payment of money, issued by the park board of the city of Minneapolis, are not an indebtedness of the city, within the meaning of section 2, chapter 204, Laws 1893, limiting the indebtedness of cities; and, further, that the amount of the bonds and money in the sinking fund of the city is to be deducted from the total amount of the outstanding bonds of the city, for the purpose of determining its actual indebtedness under the provisions of this statute.
2. Held, that the commissioners of such sinking fund have no authority to purchase from the city its bonds, for the fund, at the time they are offered for sale by it.

(December 9, 1893.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County denying a motion for a temporary injunction to restrain defendants from disposing of certain municipal bonds. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. B. Atwater and P. M. Babcock, for appellants:

There are two kinds of sinking funds—a real sinking fund and a pseudo sinking fund. The object of the first is to ultimately extinguish a certain indebtedness (Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 725, 25 L. ed. 508); the object of the second is to allure prospective purchasers of bonds by holding out to them the existence of a security which is such in appearance only, and not in reality.

It is apparent that, given a general power to issue bonds up to a certain limit, with the right to deduct the sinking fund in calculating this limit, nothing whatever is effected towards actually reducing indebtedness. The limit always rises pari passu with the increase of the sinking fund.

From every consideration of wise and prudent municipal economics it would be better to wipe out such a sham fund, and leave the city simply with the 5 per cent limit and the power of issuing new bonds to retire those maturing from time to time.

In enacting chap. 204, Gen. Laws 1893, which kind of sinking fund did the legislature have in mind?

Section 2 starts out with a prohibition against the creation of any kind of indebtedness in excess of the 5 per cent limit, which is as sweeping and comprehensive as it was possible to make it. Then follow two exceptions to this prohibition.

If these exceptions had not been made, it might be argued that the legislature had left to the courts the matter of determining, according to general rules of law, whether or not a sinking fund should be deducted in estimating a city's total indebtedness. But the express specification of the one kind of deduction necessarily excludes the other.

McRoberts v. Washburne, 10 Minn. 23; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. §§ 825-829; United States v. Macon County Ct. 99 U. S. 583, 25 L. ed. 381.

Only such powers and rights can be exercised under grants by the legislature to corporations as are clearly comprehended within the words of the act or derived therefrom by necessary implication, regard being had to the objects of the grant.

Minturn v. Larue, 64 U. S. 23 How. 436, 16 L. ed. 575.

The board of sinking fund commissioners is a part of the city, and the city cannot issue its own bonds to itself.

Nor does the fact that the certificates are to be paid out of a particular fund constitute them any less an indebtedness within the meaning of the statutory prohibition.

Sackett v. New Albany, 88 Ind. 478, 45 Am. Rep. 487; Springfield v. Edwards, 84 Ill. 626; Law v. People, 87 Ill. 385; People v. May, 9 Colo. 404; Litchfield v. Ballou, 114 U. S. 190, 29 L. ed. 133; Scott v. Davenport, 34 Iowa, 208.

There is no similarity between the park certificates and a warrant or order drawn by the proper city officers for the payment of a specific amount of money out of the city treasury belonging to a particular fund. And the cases holding that such warrants do not create an additional indebtedness are clearly distinguishable from the case at bar.

So long as a contingency exists, however remote it may be, by which the city may become liable for something, in some way, such liability is within the letter and spirit of the prohibition.

Mr. David F. Simpson, for respondents: The city of Minneapolis being by law duly authorized to sell a bond or bonds, and the board of sinking fund commissioners being by law authorized to invest the sinking fund in such a bond, there can be no reason assigned why the sinking fund commissioners should not bid for these bonds at a public sale, and purchase them, if they are the successful bidders.

French v. Burlington, 42 Iowa, 614; Council Bluffs v. Stewart, 51 Iowa, 385.

Start, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to have a certain issue of the bonds of the city of Minneapolis, of the par value of $200,000, known as "Reservoir Bonds," adjudged void, and to restrain the treasurer of the city from paying out of the sinking fund of the city any money for the purchase of such bonds for the sinking fund, pursuant to an agreement to that effect between the city council and the board of sinking fund commissioners. The plaintiffs are taxpayers of the city, and from an order of the trial court denying their motion for a temporary injunction so restraining the treasurer this appeal was taken. The bonds were issued under the provisions of chapter 204, Laws 1893, which forbids any city in this state to issue bonds or to incur any debt or liability of any kind for any purpose except for the purchase, refunding, or payment of outstanding bonds, in excess of 5 per cent of the assessed valuation of the taxable property of such city according to the last preceding assessment. The plaintiffs claim that this 5 per cent debt limit has already been exceeded by the city, exclusive of these reservoir bonds; and, further, that the board of sinking fund commissioners have no authority to purchase from the city its bonds at the time they are offered for sale by it.

1. The first question is, Had the city, if the amount of the reservoir bonds be added to its debt, exceeded its debt limit at the time of the proposed sale of the bonds and the commencement of this action? In deciding this question the claim of the plaintiffs that the sum of $206,567—an alleged indebtedness of the city to the court-house and city hall commission—should be added to the indebtedness of the city, must be rejected, for it does not affirmatively appear from the record that, if there ever was any such indebtedness, it existed at the time stated in the question. Eliminating this claim, it is sufficient to say, without going into mathematical details, that it appears from the admitted facts that, if the amount of certain park board certificates hereinafter to be noticed is not a part of the indebtedness of the city, and if the amount of the money and bonds in the sinking fund of the city is to be deducted from the total amount of the outstanding bonds of the city, the entire debt of the city, including these reservoir bonds, will not exceed its debt limit. The answer, then, to this first question involves a consideration of two subordinate ones: (a) Are the park board certificates an indebtedness of the city, within the meaning of the statute imposing the debt limit? (b) Is the amount of the money and bonds in the sinking fund to be deducted from the total amount of the city's outstanding and uncanceled bonds, for the purpose of determining its actual indebtedness? We are of the opinion that this first question must be answered no, and the second one yes, and we therefore answer the original question in the negative.

2. The park board certificates to which we have referred were issued under the provisions of chapter 80, Special Laws 1889, as amended, which provide for a board of park commissioners, and constitute such board a department of the government of the city of Minneapolis. This board is authorized to designate and acquire land in and adjacent to the city for public parks, and its here material powers are as follows: "The said board of commissioners, and their successors, shall have power, and it is hereby authorized, to obtain title for and in the name of the city of Minneapolis, to any lands so designated by it for the purpose of this act, by gift, devise, purchase, or lease. And said board may enter into any contract in the name of said city, for the purchase of any lands to be paid for in such time, or times, and in such manner, as the board may agree to; and said board may accept title to lands and give back a mortgage or mortgages in the name of said city, with or without bonds to secure the unpaid purchase price, provided, that no personal or general liability on the part of said city shall be created by any such contract, or mortgage, or bond beyond the means at the time available therefor, except the liability to pay such amounts as may be realized from benefits assessed on benefited property on account of the lands included in such contract or mortgage. And it is hereby made the duty of said board to pay on each such contract or mortgage an amount equal to the sum or sums so realized from such assessments; and said board shall have power to accept and receive donations of money, property, or lands, for the use of the said city for the purposes contemplated in this act." Special Laws 1889, chap. 80, § 2, as amended by Id. chap. 108, § 1. The certificates in question were given for the purchase price of land for park purposes, and their payment secured by a mortgage on the land purchased. Each certificate states that the city of Minneapolis is indebted to the payee in the sum therein named, and recites that the consideration therefor is the conveyance to the city by the payee of land for park purposes, and that the certificate is secured by a mortgage on the land sold, and that it is payable out of the funds arising from assessments made upon real estate specially benefited by the park established on the land, and concludes with these words: "It being expressly understood and agreed that there is no liability on the part of said city to pay the amount evidenced by this certificate, secured by the above-described mortgage, out of any other fund than the fund above specified." No certificates issued or contracts made by the park board can be given any legal effect contrary to or in excess of the powers conferred upon the board by the statute we have quoted, and they are, in fact, substantially in accordance with its provisions. The board has no power to make these certificates a lien generally upon all the parks of the city, and the record shows that no attempt has been made to secure their payment by the creation of such a lien. The provisions of the statute relied upon by plaintiffs to support their proposition to the contrary (Special Laws 1889, § 5, chap. 80) refer only to park bonds issued for the purpose of obtaining money with which to acquire land for park purposes. It is admitted that such bonds are a part of the indebtedness of the city. Neither are these certificates secured by a mortgage on any portion of the property of the city previously owned by it, nor by a pledge of its revenues, as claimed by the plaintiffs. If such was the case, then their contention that the certificates are a part of the indebtedness of the city would be correct, for the statute providing a debt limit for cities cannot be evaded by the makeshift of issuing the bonds or other obligations of the city, and make them payable only from the general revenues of the city to be derived from a particular source, or by securing them upon its public buildings or other property, which, if sold to pay the obligations, must be replaced by taxation, to enable the city to discharge its governmental functions. The authorities cited by counsel for the plaintiffs fully support this proposition. But such is not the case we are considering, for each certificate is a lien merely upon the particular land for the agreed purchase price of which it was given, not upon any property which the city previously owned. The deed certificate, and mortgage are all one transaction, and after the mortgage is given the city has just as much interest in the land mortgaged as it had before. When the land is paid for, it will be the property of the city. If not, the certificate holder takes it on his mortgage. The debt of the city is neither increased nor diminished by the transaction. No revenues of the city which must be raised or replaced by taxation are pledged for the payment of the certificates. The statute expressly provides that the park board cannot create any personal or general liability on the part of the city by any certificates they may issue, except to pay such amounts as may be realized from assessments on property benefited on account of the acquisition of the land purchased for park purposes. In no event, nor under any circumstances, is the city liable, except as a trustee, to pay over to the certificate holder the amount actually realized from the assessments. The debt limit is measured by the assessed valuation of the taxable property of the city. How, then, can it be said that these certificates, for the payment of which the city is not liable, and for which no tax can be levied, are an indebtedness of the city, within the meaning of the statute fixing the debt limit?

8. Is the amount of the bonds and cash in the sinking fund of the city to be deducted from the total amount of its outstanding bonds for the purpose of determining whether or not it has exceeded its debt limit? The view which we take of the purpose and nature of this sinking fund renders unnecessary a decision of the question raised and discussed by counsel as to the repeal, by chapter 204, Laws 1898, of the provisions of the charter of the city authorizing such deduction to be made. If this statute does not prohibit such deduction, we are of the opinion that it must be made. It is claimed by plaintiffs that the proviso of section 2, chap. 204, Laws 1898, under the rule, expressio unius est exclusio alterius, forbids the deduction of the amount of the sinking fund. This maxim is not of universal application in the construction of statutes, but whether or not it applies in a given case depends upon the intention of the legislature as indicated upon the face of the statute. Broom, Legal Maxims, 668; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 329. The proviso in question is in these words: "Provided that when bonds are issued for the purchase, refunding, or payment of other bonds of such city, the bonds to be so purchased or paid shall not be considered a part of the bonds on which any city may be liable for the purpose of determining whether the bonds so issued will increase the bonded indebtedness of any city above the limit prescribed in this act." The purpose of this proviso is obvious upon its face. It was intended to set at rest any possible question which might be raised by would-be purchasers of bonds issued for the purpose of purchasing, paying, or refunding previous bonds of the city, as to their validity, which would impair their market value, and embarrass their negotiation. When this proviso is read in connection with the other provisions of the chapter of which it is a part, especially the first section thereof, which declares that the rights and powers previously granted to the cities of the state shall not be abridged or affected by the act, it is manifest that the proviso was not intended either to prohibit or to authorize the taking into account the sinking fund of a city in determining its actual indebtedness. We are, then, to inquire as to the essential character of this sinking fund, and determine therefrom, according to general principles of law and the suggestions of common sense, whether or not the amount thereof should be deducted from the total amount of the outstanding funds of the city in order to ascertain its actual indebtedness. Section 18, chap. 5, Charter of Minneapolis, requires the city council to make an annual levy of taxes sufficient to pay interest to become due during the next fiscal year on all bonds and debts of the city, and also to levy a further tax of one mill to pay the principal of the bonds when they become due, and forbids the application of the fund created by such tax to any other purpose. Section 14, Id., declares that, in order to provide for the certain payment of the bonds and debts of the city, the council are authorized to maintain this sinking fund, and provide for its investment and security, but have no authority to abolish it until all the debts of the city are paid, nor to divert it or any increase thereof to any other purpose, and are required to appoint a board of sinking-fund commissioners to take charge of the fund. This board, with the consent of the council, may invest the fund in the bonds of the city or in certain other designated bonds. If it is invested in the bonds of the city, they are not to be canceled, but the interest thereon is to be collected, and added to the fund; and when the principal of any city bonds becomes due, such of the bonds in the sinking fund as may be necessary are to be sold, with the consent of the council, and the matured bonds paid. In case the board or council neglect or violate any of these provisions, any taxpayer or bondholder is given the right to enforce compliance therewith by suit. The substantial maintenance of this fund, in accordance with these provisions, to secure payment of the principal and interest of the bonds and debts of the city, is declared to be a part of the contract with the bondholders. Section 22, Id., declares, in effect, that no warrant or further appropriation on the part of the city council is required for the application of the money in the sinking fund to the payment of the bonds. It is clear from these provisions that the money in the sinking fund which has already been raised by taxation is irrevocably appropriated to the payment of the outstanding bonds and debts of the city. If any part of the fund is invested in city bonds, they can never be disposed of, except to extinguish by payment prior maturing city bonds. When any bonds held by the sinking fund become due, they are at once a charge against the fund, and they are extinguished by crediting the amount thereof to the fund. It is true, as counsel for plaintiffs claim, that there is no express provision in the charter providing that city bonds in the sinking fund, when they mature, shall be so extinguished; but such bonds can only be sold to pay other bonds as they become due, and the provision of the charter authorizing such sale surely cannot mean that city bonds in the sinking fund already due are to be sold to pay other bonds also due, or that city bonds purchased for the fund are to remain uncanceled indefinitely after their maturity, and a tax equal to the interest thereon levied annually, and paid into the fund. The fair inference from the law relating to this sinking fund is that, when bonds become due, they are to be paid and canceled, whether held by the sinking fund or other parties. It appears from the record in this case that all of the bonds held by the sinking fund are the bonds of the city, hence the amount of the bonds and the money in the fund necessarily represent an equal amount of the outstanding and uncanceled bonds and indebtedness of the city, which has already been realized from taxation to pay the bonds; and to ascertain the further amount to be raised by taxation in order to extinguish the entire indebtedness of the city it necessarily follows that the amount of the sinking fund is to be deducted from the entire amount of the apparent indebtedness of the city. The balance is its actual debt. The debt limit of the statute has reference to an actual indebtedness for the payment of which a tax must be levied, not to an uncanceled apparent liability. Bank for Savings v. Grace, 103 N. Y. 818. As we have suggested, this debt limit of the statute is measured by the rate per cent of taxation necessary to pay the entire debt of the city. This is the test. Now, it is apparent from the admitted facts in this case, that a 5 per centum tax on the assessed valuation of the city would produce a sum which, if added to the amount of the sinking fund, would exceed the amount of all of its bonds and debts, including these reservoir bonds. It follows, then, that the amount of the sinking fund must be deducted from the total apparent debt of the city to ascertain whether its actual debt exceeds the debt limit.

4. Can the board of sinking fund commissioners purchase from the city its bonds at the time they are offered for sale? We answer this question in the negative. We agree with the city attorney that there is no statute forbidding in express words such purchase, but we are of the opinion that such a purchase is so radically inconsistent with the essential character of the sinking fund, and so destructive of the purposes to be conserved by its maintenance, that it must be held that the prohibition is necessarily implied. The city can only issue and sell its bonds by the action of its council, and the board of sinking fund commissioners can only buy its bonds by the action and consent of the council. The intention of the statute is that the council and the board shall be a check upon each other in the purchase of bonds with money in the sinking fund. The unbiased judgment and independent action of each body are essential to the safe guarding of a fund which is intended to secure the certain payment of the existing bonds and debts of the city, and which the council are forbidden to divert to any other purpose. The council cannot act for the city in selling its bonds, and at the same time consent that the trustees of the bondholders and creditors of the city, the board, may invest the trust fund in the bonds which the council desire to sell, because in such a case there can be no exercise of an unbiased and independent judgment by the council as to the propriety of such purchase by the board. To construe the law so as to authorize such a sale would make the sinking fund a debt-creating instead of a debt-paying scheme. Section 4, chap. 204, Laws 1898, provides that the bonds to be issued under the act shall not bear interest at a greater rate than 5 per cent per annum, and that they shall not be sold for less than par and accrued interest to the highest bidder, after publication of notice of the sale thereof. This implies that, if the credit of a municipality or the money market is such that its bonds will not bring in the open market par and accrued interest, they shall not be sold. Now, if a city having a sinking fund set apart for the payment of its outstanding bonds can be a bidder and purchaser of its own bonds at the original sale thereof, using the sinking fund for such purpose, it follows that, when the credit of the city or the money market is such that a 5 per cent bond will not sell in the market for par and accrued interest, the city may sell its bonds to itself by the action of its council and its sinking fund board, in violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the law. Or, in other words, the city council, when it cannot sell bonds of the city in the manner required by law, may consent that the board may turn over to the city the money in the sinking fund, and receive in lieu thereof a new issue of city bonds that cannot be sold in the market, whereby the sinking fund is diverted, to the prejudice of bondholders and the impairment of the credit of the city. One of the primary objects of the law in providing for and jealously guarding the sinking fund is to maintain the credit of the city, and enable it to borrow money, when necessary, on its bonds, at a low rate of interest, and thereby lessen the burden of the taxpayers. But if the city, by the consent of its council and the action of its board of sinking-fund commissioners, can help itself to the money in the fund when its bonds are unsalable, and substitute for the money such bonds, the object of the law will be defeated, and the sinking fund become the means of facilitating an increase of the debt of the city. True, there is no claim made in this case of any want of good faith on the part of the council and the board, and it may also be true that in this particular case it would be for the advantage of the sinking fund to purchase of the city its bonds direct, before they have been negotiated; but the evils which might result from a construction of the statute permitting this to be done are serious. The purpose of the statute is to guard against the possibility of such evils. When the provision of the charter relating to the sinking fund and the statute regulating the sale of municipal bonds are considered together, it is obvious that a sale by the city of its bonds to itself for its sinking fund would be a violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the law.

Order reversed, and case remanded with direction to the district court to grant the plaintiffs' motion for a temporary injunction.

GERMANIA BANK, Respt.,
v.
Achille MICHAUD et al., Appts.

(.....Minn.....)

- *1. An executor or administrator cannot bind the estate or make it liable on any promissory note he may make, and the only effect of any such note is to bind himself personally.
2. Under the law merchant, a negotiable promissory note made by an administrator in his official capacity imports sufficient consideration to bind him personally.
3. There is a sufficient consideration for such a note (1) when the maker has assets in his hands which he might have applied in fulfillment of his obligation; and (2) where a consideration for his promise has been received by the personal representative himself.
4. But such a promissory note given for the debt of the testator without any new consideration, and when the time to file claims has expired, and when the probate court has never allowed the claim or ordered it paid, is without consideration.
5. An agreement to extend the time of payment of the debt of a third party is a sufficient consideration for the promise of the defendant to pay that debt.
6. But such a consideration is not sufficiently adequate to make the defendant, who is an administrator, and who signed a note in his official capacity, personally liable thereon. Such a consideration would not warrant the court in invoking the fiction of law that makes a promise for him which he never intended to make, and by which he is held personally liable on the note.

(November 20, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendants from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County sustaining demurrers to their answers in an action brought to enforce payment of a promissory note. Reversed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. L. Macdonald and Henry J. Horn for appellants.

Mr. O. E. Holman, for respondent:

The defendant, Achille Michaud, is personally liable on the note set out in the complaint.

The administrator had no authority whatever, either in law or in fact, to bind the estate by the issuance of its promissory note.

Frankland v. Johnson, 147 Ill. 525.

An administrator cannot create a debt against the estate of the deceased, and it is immaterial how clearly the intent to do so may be expressed. The law conclusively presumes a personal obligation from the fact of the execution of the note by the administrator.

The administrator having no authority to bind the estate, the law will strike out that part of the note and signature which he had no authority to put there, and which represents him as contracting for the estate, and if apt words remain to bind him individually he will be held personally responsible for the payment of the note.

Wears v. Gove, 44 N. H. 197; Walker v. Bank of State of N. Y. 9 N. Y. 585.

Where an administrator undertakes to bind the estate by a note, believing he has due authority, but in point of fact having no authority, he will be held personally liable, because, where one of two innocent persons must suffer a loss, he ought to bear it who has been the sole means of producing it, by expressly or impliedly inducing the other to place a false confidence in his acts, and because an administrator, who enters into a contract to bind the estate, impliedly warrants his own authority to so bind it.

There are but two exceptions to the foregoing rules: (1) where the contract specifically provides that the administrator shall not be personally liable, or where the promise to pay is restricted to the assets of the estate and not otherwise; (2) where a public agent or officer, without authority, attempts to bind his principal on grounds of public policy, he is relieved from personal liability.

White v. Thompson, 79 Me. 307.

Canty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, as payee, brings this action against the defendants, as makers of the following note:

"$36,000.00. St. Paul, Minn., May 6th, 1892.

"Sixty days, without grace, after date, the estate of E. Langevin, or either of us, promise to pay to the order of Germania Bank of St. Paul thirty-six thousand dollars, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent per annum from date until paid, for value received. Payable at the Germania Bank of St. Paul.

"The Estate of E. Langevin,

"by Achille Michaud, Administrator."

It is alleged that the defendants Elenor Langevin, Emma Flannegan, and Mary E. Michaud indorsed said note before it was delivered to plaintiff, for the purpose of giving the same credit with plaintiff, and intending thereby to make themselves liable thereon as makers thereof. It is further alleged: "That the said defendant Achille Michaud had no authority whatever and was at no time empowered to make or deliver the said promissory note for or on behalf of the said estate of the said E. Langevin, deceased." Judgment is demanded against all of the defendants personally for the amount of the note.

The defendant Achille Michaud answers separately, and alleges: That on September 16, 1890, Edward Langevin died testate, and, at and before the time of his death was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $50,000, and "was mentally and physically incompetent to transact business, and under the guardianship of certain persons, duly appointed as such by the probate court of said county of Ramsey, who were then duly qualified and acting as such; and that said plaintiff at that time held several unpaid promissory notes given to it by said guardians, solely for said indebtedness of said Edward Langevin, and which had been previously made, executed, and delivered by said guardians, as such, to said plaintiff; and that said unpaid promissory notes of said guardians, so held by said plaintiff at the time of the death of said Edward Langevin, were for sums amounting in the aggregate to $50,000 or $51,000." That on the 14th day of March, 1891, the will of said deceased was duly probated and adjudged by the probate court of Ramsey county to be the last will of said deceased. That on the 21st day of July, 1891, he (Achille Michaud) was appointed administrator of the estate of said deceased with the will annexed, and letters of such administration were then duly granted to him by the probate court of Ramsey county. That on the same day the probate court made its order limiting the time for creditors to file their claims against said estate to the 21st day of January, 1892. That said order was duly published, and the time for so presenting such claims expired on said 21st day of January, 1892. That, prior to his appointment as such administrator, the estate had been in charge of three special administrators, who paid a portion of said indebtedness, thereby reducing such indebtedness to the sum of $36,000; but that the claim was never presented to the probate court, or approved or allowed by that court, and that said balance of said claim so remaining unpaid was barred as a claim against said estate when the time so to present the same to said probate court so expired as aforesaid. "That on the 6th day of May, 1892, the said plaintiff still held the said notes of said guardians, or a note given solely in renewal of the same, for said $36,000." That, on said last-named day, this plaintiff represented to him, said Achille Michaud, "that said plaintiff was not allowed to hold or carry what appeared to be overdue notes or commercial paper in its bank, and then and there, and for that alleged reason only, requested this defendant, as said administrator, and not otherwise, to make and give to said plaintiff, in lieu and place of said overdue and unpaid notes for (and representing) said $36,000, and not otherwise, the note of the said estate of said Edward Langevin for said $36,000; and that thereupon said cashier made out all of said note set out in said complaint, except the signature of this defendant, using one of plaintiff's blanks with the words 'or either of us' printed therein, but not then noticed by this defendant or assented to by him; and this defendant, then believing that said $36,000 was a legal and valid claim and demand against said estate, and not otherwise, as said administrator of said estate, and not otherwise, and without any consideration whatever therefor or moving to him, and solely at the request of and for the accommodation of the said plaintiff, and for the purpose of plaintiff aforesaid, affixed his name to said note set out in said complaint, and solely as the note of said estate, as requested by said plaintiff, as aforesaid, and not otherwise." That there was no other consideration for said note except said indebtedness of $36,000, which had been so barred by the statute of limitations; and that, at the time he signed said note, he was not aware of the fact that plaintiff had failed to file a claim for such indebtedness in the probate court, or that it was so barred, but believed that such indebtedness was a valid claim against said estate. This is all of the answer that it is necessary here to consider. The other defendants interposed a somewhat similar answer. The plaintiff demurred to each of these answers, on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense, and from the orders sustaining the demurrers defendants appeal.

Let us first consider the defense of the administrator, Michaud. Although the note is executed by him in the name of the estate, it is well settled that an administrator or executor cannot bind the estate by any promissory note he may make. Even though the note is given for a valid debt or liability of the estate which he should pay, and even though he has a right to reimburse himself out of the assets of the estate when he does pay it, still the note, though made by him as administrator, is his personal obligation, and not the obligation of the estate. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. 4th ed. § 262. The case is not at all analogous to one where the party signing the note is acting for a disclosed principal. An executor or administrator has no principal. "When a trustee contracts as such, unless he is bound, no one else is bound, for he has no principal. The trust estate cannot promise. The contract is therefore the personal undertaking of the trustee." Taylor v. Mayo, 110 U. S. 385, 28 L. ed. 165. Persons contracting in a representative capacity are liable personally when they represent no responsible principal. Story, Agency, §§ 280-286. But these are very general statements of well-established principles, which it might be easy to misapply. When a trustee executes an instrument as trustee, even though he has no principal, and does not bind the trust estate, there ought to be some good reason why the court will make for him a new contract by which he is bound personally. The doctrine that he is liable personally on such a contract is a fiction of law, which, like many other fictions of law, was invented to prevent injustice, not to promote it. This fiction of law has always been applied to cases where the executor or administrator had assets in his hands which he might have appropriated to the fulfillment of his obligation, and to cases where the other party, as a consideration for the obligation of the executor or administrator, parted with something more than a mere nominal or technical consideration. But this fiction of law should not be invoked to make a new contract for the parties where the executor or administrator had no assets with which to reimburse himself, and the other party had no good reason to suppose that he had or would have such assets, has not been misled, and has parted with nothing but a nominal or technical consideration on the faith of the administrator's promise. We can find no case which holds otherwise.

The defendant administrator attacks the complaint, and contends that it does not state a cause of action as against him. Under the rule of the law merchant, a negotiable promissory note made by an executor or administrator, as such, imports sufficient consideration to bind him personally. Story, Prom. Notes, § 68; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 262. For this reason, we are of the opinion that the complaint states a cause of action against the administrator. But, as against any one but an innocent purchaser for value before maturity, the consideration for such a note may be inquired into.

At common law, except when suit was brought against him, the administrator or executor himself, and not the court, allowed or adjusted the debts of the deceased with the creditors. He paid these debts without any order of the court out of the assets of the estate, or paid them out of his own funds, and reimbursed himself out of the assets. He had the right, among creditors of equal degree, to pay one in preference to another. 1 Wms. Exrs. (Rand. & T. Ann. Notes) 256. He might thus prefer and pay a creditor by giving his own obligation for the debt. Hepworth v. Haslop, 6 Haro, 561. When the executor or administrator, having assets of the estate applicable to the payment of the debt, gave his own note to the creditor for such debt, it amounted to an appropriation of the assets to the amount of the debt to the payment thereof; and this constituted a sufficient consideration for his promise, and he was personally liable, whether he made the note as administrator or in his own right. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 263. If he failed to reimburse or indemnify himself, it was his own fault, and no concern of the creditor. But if, without any new consideration, he gave his note for the debt of the deceased when he had no assets, there was no consideration for the note, and his promise to pay was nudum pactum. 3 Wms. Exrs. 288-298; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 270; Bank of Troy v. Topping, 18 Wend. 557; Rucker v. Wadlington, 5 J. J. Marsh. 238; Byrd v. Holloway, 6 Smedes & M. 199; Rann v. Hughes, 7 T. R. 850, note; Ellis v. Merriman, 5 B. Mon. 296; Schoonmaker v. Roosa, 17 Johns. 304; Ten Eyck v. Vanderpool, 8 Johns. 120.

In jurisdictions where the giving of a new note for a prior indebtedness, and the surrendering up of the old note which represented the prior indebtedness, is an absolute payment, it is held that when the executor or administrator gives his note for the debt of his testator or intestate, whose note is surrendered up to the executor or administrator, it constitutes an absolute payment of the debt and a sufficient consideration for the new note. But this is not the law in those states where, in such a transaction, the giving of the new note would not constitute absolute payment. In referring to the case of Thacher v. Dinmore, 5 Mass. 801, the court in Bank of Troy v. Topping, 9 Wend. 278, says: "That case is no authority here because the reasons are not applicable. A promissory note given in this state for a simple contract debt does not absolutely discharge such debt. The creditor may still prosecute upon the original consideration, and may recover upon producing and cancelling the note. In that case, also, it appears that the defendant had assets. In the case now under consideration, the plaintiffs lost nothing by taking the defendants' notes for the note of their intestate. They might at any time have prosecuted the defendants as administrators for the money lent to their intestate, and recovered judgment, and thus have obtained any preference which the law would then have given them." In this respect the law of this state is like that of New York, and the giving of the new note in such a transaction would not be an absolute payment. See Combination Steel & I. Co. v. St. Paul City R. Co. 47 Minn. 207.

The respondent's counsel has cited many cases which hold that the contracts of an executor or administrator are not binding on the estate, and, although made by him as such executor or administrator, are binding on him personally. Most of these are cases where the transaction originated with him, and not with the deceased, and the other party to the contract furnished the whole consideration therefor at the request of such executor or administrator. To cite from his own brief: "The rule must be regarded as well settled that the contracts of executors, although made in the interest and for the benefit of the estate they represent, if made upon a new and independent consideration, . . . are the personal contracts of the executors, and do not bind the estate." Austin v. Munro, 47 N. Y. 866, 367. "The action here is exclusively upon the undertaking of the defendant, importing a promise to pay the sum of $900 on the 1st day of July, 1879, to the payee of the draft or his order for a consideration received by the promisor. No facts are alleged or proved showing any liability on the part of the defendant's testator to the drawee of the draft, or any legal demand existing in his favor, against the estate represented by the defendant." Schmittler v. Simon, 101 N. Y. 558, 54 Am. Rep. 787. See also Sumner v. Williams, 8 Mass. 162, 5 Am. Dec. 83; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Weeks, 53 Vt. 118; M'Eldery v. M'Kenzie, 2 Port. (Ala.) 37, 27 Am. Dec. 643; Sims v. Stilwell, 3 How. (Miss.) 181; Steele v. Steele, 64 Ala. 451, 38 Am. Rep. 15; Kingman v. Soule, 132 Mass. 285; Long v. Rodman, 58 Ind. 63; Doolittle v. Willet (N. J.) 31 Atl. Rep. 385. In Davis v. French, 20 Me. 28, 37 Am. Dec. 36, it is said: "The true doctrine on this subject appears to be that where the cause of action existed against the deceased, the executor or administrator may make himself personally liable by a written promise founded upon a sufficient consideration. . . . In this case the contract originated with the administrator, and there is no evidence that the debt also did not."

But the transaction set out in the answer of the administrator in the case at bar did not originate with him. He alleges that he gave the note in suit for the debt of the testator. An administrator, under the law of this state, has no assets of the estate which he can apply to the payment of a debt of the deceased, unless the claim has been allowed by the probate court. He does not allow such claims, and has no discretion as to the order or priority of payment of such claims. The probate court allows and orders the claims paid, and he is the mere depository of the funds for payment. Then the doctrine of the common law that assets of the estate in the hands of an administrator or executor are sufficient consideration for his promise to pay the debt of the intestate or testator can have no application here, and there can be no presumption that such executor or administrator has such assets. Then we cannot see that Michaud would be liable on his note, even if the debt in question had not been barred as a claim against the estate before he gave his note for it. The reasons by which we reach this conclusion are in conflict with the reasons given for the decision of Brown v. Farnham, 55 Minn. 84, but we are of the opinion that the result arrived at in that case is correct. The question of the liability of the executor arose on a demurrer to the complaint. It appears from the complaint that Farnham and Lovejoy were partners, and, as such, owed the plaintiff $12,000. After Lovejoy's death, his executors and the surviving partner, Farnham, continued and carried on the partnership business under the old firm name of Farnham & Lovejoy. The executors, acting with the surviving partner, presumably meddled with and diverted assets of the old firm, which the surviving partners should have applied in payment of the plaintiff's debt. But, instead of doing this, the executors joined with Farnham in executing to plaintiff their note for his debt, not in their official name as executors, but in the name of Farnham & Lovejoy. They subsequently joined with Farnham in executing a composition agreement with the creditors of the old firm of Farnham & Lovejoy, which agreement they failed to perform. Surely, under these circumstances, it should not be presumed that there was no consideration for the undertakings of these defendants in these matters, merely because they were executors of the estate of Lovejoy.

Both parties have argued the demurrer to this answer on the theory that the only question is whether or not the administrator has, by the note in suit, bound himself personally to pay the debt of his testator; while it seems to us that the answer clearly shows that this debt had ceased to be a debt of the testator or a liability against his estate long before the administrator signed the note in suit. If this is true, he could not (as could the original debtor) by his promise, without a new consideration, revive a debt barred by the statute of limitations. But the answer alleges that, at the time of his death, the testator was under guardianship, and plaintiff then held the notes of the guardians for this debt; that, when the note in suit was made, plaintiff "still held the notes of said guardians, or a note given solely in renewal of the same;" and that this was the debt for which the note in suit was given. The answer of the administrator can be considered only as a plea of want of consideration for the making of the note in suit, but it does not appear by his answer that the debt in question did not continue to be a valid debt against the guardians or the person or persons who made the note "given solely in renewal" of their note. The burden was on the defendant to show want of consideration for his note, but he has not shown that the debt did not continue to be the debt of some one else after it had ceased to be the debt of the estate of Langevin. Whether or not the guardians could, by their note, without a new consideration and without assets, bind themselves to pay the debt of their ward, we need not consider. The probate court may have provided for that purpose assets which they already had in their hands, or they may have received a new consideration for the making of the note, or the consideration for it may have originally been received by them as guardians, and not by the ward before guardianship. The defendant has not shown that there was no consideration for any of those prior notes, and we must presume that there was a sufficient consideration for them. Then it must be held that the note in suit was not given for a debt of the estate or of the testator, but a debt of these guardians or of those who made a note in renewal of their notes. Then the question resolves itself into this: Has the defendant administrator, by the note in suit, become bound to pay the debt of these third parties? It does not appear by his answer whether or not, as a consideration for the note in suit, the time of payment of this debt has been extended. Such extension of the time of payment would be a sufficient consideration for the promise of a surety, if this can be considered such a promise. See Nichols & S. Co. v. Dedrick (Minn.) 68 N. W. Rep. 1110. It is not alleged in the answer that no such extension was given, and, if such extension would be a sufficient consideration for the note in suit, it must be presumed that it was given. But, while such consideration is sufficient to support the promise which the party intended to make, we are of the opinion that it is not a sufficiently adequate consideration to warrant the court in making a new contract for the parties, and, by a fiction of law, hold the administrator liable on a promise which he never intended to make. We cannot see that the words "or either of us," in the note in suit, after the words, "the estate of E. Langevin," have any tendency to show that the defendant administrator intended to bind himself personally.

For these reasons, we are of the opinion that the answer of the administrator stated a good defense, and that the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer to the same.

But the other defendants promised in their own right, and, from what we have said, there may be sufficient consideration, by such an extension of the time of payment of the debt, to support their promise. These defendants allege nothing that is not alleged in the answer of the administrator, and, while they do not allege as much as is alleged in that answer, still they refer to that answer, and make it a part of their own. Whether this is an irregular mode of pleading we need not consider. No objection is taken to it, and we shall therefore regard both answers as substantially the same. We are therefore of the opinion that the answer of these other defendants states no defense.

This disposes of the case.

The order appealed from, so far as it sustains the demurrers to the answer of the defendant Achille Michaud, is reversed, and, so far as it sustains the demurrers to the answer of other defendants, is affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

INDIANA, ILLINOIS, & IOWA RAILROAD COMPANY Appl.,

v.

Frederick O. SWANNELL et al.

(187 Ill. 618.)

1. A trustee for railroad bondholders to purchase at a foreclosure sale under a reorganization scheme, though entitled to abandon the sale because of the failure of a sufficient number of bondholders to pay assessments made, is bound by all the terms of his trust, where, notwithstanding such failure, he proceeds to complete the purchase made as such trustee, until he is released therefrom by the bondholders.
2. Property purchased under a scheme for reorganization of a railroad, by a trustee for bondholders, may be followed by the latter into the hands of a purchaser from such trustee with knowledge of the trust.
3. A railroad company is chargeable with the knowledge of its president and director that property purchased by it is impressed with a trust in favor of the holders of bonds issued by the former owner of such property.

NOTE.—On the general subject of following trust funds, see Philadelphia Nat. Bank v. Dowd (C. D. E. D. N. C.) 2 L. R. A. 480, and note; Little v. Chadwick (Mass.) 7 L. R. A. 570, and note; also Leake v. Watson (Conn.) 3 L. R. A. 666.

4. A purchaser with notice of a trust, either express or implied, becomes himself a trustee for the beneficiary with respect of the property, and is bound in the same manner as the original trustee from whom he purchases, even though he is a purchaser for a valuable consideration.
5. A money judgment is properly rendered against a railroad company purchasing from a trustee for bondholders a railroad bought in by him under a reorganization scheme, with notice of the trust, by which the bondholders were entitled to new bonds secured by mortgage, where it refuses to comply with an interlocutory decree directing it to issue such bonds, although stock in a construction company was given in consideration of such purchase, which was at one time of great value, but has greatly depreciated.
6. The beneficiary in a trust is not bound to enforce an individual liability against a trustee who has disposed of the trust property in an improper manner, but has the alternative remedy of following the trust property.
7. A release by a bondholder of the trustee in a reorganization agreement from all further duty or liability, and a waiver of all rights attained through or by him, will not preclude such bondholder from following the railroad property purchased by such trustee in his official capacity and transferred by him to another company.
8. The return of bonds by a trustee for bondholders under an arrangement for the reorganization of a railroad, to a bondholder upon an order receipting in full for the bonds and discharging the trustee from all liability, does not release the equities that such bondholder has in the property purchased by such trustee under the arrangement and transferred by him to another company.

9. Property purchased by a trustee for bondholders under an arrangement for the reorganization of a railroad is not discharged from the trust, where such trustee does not abandon his bid, but procures the confirmation of the sale to himself and the vesting in him of the title to the property, as to bondholders who fail to pay assessments, release the trustee from liability, and accept a return of their bonds or a portion of the assessments paid,—especially where the reorganization plan makes no provision for forfeiting the interest of bondholders, but provides that their shares of the purchase money may be borrowed or otherwise provided, and in default of payment within a specified time the interests of such bondholders may be sold.

10. All the bondholders (who are parties to an agreement for the reorganization of a railroad, by which a trustee was appointed to purchase the road at foreclosure sale, have a beneficial interest in the property purchased by such trustee, and are in equity to be regarded as the real owners of it as tenants in common; and any of them are entitled to relief in a suit by one of them for himself and others similarly situated to enforce the trust against a purchaser from the trustee, where the only differences in their situation are such as do not release the property from the trust.

APP^EAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, modifying and affirming as modified a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to hold certain property in the hands of defendant subject to a trust in favor of plaintiffs. Affirmed.

Statement by Baker, J. :

The Kankakee & Pacific Railroad Company, being a corporation originally created by and under the laws of the state of Indiana, with power to locate and operate a road from Plymouth, in the state of Indiana, westerly to the boundary line of the state of Illinois, was consolidated with a company organized under the laws of the state of Illinois; the name of the consolidated company being the Plymouth, Kankakee, & Pacific Railroad Company, with a capital stock of $2,500,000. Said railroad company proceeded to procure a right of way, and partially constructed its railroad, and made large outlays of money for the purchase of material and payment of labor. On the 1st day of June, 1871, the Plymouth, Kankakee, & Pacific Railroad Company executed 3,600 bonds, each for the sum of $1,000, due in thirty years, and to secure the same executed a trust deed conveying all and singular its line of railroad and all its property in trust to J. Edgar Thompson and George W. Cass, of the state of Pennsylvania. Of said bonds 398 were negotiated and sold to various parties. Thereafter, default in the payment of interest having been made, Samuel T. Hanna and several other bondholders filed a bill, on the 25th day of July, 1874, in the United States circuit court for the northern district of Illinois, for the purpose of foreclosing the said trust deed. On the 4th day of August, 1876, a decree was entered in said cause, which decree provided, among other things, that said railroad company should pay the amount found due on said bonds, and that, in default of such payment, the property described in the said trust deed should be sold by the master in chancery of said court, and the proceeds of such sale applied to the payment of the bonds and coupons described in said decree. Thereupon the property covered by said trust deed was, in pursuance of such decree, on the 12th day of June, 1877, offered for sale by Henry W. Bishop, a master in chancery of said court, the report of the sale of the master, filed June 10, 1878, containing the following statement: "At which sale Mr. John C. Cushman, trustee for bondholders, bid the sum of $4,000, that sum being the highest sum bid for the same, and he being the highest bidder; and I further report that said bid has not yet been complied with, and respectfully ask of the court further directions herein." Prior to the property being offered for sale, a portion of the holders of said bonds had made an arrangement under which said John C. Cushman was to bid in the property for the use and benefit of such of the bondholders as might come in and become parties to such arrangement. Such arrangement contemplated a reorganization, the issuance of new bonds to the old bondholders, and the payment of a small sum upon each of the bonds to defray the necessary expenses attending upon such arrangement. No further proceedings were had in said cause until February, 1881, at which time the said Cushman and one Joel D. Harvey filed in said United States circuit court their petition asking that said Cushman be allowed to complete his bid and receive a deed for said property; and on the 8d day of May, 1881, the said circuit court confirmed said sale to said Cushman, and ordered the said master to execute and deliver a deed to him of said property, and a deed thereof was, on the same day, in pursuance of said order, executed and delivered to said Cushman. On the 11th of July, 1881, said Cushman conveyed said property to appellant, the Indiana, Illinois, & Iowa Railroad Company. He took from Harvey, who had become the owner of the greater portion of the bonds for which the foreclosure was had, an indemnifying bond which, among other things, provided that said Harvey should hold Cushman harmless against all loss, costs, damage, and expenses to which said bondholders or any other person might seek to subject him (Cushman) by reason of such conveyance, and to pay all judgments, costs, and expenses that might be awarded or rendered against him (Cushman) in any court of final or general jurisdiction, in any suit or proceeding growing out of such conveyance, or of his trusteeship for the holder of any bond of the Plymouth, Kankakee, & Pacific Railroad Company. In consideration of the conveyance to the Indiana, Illinois, & Iowa Railroad Company, Harvey received, according to his testimony, about $150,000 of the stock of a company known as the "Western Air Line Construction Company." Under an order of reference made by the court in the case at bar, the master found that the new bonds which the respective bondholders were to receive by the terms of the reorganization contemplated by the arrangement under which said Cushman made his bid at the master's sale would, if they had been issued, be worth 88 cents on the dollar,—or, in other words, that if the plan of reorganization had been carried out, the bondholders of the Plymouth, Kankakee, & Pacific Railroad Company would have received for the bonds which they held other bonds of the same amount, and now actually worth 88 cents on the dollar.

The original bill in the case at bar was filed by William G. Swannell, since deceased. His executors, Frederick Swannell and Frederick O. Swannell, have been substituted, pending the litigation, in his place and stead. Said original bill charges that, subsequent to the decree of foreclosure in the United States circuit court, and to the bid of Cushman at the master's sale, and before the confirmation of such sale, said Harvey purchased a large number of said bonds for a nominal sum, and that Cushman and Harvey conspired together to obtain the property and to defraud Swannell, who filed the bill as a holder of some of the bonds secured by said trust deed, and also to defraud other holders of said bonds of their proportion in the said property, mortgaged as aforesaid. The bill charges that, at the time Cushman conveyed the property, as aforesaid, it was of sufficient value to pay the bonds of Swannell and the other bondholders in full, but that complainant never received anything from the proceeds of said sale. The suit was brought by Swannell on behalf of himself and other holders of the bonds similarly situated who might desire to become parties and share the benefits of the suit. The prayer of the bill is that the title acquired by Cushman shall be declared to be in trust for all the bondholders, and that the conveyance from Cushman to the Indiana, Illinois, & Iowa Railroad Company shall be charged with the same trusts, and be held in trust for Swannell and the said other bondholders, and that the said railroad company shall be decreed to deliver new bonds in equal amounts, according to the plan of reorganization. And the bill contains, also, a prayer for general relief. During the progress of the cause various intervening petitions were filed,—one by Patrick Dore, the owner of seven of the bonds; another by Samuel W. Strong, owner of three of the bonds; and still another by Henry M. Hooker, the owner of twenty-five of the bonds. The original bill and the intervening petitions were all referred to a master in chancery to take testimony and report the same, together with his findings and conclusions, to the court. The master reported in favor of granting relief upon the original bill, in favor of Frederick Swannell and Frederick O. Swannell, executors of the last will and testament of William G.

Swannell, deceased; but he recommended that relief be denied upon the intervening petitions of Dore, Strong, and Hooker, respectively. The circuit court of Cook county sustained the exceptions of Dore to the report of the master, and overruled those of Strong and Hooker, respectively, to said report. And thereupon said court entered a final decree that Frederick Swannell and Frederick O. Swannell, executors of William G. Swannell, deceased, recover of the Indiana, Illinois, & Iowa Railroad Company the principal sum of $825, with interest thereon at 6 per cent per annum from October 25, 1891, such interest amounting to $96.80, and the total of principal and interest amounting to $921.80, and that they have execution therefor; that Patrick Dore recover of said Indiana, Illinois, & Iowa Railroad Company the principal sum of $2,810, with interest thereon at 6 per cent per annum from October 26, 1891, such interest amounting to $271, and the total of principal and interest amounting to $3,081, and that he have execution therefor; and that the petitions of Samuel W. Strong and Henry M. Hooker, severally and respectively, be dismissed. From the decree thus rendered, the Indiana, Illinois, & Iowa Railroad Company, Samuel W. Strong, and Henry M. Hooker each appealed to the appellate court for the first district, and assigned errors, and such proceedings were had in the appellate court as that the decree of the circuit court was reversed, and the cause remanded to that court, with directions to enter a decree in favor of Samuel W. Strong against the Indiana, Illinois, & Iowa Railroad Company for 88 cents on the dollar of the par value of three bonds of $1,000 each, less the sum of $12, being for the sum of $978, with interest thereon at 5 per cent per annum from the 21st day of October, 1891; and to enter a decree in favor of Henry M. Hooker against the Indiana, Illinois, & Iowa Railroad Company for 88 cents on the dollar of the par value of twenty-five bonds of $1,000 each, less the sum of $225, with interest at 5 per cent per annum, being for the sum of $8,025, with interest thereon at 5 per cent per annum from the 21st day of October, 1891; and to render decrees in favor of the executors of Swannell and said Dore, respectively, for the principal amount severally found for said executors, and for the principal amount severally found for the said Dore, with interest thereon in each case at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from the 21st day of October, 1891, instead of the rate of 6 per cent per annum, as directed by the decree appealed from. And the appellate court also made an order in regard to the apportionment and taxing of the costs of that court. The Indiana, Illinois, & Iowa Railroad Company now prosecutes this appeal from the order and judgment of the appellate court.

Messrs. Walker & Eddy for appellant:

It cannot be fairly held that the inadequacy of price was, of itself, notice that this property was purchased by Cushman in trust for the bondholders.

Wade, Notice, § 24.

The foreclosure record was not sufficient notice to the appellant that Cushman's title in the property was that of mere trustee; nor was it by any means notice of the equities now attempted to be asserted by the appellees.

It cannot be said that appellees still regarded Cushman as their trustee, for notice had been given them of the plan of reorganization, and those who had not failed or refused to comply with the request of Cushman, as set forth in the circular letter long prior to the last order of the court, had withdrawn their bonds from Cushman and expressly released him from all trusts in the property.

The word "trustee" attached to a name is merely descriptive, and does not limit liability or authority, and is not notice of a trust.

Messrs. Thomas P. Bonfield, G. Frank White, George W. Cass, and Dent & Whitman, for appellees:

The privity between the complainants, the community of interest in the subject-matter, the fact that Cushman was the trustee of each of them in one entire piece of property which, although they had separate and distinct interests in it, belonged to them as equitable tenants in common, and that in Cushman's administration of this property he had defrauded them,—meet the requirements as to community of interests.

Baker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There being some differences in the particular circumstances of the case as made by the executors of Swannell, and those made by Dore, Strong, and Hooker, respectively, the merits of the case made by each may, to some extent, properly and conveniently be separately considered; and this may be done without repeating, in respect to each of the cases, facts and rules of law or equity that are stated in regard to one case, and that are equally applicable to the cases of some or all of the other appellees.

1. It seems to us that three questions only arise in regard to the decree in favor of the Swannells. They are these: Did John C. Cushman hold the title to the property, at the time he conveyed it to appellant, as trustee for William G. Swannell and other bondholders? Did appellant acquire such title from Cushman with notice of this trust, and therefore take the same subject to the equities of Swannell? Was it proper to render a money decree in favor of the executors and against appellant?

John C. Cushman, at the sale made by the master in chancery, under the foreclosure decree in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois, bid in all the property of the Plymouth, Kankakee, & Pacific Railroad Company as trustee for the bondholders, and he made such purchase in pursuance of a trust agreement, made previous to the day of said master's sale, between him and the holders of 883 bonds out of 898 bonds of said railroad company. In this trust agreement there was embodied a plan of reorganization whereby the old bondholders were to receive bonds in a new company to be organized by the said Cushman, and to be secured on the same property, such bonds to be issued to the extent of $23,000 per mile; the old bondholders simply obligating themselves to pay to said trustee, when called upon, their proportions of the expense and costs incurred in the foreclosure proceeding and in the organization of a new company, in the manner provided by the terms of said trust agreement. Nearly all the bondholders signed this trust agreement previous to the sale, and although Cushman bid off the property at the master's sale as trustee for the bondholders, it appears that a majority of the original holders of said bonds afterwards failed to pay the assessments made upon them for their respective proportions of the costs of the foreclosure sale and reorganization, and it is therefore claimed by appellant that the said Cushman was absolved from the obligation and burden assumed by him under the terms of said trust. Cushman had a right to abandon the sale, and to refuse to complete the same, because of the failure of a sufficient number of bondholders to respond to his call for their shares of the assessment. This would have left the mortgaged property still under the lien, and subject to the equities of Swannell and the other bondholders. A resale could have been had under the decree, and the value of the property thereby applied in payment of their demands. But having, however, bid off the property as trustee for Swannell and others, and having proceeded to complete the purchase made by him as their trustee, he must be held to be absolutely bound by all the terms of said trust until released therefrom by the appellee, Swannell, and the other bondholders. Swannell entered into this trust agreement and delivered his bonds to Cushman. He paid all assessments made upon him by Cushman as such trustee, and the money so paid by Swannell to Cushman was actually and in fact retained and used by Cushman to make up the sum of money necessary to complete the purchase made by him at the master's sale; and Swannell never withdrew his bonds, or received back from Cushman any portion of the assessments paid to him as trustee to perfect such sale, and never in any manner released Cushman from any of the duties or obligations imposed upon him by the trust agreement entered into between them prior to the day of said master's sale. Cushman could not, therefore, divest himself of any of the obligations imposed by said trust agreement without Swannell's consent. The matter of the relation existing between John C. Cushman and Joel D. Harvey, respectively, and the bondholders who had placed their bonds in the hands of Cushman, was before this court in Cushman v. Bonfield, 139 Ill. 219. We there held that Cushman had bid off the property, rights, and franchises of the Plymouth, Kankakee, & Pacific Railroad Company as trustee of such bondholders, and that the trust created was impressed upon and followed the title, which was subsequently perfected in Cushman by the execution of the master's deed made in pursuance of such sale, and continued up to the time of the conveyances by which the railroad property became vested in the Indiana, Illinois, & Iowa Railroad Company; and also held that it was fairly to be inferred, from the terms of the indemnity bonds given by Harvey to Cushman at the time the latter conveyed the property to the Indiana, Illinois, & Iowa Railroad Company, as well as otherwise clearly shown by the evidence, that Harvey had full knowledge of the trust reposed in Cushman, and of the equitable interests of Bonfield and the other bondholders in the property, and that said Harvey having in his possession the proceeds of trust property, the law charges him also as trustee, and holds him accountable as such. And we may here add that the case appearing in this record in favor of Swannell is in all respects like the case made out for Bonfield in the former litigation, the only substantial difference being that there the relief was granted against Cushman and Harvey personally, while here the decree went against the appellant corporation.

This brings us to the question whether the Indiana, Illinois, & Iowa Railroad Company had notice of the trust and of the restrictions and limitations upon the title of Cushman, at the time that it received the conveyance of the property from him. The record shows that said railroad company was organized on July 8, 1881; that it was organized by Harvey for the express purpose of receiving from Cushman title to the property, rights, and franchises of the Plymouth, Kankakee, & Pacific Railroad Company, and that on July 11, 1881,—three days after its organization,—Cushman made to it a quitclaim deed for the same, and on the day the deed was given Harvey executed to Cushman an indemnifying bond, in the sum of $60,000, conditioned that he would hold Cushman harmless against all loss, cost, damage, or expense to which the bondholders of the Plymouth, Kankakee, & Pacific Railroad Company, or any of them, or any other person or persons, may seek to subject him by reason of the conveyance, and pay all judgments, costs, and expenses incurred, awarded, or rendered against him in any suit or proceeding growing out of the conveyance, or his trusteeship for the holders of any of the bonds of said Plymouth, Kankakee, & Pacific Railroad Company. From the date of the organization of appellant, and at the time Cushman executed to it the quitclaim deed for the trust property, and for many years thereafter, Harvey was a stockholder in and director of the company, and its president. That Harvey had full—even plenary—knowledge of the trust that was imposed upon Cushman, appears so clearly and in so many different ways in this record, that it is useless to waste time in mentioning them. The knowledge of a person who is a director of a corporation, and its chief executive officer, must be regarded as actual notice to the corporation itself. In no better way can notice be imputed to it. The company, then, must be considered to have taken the property covered by the trust with full knowledge of the trust imposed upon it. It had ample notice of the rights and equities of Swannell and the other bondholders, and it cannot now be heard to say that it is an innocent purchaser of the property for value. It took its title under the Cushman conveyance, charged with all the conditions and limitations imposed upon it by the trust agreement between Cushman and the bondholders for whom he undertook to act. The railroad company simply stepped into Cushman's shoes, and Swannell has the right to follow the property and hold the company as his trustee. The doctrine is that a purchaser with notice of a trust, either express or implied, becomes himself a trustee for the beneficiary with respect of the property, and is bound in the same manner as the original trustee from whom he purchased,—and this even though he is a purchaser for a valuable consideration. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 688; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 251, 265; School Trustees v. Kiroin, 25 Ill. 73; Fast v. McPherson, 98 Ill. 496; Cushman v. Bonfield, 139 Ill. 219; Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Slee, 128 Ill. 57; Phillips v. South Park Comrs. 119 Ill. 626.

The remaining question in regard to the Swannell claim has reference to the propriety of a money decree against appellant for the value of bonds such as should have been issued according to the terms of the trust agreement. The circuit court first entered an interlocutory decree that appellant, within sixty days from the date of such decree, execute and deliver bonds such as called for by the original plan of reorganization, secured by mortgages as therein provided; but appellant failed and refused to comply with the requirements of such decree, and thereupon the court entered a final decree against appellant for the value of such bonds as shown by the report of the master and the evidence reported therewith, together with interest from the date of the report, and awarded execution therefor and for costs, as upon a judgment at law. Harvey received, as consideration for the transfer of the property, rights, and franchises of the Plymouth, Kankakee, & Pacific Railroad Company to the Indiana, Illinois, & Iowa Railroad Company, paid-up stock to the amount of $150,000 in the Western Air Line Construction Company, a corporation formed under the laws of the state of Iowa for the purpose of completing the construction of the railroad in question. According to the testimony of Meckling, an experienced railroad builder, who went over the railroad in 1880 or 1881 at Harvey's request, he and said engineer agreed that the property in its then condition, as left by the Plymouth, Kankakee, & Pacific Railroad Company, was of the value of $900,000. It appears from the testimony of Harvey that the original capital stock of the construction company was $1,000,000; that he got $150,000 of this stock, paid up, for the property of the old railroad company; and that the other parties in interest paid for the residue of the stock in cash; and that said stock was then worth its par value, but it has since so declined in value as that there have been some sales of it as low as 8 cents on the dollar. It would be inequitable and unjust, and a destruction of the contract rights of the bondholders, to now compel them to receive, in satisfaction of their claims, their respective proportionate shares of said $150,000 construction company stock, that is now almost worthless, on the ground that, in the plan of reorganization, there was direct authority to the trustee to sell and transfer all the right, title, and interest in the property of every bondholder becoming a party to such plan of reorganization, and under that authority it was sold and transferred to appellant for $150,000 in construction company stock. The power authorizing the trustee to sell and transfer, "providing he shall deem it for our interest to make such transfer," was coupled with the provision that he should "receive for us, in exchange therefor, such securities as are provided by the plan of reorganization hereto annexed for our respective interests in the property purchased." And the securities for which provision was made in the plan of reorganization were that the bondholders should receive new bonds for the principals of their old bonds, secured by a first mortgage on the railroad property, not exceeding $23,000 per mile of the main track, and second-mortgage or income bonds for the coupons and accrued interest due on their existing first-mortgage bonds. It is suggested that in Cushman v. Bonfield, supra, it was in effect held that the purchase price received by Harvey, as the value of the property at the time of the conversion, was a trust fund to be held for distribution among all the bondholders in accordance with their respective equities, and the intimation seems to be that that case is an authority that the particular relief granted in this case is improper. The Bonfield Case establishes that a personal decree against Harvey and Cushman was proper relief for a court of chancery to grant, but it was not there held that it was the only relief admissible under the circumstances of the transaction. The beneficiary in a trust is not bound to enforce an individual liability against the trustee, for he has the alternative remedy of following the trust property. Bradley v. Luce, 99 Ill. 234; Long v. Fox, 100 Ill. 48; Breit v. Yeaton, 101 Ill. 242, 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 261, and authorities cited in note 4. In the Bonfield Case the chancellor granted one mode of relief, while in this case he allowed appellees to follow the property into the hands of appellant.

2. In the matter of the intervening petition of Partick Dore, it appears that Dore, the owner of seven bonds, became a party to the trust agreement of November 21, 1876, and duly executed and delivered to Cushman a power of attorney authorizing him to act in respect to said bonds, in purchasing the property, and disposing of the same; that he delivered said bonds to Cushman, and paid to him the two assessments called for, to be used in perfecting title in Cushman for the benefit of the bondholders, said assessments amounting to $35 and $28, respectively, and Cushman testifies that this money, so received, "was used in the costs and expenses of the foreclosure proceedings in the United States court." The sole and only difference between the case of Dore and that of Swannell is that, on July 9, 1881, Cushman handed back to Dore his seven bonds, and took from him a receipt and discharge which reads as follows:

"Chicago, Ill. July 9, 1881.

"I have this day received from John C. Cushman seven first-mortgage bonds of the Plymouth, Kankakee, & Pacific Railroad Company, numbered 440, 441, 443, 444, 445, 448, and 449, with interest coupons thereto attached, numbered from 6 to 60, inclusive. And I hereby release said Cushman from all further duty or liability in connection therewith, as my attorney or representative, and agree to hold him harmless therein, and waive all rights that I may have attained through or by him."

It appears that Cushman tried to induce Dore to assign his interests to Harvey for $418, but that Dore refused to accept the offer, saying he would rather lose it all. Cushman told him that he had nothing more to do with the road, that he could do nothing more for him, and for him to go and see Harvey, and gave him Harvey's address. Thereupon Dore demanded his bonds, and they were delivered to him upon his signing the receipt in question. It is manifest from the evidence that, when he received his bonds back from Cushman, on July 9, 1881, it was his intention and purpose to insist upon his rights, and claim his interest in the property covered by the decree of foreclosure. Even If effect can be given to the release from further duty and from liability, and to the waiver of rights embodied in the receipt, yet such release and waiver do not affect the equitable rights enforced by the decree herein. The relief granted by the court is not a personal decree against Cushman, and is not an enforcement of his personal liability as trustee; and the rights which the decree enforces are not rights or equities which Dore obtained by or through Cushman, but rights and equities which were vested in Dore under and by virtue of the mortgage and decree of foreclosure. Wipe out the bid of Cushman, and the acts done by him, yet the equities of Dore in the property of the Plymouth, Kankakee, & Pacific Railroad Company still exist, and the fact still remains that appellant has converted that property to its own use, with full notice and knowledge of such equities.

The difference between the case of Samuel W. Strong and that of Dore is this: Both the assessments paid by the latter were used in perfecting the title in Cushman, while, of the two assessments paid by Strong, one, that for $15, was so used, while the other, $12, was returned to Pearre, the agent of Strong. The circumstances under which this was done may be stated. Strong gave to Pearre a written order as follows:

"You will please deliver to L. G. Pearre, Esq., on presentation of this order, which shall be your receipt in full and a complete discharge from all liability, three first-mortgage bonds of the Plymouth, Kankakee, & Pacific Railroad Company, being numbers 426, 427, and 366, for $1,000 each, and coupons thereto attached, together with the power of attorney authorizing you to act as trustee to represent said bonds."

Cushman swears that he drafted this order, and that Strong had frequently talked with him, and knew that the plan of reorganization had completely failed. Of course, the discharge from liability in this order did not work the result of releasing the equities that Strong, as a bondholder, had in the property and under the decree. If it be urged that the Swannell suit was brought only on behalf of himself and such other holders of the bonds of the Plymouth, Kankakee, & Pacific Railroad Company as are similarly situated, and that said suit proceeds directly upon the theory of the trust agreement made between Cushman and the bondholders, and that, therefore, these general equities of Dore and of Strong in the railroad property, and under the decree of foreclosure, do not arise and are not involved in the original suit of Swannell, and consequently not here enforceable, we may say that we regard what is hereinafter said in respect to the intervening petition of Henry M. Hooker, and in respect to the cases made on the petitions of Dore and of Strong, as conclusive against any such suggestions or result.

It appears that the Third National Bank of Chicago formerly held the twenty-five bonds which its receiver afterwards sold to Hooker, and which Hooker now owns. The bank was a party to the trust agreement, and gave to Cushman a power of attorney authorizing him to purchase the railroad property at the master's sale for its benefit, and to receive for it new bonds in a reorganized company, and delivered to him said twenty-five bonds. Cushman, on January 12, 1877, acting under the trust agreement, bid $4,000 for the property at the master's sale, that being deemed sufficient to pay costs and expenses, and it was struck off to him as trustee of the bondholders. He bid in the property for the benefit of the bank, as well as for the benefit of other stockholders. Neither of the two assessments made on the bank was paid, either by the bank or the receiver. Quite a considerable time thereafter Cushman returned the bonds and the power of attorney to the receiver. There was no rescission of the trust agreement, either as to the assignor of Hooker, or Strong, or Dore. Neither the return of the bonds and the powers of attorney to the receiver for the bank, to Strong and to Dore, respectively, nor the restitution to Strong of the $12 received for the last assessment, nor the failure of the bank and its receiver to respond to assessments, nor the release and discharge contained in the order signed by Strong, nor the release and the waiver of rights embodied in the receipt of Dore,—worked such a rescission as to the rights and interests of either of the interveners. It is a fundamental condition of the law governing the rescission of contracts that the parties must be restored to their original positions as nearly as possible. Cushman could not retain his bid, made in his capacity of trustee of Dore, Strong, the bank, and other creditors, and his claim upon the property of the railroad company, obtained by means of the powers of attorney and the trust agreement, and yet successfully maintain that the contract and agreement between him and said bondholders were rescinded and the trust relations existing between him and them at an end. He could not shake off the trust without abandoning his bid and all claim to the property. This he did not do, but procured a confirmation of the sale to himself, and a vesting in himself of the title to the property which was the subject of the trust. If he had thrown up his bid and abandoned all claim to the property, then these intervening bondholders, and the other bondholders in whose interest the mortgage was foreclosed, could readily have procured a resale of the property and the application of the proceeds of such sale in payment of their bonds. The plan of reorganization and the powers of attorney defined the relations between the holders of the bonds and Cushman, and gave Cushman whatever interest he had in the property, and whatever power he had in the event any of the bondholders failed in making payment of assessments for costs, expenses, and fees. This plan of reorganization, and these powers of attorney made no provision by virtue of which Cushman could forfeit the rights and interests of any of the bondholders who were parties to the trust agreement. The authority given to enforce payment of assessments is carefully and specifically pointed out in item 4 of the plan of reorganization. It is there provided that the trustee may borrow the pro rata shares of bondholders who fail to pay their shares of the purchase money, "or any other person may provide the same, and any sum so borrowed or provided for such purpose shall be repaid, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent per annum by the bondholders for whose benefit it was borrowed or provided, before he shall be entitled to receive any bonds or other proceeds of such sale from said trustee; and should such sum, with interest, remain due and unpaid for one year from the date of its advancement, said trustee shall, upon demand by the party making such advance, sell the interest of said bondholders in the proceeds of said sale at public auction, giving ten days' notice thereof in some daily newspaper of the city of Chicago, of the time and place of sale, to the highest bidder thereof for cash, and after paying costs of such sale, and the money and interest thereon before advanced, said trustee shall pay the residue, if any, to said bondholder, or his legal representative, on demand." It is claimed that the equities of Dore, Strong, and Hooker are not the same as the equitable rights of Swannell, and that, therefore, they cannot come in under his bill, and are not entitled to the same relief. We think that the gist of the original bill is the relation of trustee and cestuis que trust that existed between Cushman and the bondholders by virtue of the powers of attorney and the plan of reorganization, the violation of the trust, and the transfer of the property, with notice, to appellant. All the bondholders who were parties to the trust agreement had a beneficial interest in this property,—were in equity the real owners of it, and in equity to be regarded as tenants in common. The differences between the cases of Swannell, Dore, Strong, and Hooker we regard as simply differences in the immaterial circumstances of each particular case. There is such a community of right and interest among the appellees in the question at issue, and in the remedy, as makes it admissible that the intervening petitioners should come in under the original bill of Swannell. UTAH SUPREME COURT.

Joseph KRANTZ, Appt.,
v.

RIO GRANDE WESTERN RAILWAY
CO., Resp't.

(.....Utah.....)

1. A railroad company owes no duty to a passenger as such after he alights from the train at a station and proceeds towards a section house connected with the station, for the purpose of engaging in his regular business as a peddler.
2. A railroad company is liable for an injury to a person in one of its station houses in a sparsely settled country, although he was not an intending passenger, caused by one of the employees of such company aided by strangers, without any provocation, in the presence of the ticket agent, who represented the company and made no effort to prevent the injury.
3. A correct verdict will not be set aside because of errors occurring on the trial.

(August 31, 1895.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for the Third District in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for an assault committed on plaintiff by defendant's servant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—The above case is believed to be a novel one on the subject of liability for injuries to person in depot. Another unusual case is Dean v. St. Paul Union Depot Co. (Minn.) 5 L. R. A. 442.

On the general subject of a carrier's liability for assault upon a passenger, see note to Davis v. Houghtelin (Neb.) 14 L. R. A. 737.

Messrs. E. W. Taylor and C. S. Varian, for appellant:

Appellant was a passenger when assaulted. In any event the question was for the jury.

It is not necessary that the contract for passage should be actually made or the fare actually paid, nor that a person should be on the train, to create the relation. If he is on the premises of the carrier, or in a vehicle under its control to the station, with the bona fide intent to become a passenger, the carrier owes to him a duty as such.

Com. v. Power, 7 Met. 601, 41 Am. Dec. 465; 1 Wood, Railway Law, p. 450.

The duty of the agent was plain. He should have led the way in protecting appellant. At least he should have made an earnest endeavor to do so, bringing all the authority with which he was clothed into action.

Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Hinds, 53 Pa. 512, 91 Am. Dec. 224; New Orleans, St. L. & O. R. Co. v. Burke, 58 Miss. 227, 24 Am. Rep. 689.

When the liability of the master depends on the sole fact that the person inflicting the injury was in some business his servant, if on inquiry it is found that the act was not done while in the transaction of the master's business then the act is not that of the master but of the servant. But this rule cannot be applied when the master, either by contract or by reason of imperative duty imposed by law or public policy, is under obligations to protect the injured person from the servant's wrongful act as well as his own. In such case the master is liable—at least, to make actual compensation—as though the act was his own personal act.

The position of defendant is that, having permitted the servant of the company, acting with strangers, to force appellant into a situation whereby he lost his money, upon his return to renew his claim for protection and transportation respondent owed him no duty. We fail to see why the rule as to gratuitous passengers would not apply in all its force to this case, even upon the assumption that appellant had no money.

Messrs. Bennett, Marshall, & Bradley, for respondent:

The duty of railway companies to persons who come to their stations as passengers is twofold:

(a) As the owners of fixed property to guard persons thereon at their invitation from pitfalls and concealed dangers. This duty is not peculiar to common carriers.

(b) To care for the safety of persons who as passengers have surrendered the control of their actions to the carrier.

2 Wood, Railway Law, 2d ed. § 299.

The relation of passenger and carrier ends when the journey contracted for is completed and the passenger has either left the railway-station premises or been afforded a sufficient time to so leave.

Patterson, Railway Accident Law, § 221; Imhoff v. Chicago & M. R. Co. 20 Wis. 344.

But if, instead of leaving or attempting to leave, the claimed passenger resumes control 30 L. R. A.

of his own person; stays on the premises of the railway for his own purposes; goes to a portion of the premises clearly not intended for him, and that not in an effort to leave the premises, but with the express intent to there vend his wares,—he has severed the relation that bound them and ceased to be a passenger.

If plaintiff was not then a passenger defendant is not liable for the act of the section foreman.

Cooley, Torts, pp. 625-627; Patterson, Railway Accident Law, 117 et seq.

A mere indefinite intention to leave by rail some time in the future would scarcely make plaintiff a passenger.

An intending passenger cannot insist on being accepted if he presents himself to the carrier under such circumstances of danger to the passenger as to throw unusual obligations on the carrier.

The intending passenger must make known his intention. The contract must be formed. It is true the payment of fare need not be made. But there must be a promise to pay, with the present liability to comply therewith, and this must be known to the carrier.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this cause, appellant, the plaintiff below, brought suit to recover damages on account of alleged personal injuries inflicted by the respondent's servants. There are two counts in the complaint, and upon the trial a verdict was directed for the respondent, the defendant below, upon the first count, and a verdict returned in favor of the appellant, plaintiff below, in the sum of $4,000 upon the second count. The record discloses the following facts: Upon the 19th of July, 1892, appellant boarded one of the passenger trains of respondent at the station of Sunny-side, in this territory, and paid his fare to the next station, Lower Crossing, where he alighted from the train. Appellant was fifty-one years of age, and a traveling merchant by occupation, at the time engaged in traveling over the country, selling spectacles. Lower Crossing is simply a station on the line of railway, and its station house, together with the pump house and section house, were embraced, practically, within one inclosure. There was a platform extending from the station house to the section house, which was but a few yards distant. In alighting from the train, in pursuit of his business, plaintiff went towards the section house, for the purpose, as he says, to sell his wares. Before he reached the house, the section foreman, then in the employment of the company, who, it appears, was under the impression that the appellant was a spotter and spy of the respondent company, without provocation or words, assaulted him with a shovel, and drove him back to the station house, following him. The foreman pulled him out of the station house, and ordered him to leave, saying that he would give him five minutes to get away, and threatening him with death unless he obeyed. The ticket agent was present, and saw the foreman assaulting the appellant outside the station house, and saw them back into the waiting room. Plaintiff, fearing further bodily injury, or worse, started to walk on the track away from the station, and towards Grand Junction, some 30 miles away. He was followed by two unknown persons, designated in the testimony as "tramps," who assaulted and robbed him after he had proceeded about a quarter of a mile upon his journey, taking his satchel, containing his stock in trade, together with his pocketbook, containing a few dollars in money. Thereupon he returned to the station house. The persons who robbed him returned also, and, it appears, located themselves at or near the pump house, which was opposite and across the tracks from the station house. Upon his return he entered the station and made complaint to the ticket agent of what had happened, and was talking with him about sending telegrams to Green River station, giving information of the robbery. The section foreman interfered, and directed the ticket agent not to send the telegrams, and immediately after crossed the track to where the two tramps were standing, when all three came over to the station, the foreman in advance, and, entering the waiting room, the three assaulted the appellant, brutally beating him. Appellant appealed to the agent and the bystanders for assistance, which was finally rendered by a stranger, the ticket agent making no effort to protect him, other than, as he says, to order them all out of the waiting room. He testifies that he knew the section foreman, for some reason or other, was bent upon injuring the appellant, and that he did not interfere to protect him because he was sick; that he would have had to fight to protect him; that the foreman was subject to his orders in the station house, but would not mind him, because they were at outs; that his authority as station agent would not have been sufficient to protect appellant. Appellant was driven from the station, and walked all night to Price station, a distance of forty miles, in his sick and disabled condition, where he received attention. The injuries he received were severe and permanent in their nature. The first count in the complaint charges the respondent company with damages for the first assault upon the appellant by the foreman outside of the station house. The second count charges the company for the assault and beating of the appellant by the foreman and the two tramps in the waiting room after he had been robbed. The district judge charged the jury that, in order to find for the plaintiff upon the second count, they must find "that this man was absolutely a passenger of the defendant company; that the relation of passenger and carrier existed between them at the time of the assault. There is a correlative duty existing on both the passenger and carrier: the passenger to pay, or offer to pay, his fare; if it is accepted, he then becomes a passenger; then the duty of the railroad company is to protect, by all means within its power, during his transportation, and while he remains in the station house in that character, awaiting the coming of a train, or the departure of a train, as the case may be. That relationship existing, it was the duty of the railroad company to protect him from assaults, not only from its own agents and servants, but from other persons, if within their power; more especially from their servants and agents. That correlative duty was imposed on the railroad company, if you find, I say gentlemen, that he was a passenger at that time; and, to become a passenger, he must have paid his fare, or have offered and tendered to pay his fare." A new trial was granted upon the second count, and the plaintiff appeals from the judgment against him on the first count, and from the order granting a new trial.

We are of the opinion that when the plaintiff alighted from the train at Lower Crossing, and made his way towards the section house, for the purpose of engaging in his regular business, his relation as passenger to the respondent company had ceased, and that it no longer owed to him any duty as a passenger; that the acts of the section foreman were not within the scope of his duties or employment, and, not being suffered or permitted by the respondent company, the appellant cannot recover from the company. We do not think that the general rule which permits a passenger a reasonable time in which to depart from the company's premises after alighting from his train has any application, and therefore affirm the judgment upon this appeal upon the first count.

In support of the order granting a new trial, it is urged by respondent's counsel that a motion for a new trial is addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and that, in some particulars, the evidence being conflicting, that court should not disturb the order. It is further claimed that, in order to entitle appellant to the protection of the respondent company, he must not only have intended to become a passenger, but must also have announced such intention, and his proposition must have been accepted by or on behalf of the company. This view was adopted by the trial court, and the case submitted to the jury upon this theory, and this alone. It is quite evident from the entire record that the new trial was granted because, in the opinion of the trial judge, the appellant was not a passenger or intending passenger within the rule declared in its charge. In other words, the new trial was granted because, in the opinion of the court, the verdict was contrary to the law, and not because of any conflict in the evidence. In the view we take, we are of the opinion that it is unnecessary to determine here when or how the relation of passenger begins. We think the case turns upon another rule of law. It appears from the record that the section house was situated in a desert country, sparsely settled, and with habitations few and far between; that the only method of transportation to and from Lower Crossing was by rail, and the station house was kept open for the reception of the public at large, as well as passengers, ordinarily, during all hours of the day. It is a matter of common knowledge, of which the court may take notice, that these railroad station houses scattered along the line of railroads in a sparsely-settled country, such as the locality here is proved to be, are thrown open for the use of the public, which, by invitation of the company, is permitted to use them at all times, before and after the arrival and departure of trains; that there was and is an implied invitation to all persons intending to avail themselves of the railroad service to enter and occupy the premises, and at any time, in the absence of reasonable regulations to the contrary, made by the company. And the offer to pay fare, or the announcement of the intention to pay fare, and the acceptance by or on behalf of the company, is not necessary to be made, by a person entering the station with such or other legitimate purpose, to entitle him to protection against violence by the company's servants. This case does not even depend upon this question. When the appellant was assaulted and beaten in the waiting room of the station, the company itself was present, in the person of the ticket agent in charge, who was its vice-principal, and the injuries inflicted upon the appellant by one servant of a company, aided by strangers, in the presence of and under the very eye of the vice-principal, who tamely acquiesced, and failed to exercise his authority for the protection of the appellant, were inflicted by the company itself. The agent should have protected appellant, or, at least, should have made an earnest effort to do so. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Hinds, 58 Pa. 512, 91 Am. Dec. 224; New Orleans, St. L. & O. R. Co. v. Burke, 58 Miss. 227, 24 Am. Rep. 689. We are not prepared to sanction the proposition that a man in the situation of the appellant, driven by the unprovoked and brutal violence of the company's own servants to seek the protection of its station house and waiting room in charge of its agent, has no recourse against the company for the wilful and malicious acts of its employees, under circumstances which make them the acts of the company. We think such contention is not only against public policy, but the settled rules of law. Upon the evidence, then, the verdict was clearly right, and, in our judgment, the amount was not excessive. The district judge erred in his construction of the law, and the case was submitted to the jury upon a wrong theory.

We are of the opinion from this record that the appellant is entitled to recover from the railroad company, and are not disposed, and do not find it necessary, to put him to the expense and trouble of a new trial. "Why should a verdict be set aside which is correct, because erroneous principles of law have been announced by the court? The object of a jury trial being to do justice between the parties, the annulment of the verdict, where this has been accomplished, on account of mistakes and misdirections on the part of the court, would seem akin to the criticism which censured a celebrated commander because he persisted in winning victories in violation of the rule of strategy." New Orleans, St. L. & O. R. Co. v. Burke, 58 Miss. 227, 24 Am. Rep. 689.

The judgment upon the verdict as to the first count is affirmed, and the order granting a new trial as to the second count is reversed, and the original judgment upon the verdict reinstated as of April 28, 1894, the date of the original entry. As the two appeals were submitted upon practically one record, and briefed together, the costs of printing briefs and record will be taxed in the respective appeals as apportioned by the clerk.

check by an accommodation indorser, it was cashed by a bank and duly sent for collection to its correspondent in the city where the bank upon which the check was drawn was located, and there, together with a number of other checks, was duly presented to the drawee for payment, and the runner of the correspondent accepted in payment of all these checks a small sum of money and a check of the drawee upon another bank in the same city, which check, had it been promptly presented, would have been paid, but, having been held by the runner or the bank be represented, for two or more hours, during which time the drawee failed, in consequence of which the check last mentioned was dishonored.—Held, that under these facts the bank which cashed the original check could not hold the accommodation indorser liable for the amount thereof; and this is true although after the drawee's check had been dishonored the original check was reclaimed and duly protested.

2. The facts as above stated having been agreed upon by the parties, direction is given that the superior court render a final judgment in favor of the defendant.

(February 5, 1895.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Chatham County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce the liability of an indorser upon a check. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lawton & Cunningham and H. W. Johnson, for plaintiff in error:

The Central Railroad Bank had until the day following its receipt of this check to forward it to its Baltimore correspondent for collection, and the Baltimore Bank had until the day following its receipt there to present it for payment.

Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1592; Morse, Banks & Banking, § 421.

According to this rule, therefore, the utmost diligence was used in that part of the transaction, for the Central Railroad Bank might have held the check for a day, and the Citizens' Bank of Baltimore might have also held it for a day, and yet no negligence could have been charged against either, although Nicholson & Sons, the drawees, had failed in the meantime.

Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1625; Morse, Banks & Banking, § 421.

Where the holder of negotiable paper takes a check in payment of it, he should take care to present the check with such diligence that if it is not paid he may return it to the drawer and reclaim the bill or note in time to make a proper demand and protest, so as to preserve the liability of the drawer and indorsers.

Morse, Banks & Banking, § 247; Smith v. Miller, 43 N. Y. 171, 8 Am. Rep. 690; First Nat. Bank v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 77 N. Y. 320, 33 Am. Rep. 618, 89 N. Y. 418; Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1566; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Samuel, 20 Fed. Rep. 664.

The runner of the Citizens' Bank of Baltimore, in accepting Nicholson & Sons' check on the Western Bank, acted in pursuance of "the custom of Nicholson & Sons to give their check for the even hundred and cash the amount (less than $100) in excess of the hundreds, unless for any reason cash or certified check for the whole amount were demanded." Dufour was bound by this custom.

1 Morse, Banks & Banking, pp. 28, 29; Mills v. Bank of United States, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat, 428, 6 L. ed. 514.

Messrs. Giguilliat & Stubbs, for defendant in error:

Brosius had the money on deposit with the drawee bank to meet the check; the agent and correspondent of plaintiff presented the check; the drawee gave in satisfaction thereof that which was both given and received as a discharge of Brosius's undertaking or obligation, in fact, part of what was given was legal tender or currency. This was a payment for if the agent took anything but money he did so at his own risk.

Randolph, Com. Paper, §§ 1398, 1454; Morse, Banks & Banking, 247, 247c; Word v. Smith, 74 U. S. 7 Wall, 447, 19 L. ed. 207.

No local usage, even though it was Nicholson & Sons' custom to give a check for the even hundred, could affect the law which determines what is legal tender.

Morse, Banks & Banking, § 9, p. 20, note 9.

The Central Railroad Bank is liable for the negligence of its correspondent.

Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1437.

This whole matter is settled beyond any doubt by Anderson v. Gill, 79 Md. 812, 25 L. R. A. 200, a parallel case in almost every particular.

Simmons, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The receiver of the Central Railroad & Banking Company (of which the Central Railroad Bank is a part) brought suit in a justice's court against J. A. Dufour, upon a check for $75, dated at Baltimore, January 9, 1893, upon J. J. Nicholson & Sons, bankers, by S. H. Brosius, payable to the order of A. M. Brosius, and indorsed by A. M. Brosius and by J. A. Dufour, which check had been protested for nonpayment. The case was submitted upon an agreement as to facts, and the justice rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff. A writ of certiorari to this judgment was sustained by the superior court, and the case remanded to the justice's court for a new trial. To this ruling the plaintiff excepted. The facts agreed on were as follows: On January 11, 1893, defendant, accompanied by A. M. Brosius, went to the Central Railroad Bank and requested the assistant cashier, Ulmer, to cash the check in question. Brosius being a stranger to Ulmer, he told defendant he could not cash the check unless it was indorsed by him. Defendant thereupon indorsed it, and it was cashed. On the same day it was forwarded by mail by the Central Railroad Bank to its correspondent in Baltimore, the Citizens' National Bank, for collection. The Citizens' National Bank received it, and acknowledged the receipt on January 14, 1893, and on the same day, about 11 o'clock, by its regular runner, presented this check, with other checks and drafts on J. J. Nicholson & Sons, to said firm for payment, the aggregate of all the checks and drafts so presented being $1,748. The runner accepted $48 in cash and the uncertified check of J. J. Nicholson & Sons on the Western National Bank for $1,700, in payment for the checks and drafts presented, the custom of Nicholson & Sons being to give their check for the hundreds, and cash for the balance, unless for any reason cash or certified check for the whole amount were demanded. The checks and drafts so presented to Nicholson & Sons, including the check in question, were canceled by them and charged up to the drawers thereof. The check book of Nicholson & Sons showed that three or four checks (including one for about $1,900 and another for about $2,200) drawn by them on the Western National Bank after the check for $1,700 was delivered to the runner of the Citizens' National Bank were paid by the Western National Bank before the $1,700 check was presented to it, said check not having been so presented at any time before half-past 1 o'clock. Banking hours in Baltimore were from 9 to 3 o'clock in the day. The Western National Bank was three squares from the bank of Nicholson & Sons, and nearly seven squares from the Citizens' National Bank. It was not over five minutes' walk from the first place and ten minutes from the latter. Nicholson & Sons failed about 1:45 o'clock of said day, and the Western National Bank refused payment of the check drawn by them for $1,700. The Citizens' National Bank relieved the checks and drafts which its runner had delivered to Nicholson & Sons, after 2 o'clock, and during that afternoon protested all of them for nonpayment and on the next day returned to the Central Railroad Bank the check sued on here.

1. If the holder of a bank check neglects to present it for payment within a reasonable time, and the bank fails between the time of drawing and the presentation of the check, the drawer is discharged from liability to the extent of the injury he has sustained by such failure. An indorser is discharged absolutely. Daniels v. Kyle, 1 Ga. 304, 5 Ga. 245; 2 Morse, Banks & Banking, 3d ed. §§ 421, 422. What is a reasonable time will depend upon circumstances and the relation of the parties between whom the question arises. When the facts are undisputed, the question is one of law to be determined by the court. If the check is received at a place distant from the place where the bank upon which it is drawn is situated, and is forwarded by due course of mail to a person in the latter place for presentment, the person to whom it is thus forwarded has until the close of banking hours on the next secular day after he has received it to present it for payment unless there are special circumstances which require him to act more promptly. 2 Morse, Banks & Banking, 3d ed. § 421; Dan. Neg. Inst. 4th ed. § 1591. The holder cannot, however, after having once presented the check, derive any advantage from the fact that he could, without being chargeable with unreasonable delay, have held it longer before making presentment. The first presentment fixes the rights of the parties. If the drawee is then ready and willing to pay, and the holder allows the fund to remain longer in the hands of the drawee, or if he accepts in lieu of money a check of the drawee, he does so at his peril. 2 Morse, Banks & Banking, 3d ed. § 426; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. 4th ed. § 1593; Simpson v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 44 Cal. 189; Anderson v. Gill, 79 Md. 312, 25 L. R. A. 200. If his acceptance of the drawee's check does not of itself discharge an indorser of the original check, the indorser should certainly be held discharged if the substituted check is not presented promptly and the collection is thereby defeated. Such presentment cannot be delayed at the risk of the indorser for any time beyond that within which, with reasonable diligence, the presentment can be made. In this case, it appears that presentment of the substituted check could have been made in about five minutes from the time it was received, the bank upon which it was drawn being only three squares distant from the bank of J. J. Nicholson & Sons, the drawees of the original check; but it was not presented for two hours and a half or more after it was received by the collecting bank, and by reason of this delay the collection was defeated. Under these circumstances, we think the collecting bank failed to exercise due diligence, and its principal, the plaintiff in this case, was not entitled to recover against the defendant, the indorser of the original check. In the case of Anderson v. Gill, supra, under circumstances almost identical with these, the drawer of the check sued upon was held discharged. In that case, as in the present case, the original check was drawn upon J. J. Nicholson & Sons and was presented to them on the day of their failure, about 11 o'clock A. M., and their check upon the Western National Bank received in lieu of it and not presented until after the failure, though presented within banking hours of the same day. In that case, also, the original check was recovered from Nicholson & Sons and protested on the same day; but it was held that this made no difference,—that, although the collecting bank was not bound to have made demand upon Nicholson & Sons when it was made, still, having made it, and, by its own choice, not having received the cash, it could not, if it had not used due diligence, claim the right to undo what it had done, and by a subsequent demand put itself in the position it would have occupied had it not made the first demand at the time it did make it, or done the act it then did. A full discussion of the subject, with numerous citations of authority, will be found in the opinion of the court in that case. See also Smith v. Miller, 48 N. Y. 171, 8 Am. Rep. 690, 53 N. Y. 545; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Samuel, 20 Fed. Rep. 664; People v. Cromwell, 103 N. Y. 477; also cases cited in note to Anderson v. Gill, in 25 L. R. A. 200, 201.

2. The facts of this case, as above stated, having been agreed upon by the parties, direction is given that the superior court render a final judgment in favor of the defendant. See Code, § 218, ¶ 2, and § 4284; Central R. & Bkg. R. Co. v. Kent, 91 Ga. 693.

Judgment affirmed, with direction.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

John H. BLY, Admr., etc.,

v.

NASHUA STREET RAILWAY COMPANY.

(.....N. H.....)

The provision of Gen. Laws, chap. 269, § 14, that "no person shall ride through any street" in the compact part of any town at a swifter pace than at the rate of 5 miles an hour, applies to a street-railway company whose charter provides that the road may be operated by such power as may be authorized by the mayor and aldermen, who shall have power to make such regulations as to the rate of speed as the public safety and convenience require, where no regulations have been made by them in regard to speed.

(July 23, 1893.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Hillsborough County Court, made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence, which resulted in plaintiff's favor. Overruled.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. G. B. French and Burnham, Brown, & Warren for defendant.

Messrs. E. S. Cutter, H. A. Cutter, R. M. Wallace, and C. H. Burns for plaintiff.

Chase, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Does the statute providing that "no person shall ride through any street or lane, in the compact part of any town, on a gallop or at a swifter pace than at the rate of 5 miles an hour" (Gen. Laws, chap. 269, § 14), apply to the defendants, whose charter provides that their "railway may be operated by such horse or other motive power as may be authorized by the mayor and aldermen" of Nashua, and that the mayor and aldermen "shall have power to make all such regulations as to rate of speed and the mode of use of said railway as the public safety and convenience may require?" Laws 1885, chap. 192, § 5. The statute was enacted in 1792, and has been re-enacted in every general revision of the laws substantially in the same form. Laws 1792, p. 181; Laws 1880, p. 160, § 5; Rev. Stat. chap. 118, § 13; Comp. Stat. chap. 119, § 15; Gen. Stat. chap. 252, § 14; Gen. Laws, chap. 269, § 14. Street railways were unknown in 1792. The mode of conveyance for persons then in general use was on horseback. A gallop is a favorite gait for such riding. But the mode of conveyance was a mere incident of the mischief to be remedied. This consisted of the danger to which the life and limbs of persons using a street or lane were exposed by the fast riding of others, whatever be the mode of conveyance. The object of the statute was to remedy the mischief; and it was to be accomplished by preventing fast riding generally, not fast riding on horseback in particular. The words used are general: "No person shall ride . . . at a swifter pace," etc. The means of riding may be any that is in use while the statute is in force. See Taylor v. Goodwin, L. R. 4 Q. B. Div. 228; Williams v. Ellis, L. R. 5 Q. B. Div. 175.

The defendants are restrained by this limitation, the same as persons using other modes of conveyance, unless their charter gives them a special privilege. The charter does not give the defendants the exclusive use of the portions of streets occupied by their tracks. If it did, there would be ground for claiming that the legislature intended to exempt them from the limitation, for, in such case, no one could lawfully occupy a position in which he would be exposed to the danger of collision with their cars. The public generally have a right to use those portions of the streets, but in a manner and to an extent modified by the use which the defendants make of them. People may pass across or along the tracks when cars are not passing. The rights of the public and the defendants are in a great measure common. Middlesex R. Co. v. Wakefield, 108 Mass. 261, 268; Concord v. Concord Horse R. Co. 65 N. H. 80, 86. By the charter, the legislature authorized a new use of streets, which is the source of a new and great danger to other travelers. The driving of cars over steel or iron rails is attended with greater danger to others using the streets than the driving of ordinary vehicles over their uneven surfaces. As cars are heavier than ordinary vehicles, and there is less resistance to their motion, their momentum is not so easily controlled, and causes more serious consequences when they come in collision with objects. Being confined to a fixed track, they cannot be turned aside to avoid collision. They have a tendency to frighten horses, especially when propelled by steam or electricity. The legislature was aware of these facts, and they are competent evidence upon the question of the legislative intent expressed by the charter. They show that there is greater necessity for limiting the speed of cars than for limiting that of ordinary vehicles. In view of them, it is highly improbable that the legislature intended to release the defendants from all restraint as to speed, even temporarily. If the general law does not apply to the defendants, they may drive their cars at any rate of speed, however great, until the mayor and aldermen establish regulations for their government, while a person riding upon horseback or in a carriage cannot drive across, along, or in the vicinity of their tracks at a swifter pace than 5 miles an hour, without subjecting himself to liability to be fined or imprisoned. Such inequality would be arbitrary and unreasonable.

NOTE.—The above case is thought to be the first one decided as to the application to street cars of a general provision as to the speed allowed for riding on a street.

As to speed of electric cars in general, see Newark Pass. R. Co. v. Bloch (N. J.) 22 L. R. A. 374.

The speed at which the defendants may drive cars without endangering the safety of other travelers depends somewhat upon the width and character of the streets and the extent and nature of travel over them. Recognizing this fact, and the further fact that the mayor and aldermen, from their knowledge of the streets and travel, are well qualified to judge of the speed allowable within the limits of safety, the legislature delegated to them authority "to make all such regulations as to rate of speed and the mode of use of the railway as the public safety and convenience may require." Com. v. Temple, 14 Gray, 69, 74. This is in accordance with a policy adopted in this state when the first street-railway charter was granted, and which has been generally adhered to in the enactment of later charters. Laws 1864, chap. 3080, § 5; Laws 1878, chap. 118, § 4; Laws 1881, chap. 251, § 4; Laws 1889, chap. 178, § 8; Id. chap. 218, § 4; Id. chap. 241, § 8; Laws 1891, chap. 258, § 5; Id. chap. 298, § 5; Laws 1893, chap. 250, § 4. "This control is given to these municipal officers, not as representing a conflicting interest, but as independent bodies charged with the duty of protecting the rights and promoting the convenience of the whole public." Union R. Co. v. Cambridge, 11 Allen, 287, 292; Cambridge R. Co. 10 Allen, 50, 57. The legislature intended that the mayor and aldermen should take the subject up where they left it; that is, with the general law in force and applicable to the defendants. If the mayor and aldermen find that no additional or different regulations are required, they need not act; but if they find the public safety and convenience require that the defendants shall run their cars at a less rate of speed than 5 miles an hour, or that they shall take precautions of any kind to avoid injury to travelers, they are authorized to make regulations accordingly. After the adoption of regulations the defendants would be governed by the statute as modified by the regulations. Cooley, Const. Lim. 198; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 368; Rogers v. Jones, 1 Wend. 237, 19 Am. Dec. 498; State v. Welch, 86 Conn. 215; State v. Clarke, 54 Mo. 17, 14 Am. Rep. 471; State v. Hayes, 61 N. H. 264; School Dist. No. 1 v. Prentiss, 66 N. H. 145, 146.

The suggestion that this law has no more application to the defendants than the law requiring travelers meeting in a highway to turn to the right (Gen. Laws, chap. 75, § 11) has not been overlooked. It is apparent that the latter law does not apply to street railways, for it would disable them from exercising the rights which the legislature has granted them. Com. v. Temple, 14 Gray, 69, 78. But the application of the speed law to them does not have that effect. On the other hand, it produces the result in respect to street railways that it was designed to produce in respect to other travelers. It protects, to some extent at least, the lives and limbs of those who have occasion to use the highways in common with the railway corporations. While it cannot be supposed that the legislature intended to disable the defendants from exercising the rights granted to them by requiring them to do an impracticable thing, it is reasonable to suppose that they did intend to require the defendants to regulate the speed of their cars so as to avoid, as much as practicable, the great danger caused by them to other travelers.

It is also suggested that there is the same reason for applying the speed law to steam railroads when crossing highways at grade. The law may have had such application before the enactment of Laws 1850, chap. 965, § 1, which provided "that no railroad corporation shall run their engine, cars, or train across any public highway in or near the compact part of any town or city in this state at a greater speed than 6 miles per hour." If the Law of 1792 previously applied to steam railroads, this section excepted them from its operation. It imposed the same restraint upon them while crossing highways as the Act of 1792 did upon travelers who use highways in the ordinary manner, except that the maximum rate of speed was 6, instead of 5, miles an hour. It was re-enacted from time to time until 1889, when it was repealed and the matter was committed to the railroad commissioners for regulation. Laws 1889, chap. 90. In the meantime an act was passed requiring railroad corporations to maintain warning signs at every grade crossing over a highway at which there were no gates or flagmen, and to cause the locomotive whistle to be sounded and the bell to be rung when approaching crossings. Laws 1885, chap. 98, §§ 1-4. In the absence of regulations by the railroad commissioners, travelers upon highways have some protection from these warnings. The legislation on this subject shows a disposition to impose restraints upon other occupants of highways, as well as upon ordinary travelers, for the safety and convenience of all. It is far from being inconsistent with the view taken of the law under consideration.

It does not appear that the mayor and aldermen have made any regulations concerning the speed of the defendants' cars. They may have decided that the public safety and convenience do not require any regulation in addition to the general law. If so, there was no occasion for them to act. It was incumbent on the party alleging that they have made regulations to prove the allegation. Upon the facts disclosed in the case, the general law is applicable to the defendants the same as to other travelers. This law was competent evidence on the question of the defendants' negligence. State v. Boston & M. R. Co. 58 N. H. 408; Nutter v. Boston & M. R. Co. 60 N. H. 483; Clark v. Boston & M. R. Co. 64 N. H. 823; Wright v. Malden & M. R. Co. 4 Allen, 238; Hanlon v. South Boston Horse R. Co. 139 Mass. 310.

APPEAL by defendant, Maria J. Fisher, from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, rendered in favor of plaintiff upon a statement of facts submitted without action for the opinion of the court to determine the right to the possession of certain real estate. Modified.

Statement by Andrews, Ch. J. :

Appeal from judgment of the general term, fourth department, on submission of controversy without action under section 1279 of the Code, stating substantially the following facts: The defendants are, and for the past thirty years and upwards have been, husband and wife. On or about the 22d of March, 1866, the defendants, by a deed to them as husband and wife, took title to a farm of about 44 acres in the town of Dryden, Tompkins county, N. Y., which they have ever since occupied and possessed as their home under said deed with no other title. This deed runs to "William R. Fisher, of the town, county, and state aforesaid, and Maria J. Fisher, his wife," and the consideration therein stated is $3,000. It was duly recorded on the 9th of May, 1866. The purchase price was wholly paid by the wife, who, however, consented to the form of the deed as taken by them. On or about March 31, 1885, the defendant William R. Fisher borrowed of the plaintiff $1,400, for which he and his wife gave their promissory note. On or about February 20, 1886, William R. Fisher, to secure the payment of this debt to plaintiff, and other small amounts of borrowed money, amounting then altogether to $1,550, executed and delivered to one Goodrich, for plaintiff, a mortgage in the usual form, granting and conveying the said 44 acres, and conditioned for the payment of $1,550, one half in one year and balance in two years, with interest at 5 per cent annually. This mortgage was dated and acknowledged February 20, 1886, and was immediately assigned to plaintiff. It was recorded August 5, 1890. Fisher, of the money which he borrowed of plaintiff, used $1,000 in part payment for 85 acres of land in the same town, the title to which he had taken in his own name. At the time the mortgage was given, the plaintiff knew that the wife's money paid for the 44 acres, and that she refused to sign the mortgage, but he supposed that William R. Fisher held the title, and the wife had only her dower right therein, and he therefore said that the mortgage was good enough without her signature, and so took it; and he told the defendants that he did not calculate that William R. Fisher should ever pay the mortgage; that he calculated to give it to him by his will, and all he wanted was the interest while he lived. The description in the mortgage was copied from the deed, which was present when the mortgage was executed and delivered. On the 3d of September, 1890, William R. Fisher conveyed to Maria J. Fisher both of said parcels of land by quitclaim deed recorded that day. Default was made in the payment of interest on the mortgage, and it was duly foreclosed by statutory foreclosure, and on the sale thereunder, which occurred February 6, 1892, the premises were bid in by the plaintiff for the sum of $500, the amount then unpaid on the mortgage being $1,863.37, besides the expense of foreclosure, thereby vesting in plaintiff the entire fee so far as the mortgagor could lawfully have conveyed at the date of the mortgage under the same circumstances. Notice of the foreclosure was duly served on both defendants. Mrs. Fisher thereafter, and before the sale, commenced an action in the supreme court against the plaintiff and said Goodrich and her husband, asking that the mortgage be declared void as to her, and be set aside as a cloud upon her title, and that the foreclosure of the mortgage be restrained. A temporary injunction was obtained, but vacated by the court upon the papers upon which it was granted. On the foreclosure sale Mrs. Fisher gave notice of her claims. After the sale the plaintiff

I. Definition.

An estate by entireties is an estate held by husband and wife together so long as both live, and, after the death of either, by the survivor so long as the estate lasts.

In the old English reports tenancy by entireties is always called joint tenancy, and is regarded as a species of joint tenancy with peculiar incidents. So, enactments of a beneficial character respecting joint tenancy have been held to include tenancy by entireties (Morris v. McCarthy, 158 Mass. 11 (1898); Marburg v. Cole, 49 Md. 402, 38 Am. Rep. 206 (1878)); but the phrase "joint tenancy" in a statute has not generally been thus extended.

Although the wife's freehold was, prior to the married women's property acts, held by both spouses in right of the wife, the decisions by which its incidents are regulated have not generally been held precedents for estates by entireties.

By the common law, when land was conveyed to husband and wife they did not take as tenants in common, or as joint tenants, but each became seized of the entirety per tout, en non per my, and upon the death of either the whole survived to the other. The survivor took the estate, not by right of survivorship simply, but by virtue of the grant which vested the entire estate in each grantee. During the joint lives the husband could, for his own benefit, use, possess, and control the land, and take all the profits thereof, and he could mortgage and convey an estate to continue during the joint lives, but he could not make any disposition of the land that would prejudice the right of his wife in case she survived him. Bertles v. Nunan, 32 N. Y. 152, 44 Am. Rep. 361.

This estate, created by conveyance to husband and wife, is a peculiar one. The interest of the grantees is not joint, nor in common. The parties do not hold moieties, but take as one person, taking as a corporation would take; they have but one title; each is seized of the whole, and each owns the whole. If one dies, the estate continues in the survivor, the same as if one of several corporators dies. It does not descend upon the death of either, but the longest liver, being already seized of the entire estate, is the owner of it. One tenant by entirety cannot sever the tenancy by deed, as a joint tenant can, for neither can alien so as to bind the other. Corinth v. Emery, 38 Vt. 505.

II. Who can hold this estate.

Husband and wife may hold by entireties. This is so in all cases even though their marriage is voidable on account of some invalidity in its inception—as appears from the cases cited on the subject of divorce. But see infra, as to void marriages.

And though they be not described in the conveyance at husband and wife. Chandler v. Cheney, 37 Ind. 391 (1871); Hulett v. Inlow, 37 Ind. 412, 25 Am. Rep. 64 (1877).

And though one or both of them be aliens. Wright v. Saddler, 20 N. Y. 320 (1859).

And this last point holds in New York notwithstanding the proviso in the Revised Statutes, 720, § 17; for that proviso merely restricts the operation of the previous sections, and, where they are inapplicable, leaves the common law in force. Ibid.

But this power of aliens to take remains subject to the right of the Crown or state to seize where that right still exists. Ibid.

But they cannot take by entireties when they take the estate at different times,—as, when a person who holds jointly with one of the spouses conveys his interest to the other. Lane v. Pannell, 1 Rolle, Rep. 317, 438 (1616).

Or when a person who holds in common with one of them conveys his share to the other. Banzer v. Banzer, 10 Misc. 24 (1894). In both these cases they are tenants in common with one another.

This rule against taking at different times does not extend to limitations of trust or use.

Persons who are not legally husband and wife cannot take by entireties, even though the conveyance was made to them in anticipation of their intermarrying. Symond's Case, F. Moore, 93 (1538); Ward v. Matthew, Noy, 123 (1496); Brent's Case, 3 duly demanded possession of each of the defendants, and they severally refused to deliver the same, and now withhold it. Upon these facts the plaintiff claimed the right to recover the premises, with the right to hold the same during the joint lives of the husband and wife, and in fee in case the husband survives the wife. The defendant Mrs. Fisher claims that the mortgage, not having been signed by her, was void, and that, Mr. Fisher's interest having been conveyed to her, she is the absolute owner; that by reason of her having paid for the property she is equitable owner of the whole; that, in any event, she is entitled to the possession during the joint lives of herself and husband, and to the fee in case she survives. The general term rendered judgment adjudging that by the sale under the mortgage the plaintiff acquired the right of possession of the whole property during the joint lives of Mr. and Mrs. Fisher, and to the fee in case the husband survived the wife.

Messrs. Smith & Dickinson, for appellant:

The precise question in this case has never been passed upon in this state on a full argument.

Bertles v. Nunan, 93 N. Y. 152, 44 Am. Rep. 361, came the nearest to the decision of these questions, and yet in that case the court of appeals declined to decide them.

Dyer, 340a (1536); Brabroke's Case, F. Moore, 95 (1523) (which last was compromised on error, and was a limitation to the use of A and of such woman as he might marry; McDermott v. French, 15 N. J. Eq. 73 (1862) (dictum).

And though they are described in the conveyance as husband and wife. Chandler v. Cheney, 37 Ind. 391 (1871) (dictum).

But the contrary was held in Jacobs v. Miller, 50 Mich. 119 (1883), under circumstances stated below.

So, though the limitation was merely equitable, being by way of use before the statute of uses. Bedyl v. Holstoke, 3 Dyer, 149b (1557); Fulcambe v. Linacre, 1 And. 303 (1522), cited in 3 Dyer, 149b (1557); Morgan v. Wharton, cited in 3 Dyer, 149b (1557).

Nor though they were living as husband and wife, and were believed by themselves and by the grantor to be so, and had gone through the marriage ceremony, which was invalid only because the former husband of the woman was still living. Morris v. McCarty, 158 Mass. 11 (1893).

Nor though the limitation was expressly to them as tenants by entireties and not as joint tenants, in which case they nevertheless take as joint tenants. Ibid.

And such a limitation will, under these circumstances, make them joint tenants notwithstanding an enactment that a conveyance shall be deemed to create a tenancy in common, unless it manifestly appears to have been intended to create a joint tenancy. Ibid.

Similar circumstances existed in Jacobs v. Miller, 50 Mich. 119 (1883), where the marriage was invalid because the supposed husband had a wife living. The only question was whether survivorship had taken place. The decision was grounded on the theory that a purchaser without notice of the defect in the title was safe because he could only be ousted by oral evidence of the fact that the parties were not husband and wife, they having been described as such in the deed. This theory seems untenable, for the defense of purchaser without notice

Justice Macomber, in O'Connor v. McMahon, 54 Hun, 69, said, under the common-law rule, while he receives with one hand the rents and profits of the real estate so held, he is by the same common-law rule required with the other to dispense the same, or so much thereof as is necessary to the support and maintenance of his wife and family, which was not done in this instance.

See also Chandler v. Cheney, 37 Ind. 391; Stelts v. Schreck, 60 Hun, 74.

Dicta have been acted upon and cited as authority in subsequent cases, and an apparent common law has been constructed without any real foundation.

Barber v. Harris, 15 Wend. 615; Jackson v. McConnell, 19 Wend. 175; Bennett v. Child, 19 Wis. 362, 38 Am. Dec. 692.

That the husband alone cannot give a mortgage of such interest, has been held in other states on full consideration.

Chandler v. Cheney, supra; Ketchum v. Wainworth, 5 Wis. 95, 68 Am. Dec. 49.

In Morrison v. Seybold, 93 Ind. 398, it was held that where property is held by them by the entirety the property is not subject to a lien for taxes on his personal estate.

Hulett v. Inlow, 57 Ind. 412, 26 Am. Rep. 64, held that the property thus held cannot be sold for the husband's debts.

See also Adams v. State, 58 Ind. 66; McConnell v. Martin, 53 Ind. 486; Bertles v. Nunan and Stelts v. Schreck, supra.

It does not avail against a legal, but only against an equitable, title, and oral evidence is always admitted to correct a misdescription of person or property. (See Chandler v. Cheney, 37 Ind. 391 (1871), and Dowling v. Salliotte, 83 Mich. 184 (1890) on this point.) Still more is such evidence admissible when the object is, not to explain the intention, but to prevent it taking effect.

Nor does their subsequent intermarriage make them tenants by entireties; but they continued to be joint tenants or tenants in common, as they were before. Symond's Case, F. Moore, 92 (1536); La Reigne v. Savage, F. Moore, 715 (1591) (where they were joint tenants); Ward v. Matthews, Noy, 122 (1496); Co. Litt. 187b; Ames v. Norman, 4 Sneed, 686, 70 Am. Dec. 299 (1897) (dictum); admitted, Stuckey v. Keefe, 26 Pa. 397 (1856).

Even though the limitation was made in contemplation of the marriage which immediately afterward took effect. Moody v. Moody, Ambli. 649 (1707).

Nor even as regards a legal estate transferred to them by a statute passed after the marriage, if they already held the equitable estate otherwise than by entireties, and if the statute transfers the estate in the same manner in which they held the use. Morgan v. Wharton, cited in 3 Dyer, 149b (1557); Symond's Case, F. Moore, 92 (1536).

So, in Holt v. Wilson, 75 Ala. 65 (1893), the woman, being entitled absolutely to one undivided half of the land and contingently to the other, contracted with her intended husband that, if the marriage should take effect and the contingency should happen, he should have the latter share "jointly and equally" with her, and after both events had taken place he was held to be tenant in common with her.

The decision in Mutton's Case, 3 Dyer, 274b (1568), dealt only with the question of survivorship, and not with the distinction between entirety and joint tenancy.

But a recovery in value of lands after marriage to satisfy a warranty given to them jointly before,

This estate of the husband during coverture has probably been abolished by separate property acts, even where these acts are held not to destroy estates by entireties.

The chief purpose of the separate property acts passed in all states where the common law once prevailed was to free the property of wives from the marital rights of their husbands, and this estate jure uxoris is now almost universally abolished.

A husband has no interest in either the fee or the usufruct of real estate deeded to him and wife jointly which can be taken in execution for his sole debts.

III. Nature of the interest of each spouse.

a. The interest of the husband during the joint lifetime at common law.

Under limitations carrying entirety estates before the married women's property acts the husband has the possession and control so long as both spouses live. Beach v. Hollister, 3 Hun, 519, 5 Thomp. & C. 568 (1875); Kip v. Kip, 33 N. J. Eq. 213 (1880); Washburn v. Burns, 34 N. J. L. 13 (1880); Hall v. Stephens, 65 Mo. 679, 27 Am. Rep. 302 (1877); Den, Wyckoff, v. Gardner, 20 N. J. L. 556, 45 Am. Dec. 388 (1846); Fogleman v. Shively, 4 Ind. App. 197 (1892) (dictum).

And this applies to a personal annuity equitably charged on land. Gifford v. Rising, 55 Hun, 61 (1899).

And he may use the estate for his own benefit during that period. Bertles v. Nunan, 12 Abb. N. C. 291, 68 N. Y. 152, 44 Am. Rep. 361 (1883), cases cited; Beach v. Hollister, 3 Hun, 531, 5 Thomp. & C. 568 (1875).

And he is absolute owner of the rents and profits. Clapp v. Stoughton, 10 Pick. 463 (1830); admitted in Cole Mfg. Co. v. Collier (Tenn.) post, 315 (1896).

And the wife has no interest in or control over the property during that period. Boile v. State Trust Co. 27 N. J. Eq. 308 (1878); Fogleman v. Shively, supra.

And this rule holds good though the limitation was to a trustee to permit the husband and wife to reside on the land. Kip v. Kip supra.

And, as a consequence, the husband can, without the wife's concurrence, serve an effectual notice on tenants from year to year to quit. Pollak v. Kelly, 6 Ir. C. L. Rep. 378 (1856).—where the ejectment was brought by both spouses.

In Indiana an opposite rule prevails, it being held, in conformity with what the court conceived to be the common law, but in admitted contradiction to the rule prevailing in case of the wife's estate, that both spouses have an equal indivisible right. Chandler v. Cheney, 37 Ind. 391 (1871).

The same doctrine seems to prevail in Michigan, since the corresponding rule respecting alienation by the husband has been adopted there. See infra, X. b, 2.

The products of the land when severed are subject to the law regulating the personal chattels of the spouses. Simonton v. Cornelius, 98 N. C. 438 (1887).

See further, infra, X. as to Dispositions.

b. The interests of the spouses during the joint lifetime since the married women's property acts.

It has been found convenient to group the law on this subject with that relating to the question in what states entirety still exists. See, therefore, infra, VI. a.

c. Right of the spouses and their representatives to emblements at common law.

The holder of an estate which terminates at an uncertain time without his will or act, and the representatives of the holder of an estate which after his death so terminates, are entitled to take, at maturity, any annual crops which he may have sown during his tenure. Litt. 68; Co. Litt. 55r.

Representatives of a joint tenant or tenant by entireties, who dies before his cotenant, seem to have a similar privilege, although in this case the estate does not cease but continues in the survivor.

In Arnold v. Skeale, Noy, 149 (1449), the court was equally divided on this question.

In 3 Dyer, 316a (2); Co. Litt. 55b; Vin. Abr. Emblements, A, 16 (obiter), the point is regarded as doubtful.

Mr. S. D. Halliday, with Mr. George E. Goodrich, for respondent:
Defendants took title in 1866 as tenants by the entirety.

Bertles v. Nunan, 92 N. Y. 153, 44 Am. Rep. 361; Miner v. Brown, 133 N. Y. 308.

The fact that the wife paid the purchase money makes no difference.

Ward v. Krumm, 54 How. Pr. 95.

The plaintiff's mortgage and his purchase upon the foreclosure sale under it covered the husband's title, which included the exclusive use and control of the premises during the joint lives of defendants, and the remainder in fee in case the husband survives his wife.

In the case of Meeker v. Wright, 76 N. Y. 271, Judge Danforth says: "If . . . they, by virtue of it [the deed], became tenants by the entirety, then by the common law Samuel Daily [the husband] had the right to alienate in fee his share subject only to the wife's right of survivorship and the further right to sell, lease, or mortgage the entire property for the joint lien of himself and his wife."

The common-law rights of husband and wife as tenants by the entirety still prevail unchanged by the statutes in any respect.

Inasmuch as by the unity of the persons in law they take by entireties and the husband is entitled in his own right to the entirety during his life, the wife will have no equity to a settlement out of any part of the property.

The rents which accrue from the wife's real estate during coverture are absolute property of the husband and in case of his decease do not survive to the wife, but are assets in the hands of the husband's administrator and must be collected by him.

Courts strongly oppose any innovation upon the common-law doctrine of tenancy by the entirety.

Wright v. Saddler, 20 N. Y. 320; Torrey v. Torrey, 14 N. Y. 480.

In 8 Lfb. Ass. 21, it is stated that the legatee or assignee of the deceased husband would have had good title to the crops, but in an action to which his executor was not a party damages were adjudged to the surviving wife against his heir who had carried them away.

And in Anonymous, 8 Edw. III. T. T. pl. 46, the judge similarly directed the jury.

In Oland v. Burdwick, 2 Cro. Eliz. 460, F. Moore, 304 (1695), the representatives of the deceased husband were held entitled to emblements out of the entirety property. This case was observed upon in Cro. Eliz. case 3.

In Rowney's Case, 2 Vern. 222 (1694), the court thought otherwise.

Light may be cast on the question by the decisions relative to the wife's estate.

In Bennett v. Bennett, 34 Ala. 53 (1859), the court following Weems v. Bryan, 21 Ala. 302 (1853), but doubting its correctness on principle, held the husband's representatives entitled to emblements out of the wife's estate.

The following old authorities are sometimes cited, but none of them relate to entirety estates, although some have reference to the wife's estate; 46 Lfb. Ass. 2; 7 Lfb. Ass. pl. 13; 10 Lfb. In Indiana crops raised by the husband on entirety land belong to both spouses by entireties. Patton v. Rankin, 68 Ind. 245, 34 Am. Rep. 254 (1879). But this seems to refer to crops still growing.

He cannot transfer a crop sown by her on the entirety land while he is living elsewhere separated from her. O'Connor v. McMahon, 54 Hun, 66 (1883). See also, as to rents and profits, supra, III. a.

d. Husband's right to compensation for improvements.

The husband is presumed to have intended any improvements which he may have made in the entirety property as a gift to the wife.

And since the married women's acts it is probable 30 L. R. A.

that a corresponding presumption would be made in case of an improvement by the wife.

But compensation granted by the legislature to whomsoever may make certain improvements belongs to the spouse by whom or at whose expense they were made, and therefore to the husband where he makes them on his wife's property (see Davids v. Harris, 2 Pa. (1848)), and presumably, therefore, when he makes them on entirety property.

e. Husband's right to commit waste.

No case has been found respecting the husband's right to commit waste on the entirety property, save that in Kip v. Kip, 33 N. J. Eq. 213 (1880) (which was decided on a point of pleading), it was admitted that he had no right to sell timber trees growing on entirety land. But the following relative to his right to commit waste on the wife's property may cast light on the subject. His wife could not sue him for waste committed by himself personally (Davis v. Gilliam, 5 Ired. Eq. 306 (1848); Babb v. Perley, 1 Me. 6 (1820)); but probably she may under any statute authorizing her to bring actions against him. He could not grant to another a right to commit waste (Davis v. Gilliam), nor could he dispose of her trees uncultivated during his lifetime (11 Hen. IV. 32, pl. 59, cited in Hales v. Pettit, 1 Plowd. 253 (1562)); and much less could he confer on another a right to take them after his death. Stroebe v. Fehl, 22 Wis. 337 (1867). Yet it is the better opinion that he may cut down trees on her wild land with a view to immediate cultivation, but not otherwise. Id. 346.

f. Husband's right to estovers.

This right would presumably not be less than on the wife's land. On the latter he might cut wood for fencing, mending, etc. Stroebe v. Fehl, 22 Wis. 337 (1867).

g. Right of either spouse to sue for wrongs to the entirety property.

The concurrence of both spouses was necessary in an action for a wrong to the wife's property and affecting the inheritance, before the married women's acts. Van Note v. Downey, 23 N. J. L. 219

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It was decided in Bertles v. Nunan, 92 N. Y. 152, 44 Am. Rep. 861, that the separate property acts relating to the rights of married women had not abrogated the common-law doctrine; that under a conveyance to husband and wife they take, not as tenants in common, nor as joint tenants, but by the entirety, and upon the death of either the survivor takes the whole estate. In that case the husband had died, leaving his wife surviving, and the question was whether the wife, as survivor, took upon the death of her husband the entire fee under the doctrine of the common law. The question, what change, if any, had been wrought by the separate property acts in respect to the common-law rights of the husband to control and use the property conveyed to husband and wife, during their joint lives, was not considered or decided, but was expressly reserved, on the ground that it was not involved in the case then before the court. That question is involved in the present case, and must now be decided. The decision in Bertles v. Nunan is supported by the great weight of authority in other jurisdictions in this country, but in some of the states it has been held that, as a consequence of statutory provisions substantially like those in this state, conferring upon married women the right to take and hold separate property to their own use, free from the control of their husbands, as femes sole, estates by entireties have been abrogated, and turned into tenancies in common. In the states where this construction has been put upon the married women's acts, the question of the rights of the parties to the usufruct during their joint lives could scarcely arise, because it is one of the generally admitted results of this legislation that the common-law right vested in the husband to the rents, profits, and use of his wife's real estate during their joint lives has been destroyed.

It is, however, a much more serious question what the effect of this legislation is upon the common-law right of the husband to the usufruct during the joint lives of the husband and wife, of lands conveyed to them jointly, in those states where it is held that, notwithstanding new legislation, a conveyance to husband and wife retains its common-law character and incidents. If the right of the husband to the use during the joint lives of lands held under this tenure was a right growing out of and incident to this particular species of tenancy,—in other words, if it was one of its specific and essential characteristics,—then it would be difficult to segregate this right from the other rights incident to and flowing from the tenancy, and to say that, while the estate by entireties con-

(1890); Chancey v. Strong, 2 Root, 399 (1790); Shaw v. Partridge, 17 Vt. 626 (1845); Dold v. Geiger, 2 Gratt. 98 (1846).

And the same rule applies to entirety property. Harrer v. Wallner, 80 Ill. 208 (1875).

But the husband might have brought an ejectment on his sole demise, because he could have made a lease of her land for a period not exceeding the joint lifetime. And consequently he might do this to recover entirety property in a state where power to alienate the entirety estate for the period of the joint lifetime is recognized (as to which see infra, X. b. 3); Jackson, Suffern v. McConnell, 19 Wend. 175 (1836); Topping v. Sadler, 5 Jones, L. 357 (1858); Park v. Pratt, 38 Vt. 545 (1866), in which last case the court, pp. 550, 551, seems to ground its decision on general principles irrespective of this distinction.

And he may sue alone for a wrong done to personal chattels which have vested in him by marital right, even though they were trees which before severance grew on the entirety land. Fairchild v. Chastelleux, 1 Pa. 176, 44 Am. Dec. 117 (1845), where the action was not for cutting the trees but for carrying them away.

And he may sue alone for injuries to land which he is farming, though it belongs to her, seemingly on the ground that he stands in the position of a tenant. Alexander v. Hard, 64 N. Y. 228 (1876). This would probably hold since the married women's acts.

The concurrence of the wife was not necessary in an action for a wrong done to her property, but affecting the possession only, and therefore injuring the husband's interest only. Van Note v. Downey, supra, and other cases above cited. This would hold as regards entirety estates acquired before the married women's acts in states where the husband's life interest is recognized.

And he was held entitled to sue alone for expenses incurred by him in remedying a wrong to the inheritance, presumably because when remedied it no longer injured the inheritance. Demby 80 L. R. A.

v. Kingston, 60 Hun, 294 (1891), affirmed, 138 N. Y. 538 (1892).

In Maine the husband is disabled by statute from suing alone for injuries to his wife's property. Bradford v. Hansoom, 68 Me. 103 (1878).

The right of action for a wrong done to an entirety property acquired since the married women's acts would, of course, depend upon the effect attributed to the act. In states where there is an entirety of estate these acts do not affect the question and independently of them both spouses must (it is presumed) concur in all cases. Where each takes, under the acts, a half share in fee, each (it would seem), may sue alone and recover half the damage suffered. Where each takes a half share for the joint lifetime, and the survivor takes all, each (it is conceived) may sue alone for an injury to the possession, and they must sue jointly for an injury to the inheritance.

But the wife can sue alone to restrain an intended act injurious to the entirety inheritance if the defendants have acquired a right as against the husband to commit it,—as, to restrain a municipality from constructing a sewer through the entirety property, which they had, by the necessary formalities and by payment of money into court, acquired as against the husband the right to construct. Grosser v. Rochester, 80 Hun, 373, 380 (1891).

And probably either spouse would have a similar right if the other refused to concur.

IV. Survivorship of one of the spouses after the death (actual or civil) of the other.

The spouse surviving acquires the whole entirety estate (Arnold v. Arnold, 30 Ind. 305 (1868); Barnes v. Loyd, 37 Ind. 623 (1871); Falls v. Hawthorn, 30 Ind. 444 (1868); Den, Needham v. Branson, 5 Ired. L. 426, 44 Am. Dec. 451 (1845); Den, Motley v. Whitmore, 2 Dev. & B. L. 537 (1837); Garner v. Jones, 52 Mo. 68 (1873); Margarie de Mose's Case, cited in Co. Litt. 132a, (1291); Robinson v. Eagle, 29 Ark. 202 (1874); Rogers v. Grider, 1 Dana, 242 (1833)), whether the death be actual, as in most of the above cases, tinues, this feature of it was intended to be taken away. But the taking away from the husband the usufruct during the joint lives of lands conveyed to husband and wife would not be inconsistent with the continuance of tenancies by entireties, provided the common-law right to the usufruct was not an incident of the tenancy, but of the marital right, operating upon property so held as upon all other real property of the wife. The grand characteristic which distinguishes a tenancy by the entirety from a joint tenancy is its inseverability, whereby neither the husband nor the wife, without the assent of the other, can dispose of any part of the estate so as to affect the right of survivorship in the other. 1 Bl. Com. 182; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 425. Each is said to be seised of the whole estate, and they do not take by moieties, and the reason assigned in the old books for this anomalous characteristic of this estate is the legal unity of the husband and wife, and the incapacity of the wife to hold a separate and severable estate in lands under a joint conveyance to both. The alleged incapacity of a wife to take and hold lands conveyed to husband and wife as joint tenant or tenant in common with him seems inconsistent with the doctrine which has finally obtained,—that by express words of a grant or devise to husband and wife that species of tenure would be created. This was pointed out in Miner v. Brown, 133 N. Y. 308, and authorities were cited to show that, where the intention disclosed by the deed or will was to create a tenancy in common, that estate would be created. See also McDermott v. French, 15 N. J. Eq. 78; Wales v. Coffin, 13 Allen, 218; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 425. There is a tendency now to regard the creation of an estate by the entirety as resting upon a rule of construction rather than upon a rule of law, and to regard the intention as disclosed by the deed or will creating it as the governing rule for determining whether that estate was created rather than a joint tenancy or tenancy in common. See Re March, L. R. 27 Ch. Div. 166, and cases before cited. It was conceded under the old law that husband and wife, who were joint tenants or tenants in common of lands before marriage, remained so afterwards. Co. Litt. 187b. It would seem to follow that there was no general incapacity in the wife to hold lands with the husband in joint tenancy or as tenant in common. The quality of the estate held by husband and wife as tenants by the entirety, in the aspect of its inseverability, has been adverted to. But it is important, in view of the subsequent discussion, to observe that the wife, as well as the husband, took an estate under a grant to both. Each was said to be seised of the whole, and not of any separate part. Neither could convey his or or civil, as banishment. Margarie de Mose's Case, supra. See also Wright v. Wright, 2 Desaus. Eq. 242 (1804), and Troughton v. Hill, 2 Hayw. (N. C.) 426 (1806), where cases which do not relate to entirety are cited from 2 Vern. 104, and 2 Bos. & P. 226. And this holds, though the estate was the gift of the parent of the spouse first dying. Barnes v. Loyd, Garner v. Jones, and Robinson v. Eagle, supra.

And though the wife surviving accepted dower out of the estate as if it had been her husband's,—at least under the special circumstances of Falls v. Hawthorn, 30 Ind. 444 (1868).

And (as against the husband's representatives and creditors) though she has brought a partition suit on the supposition that the property was her husband's, and has accepted a purparty allotted to her in that suit. Simpson v. Pearson, 31 Ind. 1, 99 Am. Dec. 577 (1860).

And though she and her husband had represented to one who was about to lend him money that both were interested in the estate, for such a statement will not be held to imply that they owned it in abarea. Gardonier v. Furey, 50 Hun, 62 (1888).

But the bringing of a partition suit and accepting of a purparty as above would bar her rights as against a party to the suit, or any one who was deceived by the partition. Simpson v. Pearson, supra (dictum).

This survivorship is not a species of inheritance from the spouse first dying nor included in the laws regulating inheritance. Barnes v. Loyd, supra; Taul v. Campbell, 7 Yerg. 330, 27 Am. Dec. 508 (1853).

Hence, a clause in an inheritance act entitling the half blood to inherit does not entitle the heirs of the spouse first dying, who are of half blood to the heirs of the spouse last dying, but are merely step-children of the spouse last dying, to inherit from the last-mentioned spouse. Barnes v. Loyd, supra. (The clause would entitle the step-brothers and step-sisters of the spouse last dying to inherit.)

equivalent to his civil death. For example, it did not preclude him, before the married women's acts, from giving valid receipts for rents due out of her property. Haralson v. Bridges, 14 Ill. 87 (1852).

A widow entitled by survivorship to entirety property in a state where homestead laws prevail cannot be compelled to accept homestead rights instead (Chambers v. Chambers, 93 Tenn. 707 (1898);) nor is she entitled to do so. Ibid. (dictum).

A spouse entitled by survivorship to a rent charge held by entireties is entitled also to arrears thereof unpaid at the death of the other spouse. Temple v. Temple, Cro. Eliz. 791 (1601); Browne v. Dunnery, Hob. 208 (1617), Brownl. pt. 1, p. 171 (1618).

The spouse surviving takes discharged from all encumbrances and partial interests created by the spouse first dying. See infra.

Yet a widow could confirm a lease made by her husband of her property (Brown v. Lindsay, 2 Hill, Eq. 542, Riley, Eq. 97 (1837)), and therefore, presumably, of the entirety property.

And she may maintain an action for waste against a tenant holding under a lease made by her and her husband jointly (21 Hen. VI., 24 C. pt. 5 (dictum),) and therefore, presumably, against a tenant holding under a lease made by him alone which she has confirmed.

Yet in Kip v. Kip, 33 N. J. Eq. 215 (1880), she was held not entitled to share in the purchase money arising from a sale by her husband alone of the entirety property, but merely to hold or claim possession against the purchaser.

And a widow succeeding by survivorship to a life estate which she and her husband held by entireties, and accepting and occupying the estate after his death, is responsible to the reversioner for waste committed by her husband in his lifetime (21 Hen. VI. 24 B. pt. 5 (dictum), where the negative is omitted before the word "occupy." It is supplied in Brooke, Abr. Barre. 27).

The spouse surviving also takes discharged from all encumbrances and transmissions by act of law from the spouse first dying.

her interest to the prejudice of the right of survivorship in the other. The common law, however, wholly ignored this principle of equality between husband and wife in regulating the rights of the parties to the enjoyment of the estate during the joint lives. They were not regarded as having a joint seisin or a joint possession for the purpose of the use during coverture. The husband was held to be entitled to the full control, and to take the rents and profits of the land, during the joint lives, to the exclusion of the wife; and he had power to sell, mortgage, or lease for the same period; and this life interest was, according to the weight of authority, subject to the claims of his creditors. Barber v. Harris, 15 Wend. 615; Jackson v. McConnell, 19 Wend. 175; Meeker v. Wright, 78 N. Y. 262; Bertles v. Nunan, supra; Ames v. Norman, 4 Sneed, 688, 70 Am. Dec. 269; Pray v. Stebbins, 141 Mass. 219, 55 Am. Rep. 462. But the right of the husband at common law to take the rents and profits of lands held by him and his wife as tenants by the entirety, during coverture, and to assign and dispose of them during that period, did not, we apprehend, spring from the peculiar nature of this estate. He acquired no such right by force of the conveyance itself, and it was not an incident thereto. It was a right which followed the conveyance and inured to the husband from the general principle of the common law which vested in the husband, jure uxoris, the rents and profits of his wife's lands during their joint lives. 3 Kent, Com. 130; Stewart, Husb. & W. § 308. The husband took the rents and profits of lands held in entirety upon the same right that he took the rents and profits of her other real estate, whether held by a sole or joint title, namely, his right as husband. In none of the definitions of tenancies by entireties have we found any suggestion that this was one of the incidents or characteristics of such estates, and we think it is plain, both upon reason and analogy, that it had its origin in those harsh principles of common law which destroyed for most purposes the legal identity of the wife, and subjected her person and property to the control of her husband.

In considering what effect, if any, the legislation in this state has had upon the right of the husband to the rents, profits, and control of lands held by him and his wife in entirety during their joint lives, it is important to regard, not only the language, but the spirit, of the new enactments. The sole purpose of the original statute of 1848 was to secure to married women the enjoyment of their real and personal property which belonged to them at the time of their marriage, or which they might thereafter acquire by gift, grant, or bequest from third

Consequently a forfeiture under the feudal law did not bar the wife surviving, though she had concurred in it, because, owing to her coverture, it was regarded as the act of her husband only.

For example, husband and wife, tenants for life by entireties, defending a real action and praying aid of one who was not the reversioner, did not thereby bar the title of the wife if she survived. 15 Edw. IV. 23, pl. 10 (dictum).

And husband and wife tenants for life by entireties making a feoffment in fee did not thereby bar the wife if she survived, although the reversioner had entered and become an idiot and the land has passed into the custody of the King. 29 Lib. Ass. 43.

And the lord of a villein whose wife was free could not retain the entirety estate against her surviving. Co. Litt. 187b.

And the creditors of the husband, and those purchasing under an execution levied at their suit have no claim against the estate after his death, if the wife survive. Simpson v. Pearson, 81 Ind. 1, 99 Am. Dec. 577 (1880); Beach v. Hollister, 3 Hun. 519, 5 Thomp. & C. 568 (1875); French v. Mehan, 56 Pa. 286 (1867); Brownson v. Hull, 16 Vt. 308, 42 Am. Dec. 517 (1844); Ketchum v. Walsworth, 5 Wis. 96, 68 Am. Dec. 49 (1851).

Unless the estate had been conveyed to the spouses in order to defraud the husband's creditors, in which case she is barred to the extent of the money supplied by him for the purchase of it. Newlove v. Callaghan, 86 Mich. 301 (1891), affirming Id. 297 (1891).

The enforcement of a lien for public improvements against an estate by entireties will not be enjoined on a mere allegation that judgment was not taken against the wife because a personal judgment is not necessary, and if she was a party to the action she would be bound by the judgment against the property. Barren Creek Ditching Co. v. Beck, 99 Ind. 230.

So, the title of the spouse surviving is preferred to that of the Crown or state claiming the interest 80 L. R. A.

of the spouse who dies first as escheated. Jacobs v. Miller, 50 Mich. 119 (1888) (dictum).

The claim by survivorship holds good, notwithstanding a statute abolishing survivorship between joint tenants, even though it does not expressly except husband and wife. Harrison v. Ray, 108 N. C. 215, 11 L. R. A. 722 (1891); Rogers v. Grider, 1 Dana, 242 (1833).

Banton v. Campbell, 9 R. Mon. 587 (1849), is sometimes referred to on this subject, but seems rather to have depended on the fact that the equitable estate was in the wife only.

The wife surviving was barred from acquiring a term of years vested in her and her husband by entireties by a forfeiture thereof incurred by him in his lifetime or at his death, no doubt because he could absolutely dispose of the term,—for example, a term so held by them and forfeited by his suicide. Hales v. Pettit, 1 Plowd. 253 (1562).

The heirs of the surviving spouse may inherit under a limitation to the spouses and their heirs, though the spouse who died first may have been attainted, and therefore incapable of having an heir, whether the attainder was for treason (Oole's Case, cited in Co. Litt. 187 a, b), or for felony. 4 Lib. Ass. pl. 4.

But they cannot take under a limitation to the spouses and the heirs of their bodies (at least in an entailable estate), unless they are capable of inheriting to both. Beaumont's Case, 9 Coke, 140a, 141a (1613); Grenelley's Case, 8 Coke, 71b (1610); 1 Leon. 157, case 221, and see Jenk. Cent. 51a, 22.

V. Operation of technical rules on the entirety estate. a. Rule in Shelley's Case.

A limitation of realty, situate in a state where the rule in Shelley's Case, 1 Coke, 88 (1579), prevails, to the husband and wife with remainder to their heirs, vests the whole fee in them by entireties. Auman v. Auman, 21 Pa. 343 (1853).

A limitation to them, providing that after the death of either the estate shall go to the survivor, and that after the death of the survivor it shall be persons, and to abrogate the common-law right of the husband in and to the real and personal property of the wife. The right to the rents and profits of her lands, jure uxoris, during the joint lives, was completely swept away, not by express enactment, but as a necessary consequence of investing her with the beneficial use of her own property, free from his control. Subsequent legislation confirmed her rights as defined by the act of 1848, and enlarged them in other directions, but the act of 1848 was the seed from which all the subsequent legislation sprung. This legislation rendered unnecessary any longer the cumbrous mechanism of settlements or resort to the imperfect powers of courts of chancery to secure to married women the enjoyment of their own property. In determining the question now before us, too much emphasis cannot be placed upon the fact that the legislation of 1848 and the subsequent years uprooted the principle of the common law, hoary with age, which vested in the husband, by virtue of the marriage relation, control of the property of his wife and the right to exclude her from its enjoyment. If it is still held, notwithstanding this legislation, that the husband takes the whole rents and profits, during coverture, in lands held in entirety, and may exclude the wife from any participation therein, an exception is allowed, standing upon no principle, and it deprives the wife, although she has an undoubted interest and estate in the land, from any benefit thereof during the lives of both. There are, as we can perceive, but two other alternatives,—either the rents and profits follow the nature of the estate, and can neither be disposed of nor charged except by the joint act of both husband and wife, which seems to be the view taken in McOurdy v. Canning, 64 Pa. 89; or the parties become tenants in common or joint tenants of the use, each being entitled to one half of the rents and profits during the joint lives, with power to each to dispose of or to charge his or her moiety during the same period, which seems to be the view taken in Buttler v. Rosenblath, 42 N. J. Eq. 651, 59 Am. Rep. 52. We think the rule adopted in New Jersey best reconciles the difficulties surrounding the subject. The estate granted is not thereby changed. It leaves it untouched, with all its common-law incidents. It deals with the rents and profits and the use and control of the estate during coverture only, and gives to each party equal rights so long as the question of survivorship is in abeyance, thereby conforming to the intention of the new legislation to take away the husband's right, jure uxoris, in his wife's property, and to enable the wife to have and enjoy "whatever estate she gets by any conveyance made to her, or to her and others jointly, divided among the heirs of both, gives an estate for their lives to them, and a contingent remainder in fee to their heirs. Hadlock v. Gray, 104 Ind. 506 (1885).

A limitation to them, and after the death of the survivor to the right heirs of both, passes an estate to them by entirety in fee. Green, Crew, v. King, 2 W. Bl. 1211 (1778).

But a limitation very slightly differing from this was held in Doe, Dormer, v. Wilson, 4 Barn. & Ald. 806 (1821), to pass it to them for their lives with contingent remainder in fee to the survivor.

A limitation to one spouse, with remainder to the heirs of both, passes one undivided share to the former spouse in fee, and upon her death it will pass to her heirs although the other is in possession. Anonymous, 8 Leon. 4, case 10 (1568).

A devise to husband and wife and their children and their children's children forever, prohibiting conveyance by the husband and wife, gives them an estate by entirety for life with estate tail to children. Peterborough Real Estate Invest. Co. v. Patterson, 18 Ont. Rep. 142 (1887).

b. Merger.

A conveyance to both spouses by entirety in fee was held in Purefoy v. Rogers, 2 Saund. 886b, 887 (1870), to merge an estate for life then already vested in the wife, subject, however, to be divested by her disagreeing to the conveyance after her husband's death. It does not seem possible to reconcile this with the statement in Littleton, 523, and Co. Litt. 290b, that there is no merger. Littleton and Coke refer to instances in which the subsequent conveyance purports to operate by way of confirmation, but this can hardly be essential, since the operation is to enlarge, not confirm, the estate. Coke cites 16 Hen. VI. Releasees; 9 Edw. IV. 18; 6 Edw. III. 9; 17 Edw. III. 68b.

In Bomar v. Mullins, 4 Rich. Eq. 80 (1851), it was held that there was no merger, either as regards the legal or the equitable estate.

Such a conveyance would have merged the wife's previous estate for years before the married women's acts, because the husband had an absolute power of disposing of it, and therefore of merging it, by accepting a larger estate to himself. Litt. 518, explained in Co. Litt. 290b.

c. Equity to a settlement.

A married woman has not an equity to a settlement out of an entirety estate. Ward v. Ward, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 808, 49 L. J. Ch. 409, 43 L. T. N. S. 822, 28 Week. Rep. 943 (1879), and authorities there cited.

d. Vendor's lien.

A vendor's lien for unpaid purchase money against an estate sold and conveyed by entirety holds good against the wife surviving. Anderson v. Tannehill, 42 Ind. 141 (1878).

e. Notice.

Notice given to a husband of an equitable claim, affecting property which he and his wife purchase, and in which they obtain the legal estate, is not operative against the wife,—especially if the purchase money was hers. Snyder v. Sponable, 1 Hill, 567 (1841). Quare, whether, since the married women's acts, he could not be deemed her agent if he negotiated the purchase. Before these acts she could not appoint an agent.

f. Homestead exemption.

A statute exempting homestead "or real estate" in the possession of or belonging to the head of a family from debts includes an entirety estate, even when, after a divorce, such homestead rights, if any, as may exist in the property have been transferred, by decree, to the wife. Jackson v. Shelton, 89 Tenn. 82 (1890). The point, however, cannot be considered as concluded by this decision, as two of the judges dissented, and gave strong reasons.

Such an exemption was held applicable to entirety property. Bennett v. Child, 19 Wis. 322, 38 Am. Dec. 622 (1855).

g. Construction of statutes.

A remedial statute respecting estates held in right of the wife extends also to estates by entirety. Greneley's Case, 8 Coke, 71 B (1610). See and does not enlarge or diminish that estate." The rule in Pennsylvania not only deprives the husband of his common-law right to the enjoyment of the whole rents and profits, but of the enjoyment of any share thereof, except with the concurrence and permission of his wife.

The conclusion we have reached requires a reversal of the judgment below so far as it adjudges that the mortgage executed by the husband to the plaintiff, and the sale thereunder, vested in the plaintiff the right to the possession of the whole estate during the joint lives of Mr. and Mrs. Fisher. The husband had a right to mortgage his interest, which was a right to the use of an undivided half of the estate during the joint lives, and to the fee in case he survived his wife; and by the foreclosure and sale the plaintiff acquired this interest, and became a tenant, in common with the wife, of the premises, subject to her right of survivorship. The opinion of the general term exhibits with great clearness the reasons upon which it was held that a conveyance or mortgage by the husband without restrictive words binds the fee in case he survives the wife. See 1 Washb. Real Prop. 425; 1 Preston, Estates, 135; Ames v. Norman, supra.

The judgment below should be modified in accordance with this opinion, and, as modified, affirmed, without costs to either party.

VI. Where and to what extent entirety estates exist.

a. List of states, etc.

England and Ireland. A limitation to husband and wife, contained in a testamentary disposition made by one dying after 1832, or in a disposition made after that date, creates, not an entirety estate, but a joint tenancy or tenancy in common as between other persons; and this by force of the married women's acts. Thornley v. Thornley (1898) 2 Ch. 229; Re March, L. R. 27 Ch. Div. 166, 54 L. J. Ch. 143, 51 L. T. N. S. 330, 33 Week. Rep. 241 (1884) interpreted, Judd v. Buckwell, L. R. 39 Ch. Div. 148, 57 L. J. Ch. 774, 59 L. T. N. S. 129, 33 Week. Rep. 712 (1888).

Limitations in earlier dispositions created an entirety estate, or an estate in common, according as they would have created joint tenancy or tenancy in common between other persons. See infra, IX.

Canada. The married women's acts abolish entireties in estates thereafter created. Re Wilson & T. I. Electric Light Co. 20 Ont. Rep. 397 (1891), overruling, without referring to, Leitch v. McLellan, 2 Ont. Rep. 587 (1888).

There was a quære as to the point in Griffin v. Patterson, 45 U. C. Q. B. 554 (1881).

But the statute providing that on a grant to several they should take as tenants in common and not as joint tenants does not apply to entireties. Re Shaver, 81 U. C. Q. B. 603 (1881).

Alabama. A limitation since the married women's acts creates always an estate in common. Donegan v. Donegan (Ala.) 15 So. Rep. 823 (1894).

A limitation previously created an entirety. Baker v. Prewitt, 64 Ala. 551 (1879).

Arkansas. A limitation creates an entirety, though made since the married women's clause, and since the abolition of joint tenancy. Robinson v. Eagle, 29 Ark. 202 (1874).

California. Entirety estates never existed. The rights of spouses were regulated by statute (1st Sess. chap. 103; Civil Code, 632) before the adoption of English law, and since then that statute has been continued. Re Buchanan's Estate, 8 Cal. 509 (1857).

Connecticut. Entirety estates never existed, nor did survivorship attach on joint tenancy. This was owing to local custom. Whittesley v. Fuller, 11 Conn. 337 (1833); Phelps v. Jepron, 1 Root, 48, 1 Am. Dec. 33 (1796).

But a special limitation may produce the effect of an entirety. Infra, VIII. b. 4, citing Bartholomew v. Musky, 61 Conn. 337 (1892).

Georgia. There is no distinct decision respecting entirety estates on other grounds, although Scott v. Causey, 39 Ga. 749 (1892), is decided, apparently at least in part, in favor of survivorship to a husband under a deed to him and his wife.

In Kempton v. Hallowell, 24 Ga. 52, 71 Am. Dec. 112 (1858), a deed of marriage settlement conveying land for joint use of husband and wife was held to give her the equivalent of a separate estate in one half of the property.

Illinois. Limitations since the married women's acts make the spouses tenants in common without survivorship. Cooper v. Cooper, 76 Ill. 57 (1875).

Limitations before those acts made them tenants by entirety. Harrer v. Wallner, 80 Ill. 197 (1875); Almond v. Bonnell, 76 Ill. 536 (1875); Mariner v. Saunders, 10 Ill. 124 (1838) (where from p. 125, it would seem that the conveyance of one spouse would not bind him surviving); Pyle v. Oustatt, 92 Ill. 209 (1879).

Indiana. Limitations, whether before or since the married women's acts, make them tenants by entireties, and give them an estate, which neither alone can affect. Chandler v. Cheney, 37 Ind. 391 (1871); Bevins v. Citne, 21 Ind. 37 (1868) (dictum).

Kansas. The common-law rule still exists and the married women's acts do not affect it. Baker v. Stewart, 40 Kan. 443, 2 L. R. A. 434 (1888).

Kentucky. The common-law rule seems still to exist, the statute of 1786 abolishing survivorship between joint tenants unless expressly provided for, not extending to husband and wife. Rogers v. Grider, 1 Dana, 242 (1833); Doe, Ross, v. Garrison, 1 Dana, 35 (1833).

But under limitations made since 1850 a special expression of intention is necessary,—otherwise they take in common. Elliott v. Nichols, 4 Bush, 502 (1868).

Maine. No later decision has been found than Harding v. Springer, in 1837, 14 Me. 407, 31 Am. Dec. 61, when they took by entireties; but since 1834 an intention to that effect must be expressed.

Maryland. They took by entireties in 1874 (Marburg v. Cole, 49 Md. 402, 33 Am. Rep. 236 (1873)) and no alteration seems to have been made to 1883. Later statutes not to hand.

Massachusetts. Limitations to husband and wife since 1885 make them tenants in common, but before that date they were tenants by entireties. Shaw v. Hearsay, 5 Mass. 521 (1809); Pray v. Stebbins, 141 Mass. 219, 55 Am. Rep. 422 (1890); Wales v. Coffin, 13 Allen, 218 (1896).

Michigan. Limitations to husband and wife create the entirety estate. Re Lewis's Appeal, 85 Mich. 340 (1891) (expressly overruling the dictum in Dowling v. Salliotte, 83 Mich. 135 (1890)); Vinton v. Beamer, 55 Mich. 559 (1886); Manwaring v. Powell,

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

COLE MANUFACTURING COMPANY
v.W. A. COLLIER and Wife, Appts.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. The character of an estate as one by entirety is not changed by the fact that the deed contains a proviso that in the event the wife should survive the husband "she shall have the use and enjoyment of said land," and "at her death the estate in remainder is to go to her children by the said husband."
2. A statute providing that the husband and wife shall not be ejected from the wife's real estate by virtue of any judgment against him will apply to estates by entirety, although the rule has been adopted that the husband's rights may be seized and sold in such a way that in case he should outlive his wife the purchaser will come into possession of the whole estate.

(June 6, 1895.)

APPPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Chancery Court for Shelby County in favor of plaintiff in a suit brought to obtain possession of certain real estate which defendant Mrs. Collier claimed as tenant by entirety. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

40 Mich. 371 (1879); Fisher v. Provin, 25 Mich. 347 (1872); Jacobs v. Miller, 50 Mich. 119 (1883); Naylor v. Minock, 96 Mich. 182 (1893).

Notwithstanding the married women's acts. Naylor v. Minock, supra; Aetna Ins. Co. v. Kesh, 40 Mich. 241 (1879).

Minnesota. Limitations to husband and wife since 1886 make them tenants in common, unless it expressly declared that they are to be joint tenants, in which they take as joint tenants without entirety incidents. Wilson v. Wilson, 43 Minn. 308 (1890).

And a contract to convey is construed as a contract to convey to them in common. Wilson v. Fairchild, 45 Minn. 203 (1891).

The effect of a limitation made between 1851 and 1866 seems doubtful. A limitation made before 1851 makes them tenants by entirety.

Mississippi. Limitations made before 1880 made them tenants by entireties (Hemingway v. Scales, 42 Miss. 1, 2 Am. Rep. 598, 97 Am. Dec. 425 (1868); McDuff v. Beauchamp, 50 Miss. 531 (1874); Gresham v. King, 65 Miss. 387 (1883)), unaffected by statutes construing conveyances to several as creating a tenancy in common.

Missouri. Limitations to husband and wife make them tenants by entireties. Gilson v. Zimmermann, 12 Mo. 385, 51 Am. Dec. 168 (1849); Garner v. Jones, 52 Mo. 68 (1873); Edmondson v. Moberly, 98 Mo. 523 (1890).

New Hampshire. Limitations to husband and wife, since the statutes of 1221, § 14, make them tenants in common, though the limitations be contained in a will made before the act by a testator dying after it, unless an intention to create a joint tenancy appears. Clark v. Clark, 56 N. H. 109 (1875).

A limitation before that date made them tenants by entireties. Wentworth v. Remick, 47 N. H. 226, 90 Am. Dec. 573 (1866).

New Jersey. Limitations since the married women's acts make them tenants in common during the joint lifetime but with right of survivorship, because the object of the acts is, not to alter the nature of the estate, but to give the wife full power to dispose of her interest. Buttler v. Roenblath, 42 N. J. Eq. 661, 59 Am. Rep. 52 (1887); Kip v. Kip, 38 N. J. Eq. 216 (1890); See v. Zablackie, 28 N. J. Eq. 422 (1877).

Save as altered by these acts entirety remains as at common law. Washburn v. Burns, 84 N. J. L. 18 (1890); Den, Hardenbergh v. Hardenbergh, 10 N. J. L. 49, 18 Am. Dec. 371 (1823); McDermott v. French, 15 N. J. Eq. 78 (1862); Bolles v. State Trust Co., 27 N. J. Eq. 309 (1876),—where the entirety estate was for life.

New York. Limitations since the married women's acts give them each a moiety of the rents and profits during the joint lifetime as in New Jersey (HILES v. FISHER, overruling on this point Beach v. Hollister, 3 Hun, 519, 5 Thomp. & C. 568 (1875); Bertles v. Nunan, 92 N. Y. 152, 44 Am. Rep. 361, 12 Abb. N. C. 238 (1883); and Bram v. Bram, 34 Hun, 487 (1886)), with survivorship, as at common law.

North Carolina. Limitations to husband and wife make them tenants by entireties though made since the married women's acts. Gray v. Bailey (N. C.) 23 S. E. Rep. 318 (1895); Simonton v. Cornelius, 98 N. C. 433 (1887); Harrison v. Ray, 106 N. C. 215, 11 L. R. A. 722 (1891); Bruce v. Nicholson, 109 N. C. 302 (1891); Long v. Barnes, 87 N. C. 329 (1882).

Ohio. Entirety estates never existed. Sergeant v. Steinberger, 2 Ohio, 305, 15 Am. Dec. 553 (1823); Wilson v. Fleming, 13 Ohio, 68 (1864).

Limitations which would elsewhere create entirety estates create estates in common without survivorship, even though expressed to be joint. Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank v. Wallace, 45 Ohio St. 152 (1887); Penn v. Cox, 16 Ohio, 80 (1847).

Oregon. Limitations to husband and wife make them tenants by entireties notwithstanding the married women's clause in the state Constitution. Myers v. Reed, 17 Fed. Rep. 401 (1883).

And notwithstanding the complete abolition of joint tenancy. Noblitt v. Beebe, 23 Or. 4 (1882).

Pennsylvania. Limitations to husband and wife make them tenants by entireties with survivorship, notwithstanding the married women's acts, and the abolition of survivorship in joint tenancies, except when created by express words but with the same unity (in the case of limitations since the said acts as exists in Indiana. Re Bramberry's Estate, 156 Pa. 623, 22 L. Messrs. Smith & Tresevant and Metcalf & Walker, for appellants:

The deed vests the title by entireties, and no execution against Mr. Collier can deprive Mrs. Collier of her possession.

Messrs. Thomas H. Jackson and D. E. Myers for appellee.

Beard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1886, a deed, reciting a valuable consideration, was made and delivered to the defendants, W. A. and Alice T. Collier, conveying to them, as husband and wife, the real estate which is the subject of this suit. Some time thereafter the complainant corporation, being a judgment creditor of the husband, caused an execution to be issued and levied on the latter's interest in this real estate, and, at the sale subsequently made by virtue of this levy, became a purchaser of the same. Having received a deed from the sheriff, this bill was filed, seeking the aid of the chancery court to eject Collier and wife from, and to place complainant in possession of, the entire property.

The first question presented for our consideration is, What interest did these defendants take under the deed of 1886? As it, by express terms, conveyed this property to these two grantees as husband and wife, it is conceded that its legal effect is to create in them an estate by the entirety, unless it be that a limitation imposed upon the tenure of Mrs. Collier, should she outlive her husband, is sufficient to change the character of this estate. The clause in the deed in which this limitation is found is in these words, viz.: "In the event she shall survive the said William A. Collier, she shall have the use and enjoyment of said land and improvements, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof; and at her death the estate in remainder is to go to her children by the said W. A. Collier." No limitation is imposed by this deed upon the right of survivorship of either the husband or the wife. The longest liver, as between them, will take the whole. The limitation is upon the estate of the wife after she has taken by survivorship, and is then operative only in the event she should die leaving children of herself and W. A. Collier surviving. In other words, a fee in an estate by entirety is granted to Collier and wife; but the wife's fee is determinable alone upon the event indicated, she in the meantime having outlived her husband. Such a limitation does not alter or modify the estate which the granting words have created.

Virginia. Limitations before 1850 make them tenants by entireties. Farmers' Bank v. Corder, 23 Va. 238 (1839); Thornton v. Thornton, 3 Rand. (Va.) 179 (1825).

Wisconsin. Limitations still make them tenants by entireties. Ketchum v. Walsworth, 5 Wis. 66, 68 Am. Dec. 49 (1851).

Notwithstanding the statute requiring express words to create a joint tenancy. Ibid. See also BROWN v. BARABOO, post, 320.

b. Construction of statutes affecting this question.

An enactment that estates are divided into severalty, joint tenancy, and tenancy in common is held in Canada, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Michigan, Pennsylvania, Missouri, and New York to allow of estates by entireties, though followed by an enactment that every estate granted to two or more persons shall be in common unless expressly declared to be joint. Miller v. Miller, 9 Abb. Pr. N. S. 446 (1871); Re Lewis's Appeal, 85 Mich. 340 (1891), expressly overruling Dowling v. Salliotte, 83 Mich. 133 (1890); Vinton v. Beamer, 55 Mich. 559 (1885); Manwaring v. Powell, 40 Mich. 371 (1879), and other cases in preceding division.

A similar enactment is held in Minnesota to substitute tenancy in common, or, if expressly so declared, joint tenancy, but without entirety incidents. Wilson v. Wilson, 43 Minn. 393 (1890).

And this construction is aided by the repeal of an exception of the case of husband and wife and by enactments placing married women in the position of unmarried women, thus abolishing the unity of person between spouses. Ibid.

An enactment that limitations shall not create joint tenancies is construed as not including estates by entireties under that term. Marburg v. Cole, 49 30 L. R. A.

Md. 402, 33 Am. Rep. 266 (1873); Robinson v. Eagle, 20 Ark. 202 (1874); Miller v. Miller, supra; Noblitt v. Beebe, 23 Or. 4 (1892).

An enactment that the estate of a joint tenant shall on his death devolve as if he were tenant in common is construed as not including an estate by entireties. McCurdy v. Canning, 64 Pa. 41 (1870); Den, Motley, v. Whitmore, 2 Dev. & B. L. 537 (1837); Thornton v. Thornton, 3 Rand. (Va.) 179 (1825); Thomas v. DeBaum, 14 N. J. Eq. 37 (1861); and see supra, IV. Survivorship.

And of course this much more holds if the statute expressly excepts the case of husband and wife. Chandler v. Cheney, 37 Ind. 410 (1871); Carver v. Smith, 90 Ind. 224, 46 Am. Rep. 210 (1883); Dowling v. Salliotte, 83 Mich. 131 (1890).

Though the effect of their being husband and wife did not appear on the conveyance. Dowling v. Salliotte, supra.

See more on this subject, infra.

An enactment giving to a married woman the powers of disposition, etc., which unmarried women possess does not alter the character of the estate she takes further than is necessary to enable her to dispose of her interest therein, but operates on the interest when acquired.

Consequently it does not prevent a limitation to husband and wife from creating an entirety estate. Baker v. Stewart, 40 Kan. 442, 449, 451, 2 L. R. A. 434 (1888) (in which neither had attempted to dispose of the estate); Beach v. Hollister, 3 Hun. 519, 5 Thomp. & C. 553 (1875); Bertles v. Nunan, 12 Abb. N. C. 293, 92 N. Y. 152, 44 Am. Rep. 361 (1883) (distinguished by the dissentient judge in 40 Kansas on the ground that the New York statutes left the unity of person untouched); Robinson v. Eagle, 20 Ark. 202 (1874); Carver v. Smith, 90 Ind. 224, 46 Am. Rep. 210 (1883); and many Indiana authorities cited there which also appear elsewhere in this note; Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank v. Gregory, 49 Barb. 153 (1867); Dowling v. Salliotte, supra; Gresham v. King, 65 Miss. 387 (1883); Hemingway v. Sciles, 43 Miss. 1, 2 Am. Rep. 536, 97 Am. Dec. 425 (1868); Mar-

of joint tenancy, it is said: "If lands be given to two and to the heirs of one of them, this is a good jointure, and the one hath a freehold, and the other a fee simple. And if he which hath the fee dieth, he which hath the freehold shall have the entirety by survivor for terms of his life. They are joint-tenants for life, and the fee simple or estate tail is in one of them." And the authorities agree that "the same words of conveyance which would make two other persons joint tenants will make a husband and wife tenants of the entirety; so that neither can sever the jointure, but the whole must accrue to the survivor." Green Cross v. King, 2 W. Bl. 1213; Martin v. Jackson, 27 Pa. 504, 67 Am. Dec. 489; Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank v. Gregory, 49 Barb. 155; Den, Hardenbergh, v. Hardenbergh, 10 N. J. L. 49, 18 Am. Dec. 371; 8 Jarman, Wills, 120.

The estate thus granted being one estate by entirety, what right did complainant get by its purchase of the husband's interest? That complainant could cause its execution to be levied on this interest, and purchasing at this sale, under this levy, could place itself so far in the room and stead of the execution debtor that, if unredeemed, it would ultimately come into possession of the whole should the husband outlive the wife, is settled law in this state. Ames v. Norman, 4 Sneed, 683, 70 Am. Dec. 369.

burg v. Cole, 49 Md. 402, 33 Am. Rep. 206 (1878); Goelet v. Gori, 51 Barb. 314 (1860), (where the estate was for years); Miller v. Miller, 9 Abb. Pr. N. S. 448 (1871); Myers v. Reed, 17 Fed. Rep. 401 (1883) (where the question had reference to survivorship and the statute was passed subsequently to the death, but the court expressed an opinion that it would have been the same if it had been passed before); Forayth v. McCall (no opinion filed but case referred to in 38 N. Y. 163, and 27 Alb. L. J. 190). The above decisions overruled Feely v. Buckley, 28 Hun. 451 (1862).

But these enactments alter the nature of the estate during the joint lifetime in several states and altogether in some. See list supra.

And the English enactment, that a married woman shall hold property as if sole causes a limitation to both spouses to produce the effect as if they had not been married. Re March, L. R. 27 Ch. Div. 168, 54 L. J. Ch. 143, 51 L. S. N. S. 380, 32 Week. Rep. 241 (1884); Jupp v. Buckwell, L. R. 39 Ch. Div. 143, 57 L. J. Ch. 774, 59 L. T. N. S. 129, 33 Week. Rep. 712 (1886).

Enactments altering the nature of entirety estates, or the effect of limitations to spouses operate though the marriage may have taken place before the passing of the act. Re March, supra; Clark v. Clark, 56 N. H. 106 (1875).

But not on estates acquired before the passing of the act. Stilphen v. Stilphen, 65 N. H. 127 (1889); Harrer v. Wallner, 80 Ill. 197 (1875); Elliot v. Nichols, 4 Bush. 502 (1866); Gresham v. King, 65 Miss. 387 (1886),—in all which the estate was conveyed by deed in possession.

But the married women's acts operate on limitations in wills made before the act if the testator died after the act. Re March, L. R. 27 Ch. Div. 170, 54 L. J. Ch. 143, 51 L. T. N. S. 380, 32 Week. Rep. 241 (1884).

Enactments abolishing survivorship would be unconstitutional if intended to operate on entirety estates acquired by the spouses before they took effect. Elliot v. Nichols, supra; Myers v. Reed, 17 Fed. Rep. 401 (1883).

Complainant, however, insists that, having the sheriff's deed, it is entitled to immediate possession of the whole estate, though the wife is still alive; and it is urged that this is equally settled by our decisions. This makes necessary an examination of the cases relied upon by complainant as authority for this position. Ames v. Norman, supra, is the leading case. The facts there were that a deed made to a husband and wife created in them an estate by entirety in certain realty. During marriage the husband's interest in this property was levied upon and sold. Subsequently the wife filed her bill against her husband for divorce, and joined with him, as a defendant, Norman, who as a judgment creditor had redeemed from the execution purchaser. This was done for the purpose of obtaining a decree canceling or extinguishing Norman's title and having the land settled upon complainant. The decree thus asked for was passed by the chancellor, and Norman brought the case to this court for review. A careful reading of the reporter's synopsis of the pleadings and evidence, as well as of the briefs of the respective counsel, fails to discover any intimation that Norman was in possession of the land in controversy, or that complainant was out of possession. It is certain that, so far as the redeeming creditor was concerned, this suit was purely defensive,—a defense on his part limited to the title ac-

An entirety estate may exist in realty, whether corporeal (so in most of the cases), or incorporeal,—as a rent. Browne v. Dunnyer, Hob. 208 (1617), Browl, pt. 1, p. 171 (1618); Temple v. Temple, Cro. Eliz. 791 (1601); Robb v. Beaver, 8 Watts & S. 107 (1844).

As to crops, see Patton v. Rankin, 68 Ind. 245, 34 Am. Rep. 254 (1879).

And therefore it may exist (as regards the beneficial interest) in personality which is subject to a trust for investment in the purchase of real estate, for this belongs, under the doctrine of constructive conversion, to the persons who would be entitled to the real estate if purchased.

Hence the surplus of the purchase money arising from the sale of mortgaged entirety estates to satisfy the mortgage is held by entireties. Germania Sav. Bank v. Jung, 23 Abb. N. C. 61 (1892); Vartie v. Underwood, 18 Barb. 561 (1854).

And so is the surplus of the purchase money arising from the sale of an entirety estate which formed part of the estate of a deceased person and was sold to satisfy his debts. Mebane v. Yanoy, 8 Ired. Eq. 88 (1843).

And so is the share of the spouses in the proceeds of land sold in a partition suit which share corresponds to a share which they held by entireties in the land. Bryan v. Bryan, 1 Dev. Eq. 47 (1827); Re Dozier, 1 Dev. Eq. 118 (1823),—qualified by Jones v. Plummer, 20 Md. 420 (1862); Eberts v. Eberts, 55 Pa. 110 (1867); Mildmay v. Quicke, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 553 (where at p. 555 this reason is given), 46 L. J. Ch. 667, 25 Week. Rep. 788 (1877); Ex parte Mobley, 2 Rich. Eq. 57 (1845); Scull v. Jernigan, 2 Dev. & B. Eq. 144 (1838); Stoner v. Com, 16 Pa. 337 (1851).

Consequently, such purchase money will be kept invested and not paid out to the husband unless he quired by him as the result of the execution sale. He did not by cross bill or otherwise, so far as the reporter's notes or the argument of counsel indicate, set up a claim to possession or to rents and profits. The stress of his contention was that a husband had a leviable interest in an estate by entirety, which passed to the purchaser at an execution sale, and through him to the redeeming creditor, and that the interest thus acquired by the latter was not affected by the subsequent divorce of the husband and wife. These were the only points involved in that case, and this court, upon abundant authority, resolved both of them in favor of Norman, and reversed the chancellor in so far as he had held otherwise. It is true that in the course of the opinion the learned judge delivering it said: "The defendant by his purchase became invested with the right of the husband as it existed at the time of the sale; that is, a right to occupy and to enjoy the profits of the land as owner during the joint lives of the husband and wife." This statement, however, was not called for by any issue in the case. It was therefore a dictum, and not controlling as authority. Jackson v. Shelton, 89 Tenn. 82, and Hopson v. Foulkes, 92 Tenn. 697, 23 L. R. A. 805, also relied on by complainant, have no bearing on the question now being considered. The first of these involved the right of a divorced wife to a homestead in property held with her husband prior to the divorce as an estate by entirety; while the second held that such an estate was converted into a tenancy in common by a divorce a vinculo. We think it apparent that the furthest limit to which this court has gone is in holding that the purchaser of the husband's interest in such an estate stands in his shoes, so far as ultimate survivorship is concerned, but that the question of the purchaser's right to the rents and profits of the property pending the wife's life is yet an open one in this state.

It may be conceded that at common law the husband, during coverture, had the unlimited right to the usufruct of this estate and that he could mortgage the property, or otherwise make a valid transfer of the possession of the same. Fairchild v. Chastelleux, 1 Pa. 181, 44 Am. Dec. 117; Barber v. Harris, 15 Wend. 617; Jackson, Suffern, v. McConnell, 19 Wend. 175; Bolles v. State Trust Co. 27 N. J. Eq. 308. This right necessarily resulted from the common-law view of the effect of marriage upon the wife's property rights. Marriage conferred upon the husband the dominion of the wife's real estate. The rents and profits belonged to him jure mariti. They were not only under his personal control, but they could be seized by his creditors. To modify this rule, and to give, at least, partial protection to married women, owning real estate, against the creditors of their husbands, as well as against husbands themselves, the act of 1849-50 (embodied in § 8338, Milliken & Vertrees' Code) was passed. That section is as follows: "The interest of the husband in the real estate of his wife acquired by her . . . shall not be sold or disposed of by virtue of any judg-survives the wife. Germania Sav. Bank v. Jung, 28 Abb. N. C. 81 (1892).

But in Osborne v. Edwards, 11 N. J. Eq. 73 (1855), payment to the husband of the wife's share of the proceeds of sale in a partition suit of land, in which the wife had a share, and which was not affected by the married women's acts, was good if made before the wife had asserted her rights.

As to whether personalty can be held by entireties (when not subject to constant conversion), the cases differ; but the dispute is mainly verbal. Fogleman v. Shively, 4 Ind. App. 197 (1892).

That it cannot be held by entireties was declared respecting stock in a land company in Blake v. Jones, Bail. Eq. 146, 21 Am. Dec. 530 (1830).

Respecting investments, in Watt v. Bovee, 35 Mich. 425 (1877); and Re Bryan, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 516, 49 L. J. Ch. 504, 28 Week. Rep. 761 (1880).

Respecting a promissory note, in Abshire v. State, 53 Ind. 66 (1876).

But that there is survivorship on a promissory note given to both spouses for the purchase money of entirety land in Mississippi before the Mississippi Code of 1880, see Allen v. Tate, 58 Miss. 535 (1887).

Respecting a bequest, in Polk v. Allen, 19 Mo. 457 (1854).

Respecting a mortgage debt, in Re Albrecht, 136 N. Y. 91, 18 L. R. A. 329 (1892).

Respecting a mortgagee's interest in the mortgaged land in New York where a mortgage is merely a lien, in Re Albrecht, 136 N. Y. 94, 18 L. R. A. 329 (1892).

Respecting a recognizance given to husband and wife to secure money for equality on a partition of land in which the wife solely had a share, in Lodge v. Hamilton, 2 Serg. & R. 491 (1816).

As to the income of general personal estate, see See v. Zabriskie, 28 N. J. Eq. 422 (1877).

That it may be held by entireties was declared 30 L. R. A.

respecting bank stock, in Phelps v. Simons, 150 Mass. 415 (1893).

Respecting a personal annuity equitably secured on land, in Gifford v. Rising, 55 Hun. 61 (1890).

Respecting promissory notes, in Gillan v. Dixon, 65 Pa. 395 (1870).

Respecting an annuity or dividends, in Ward v. Ward, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 506 (1879).

Pollard v. Merrill, 15 Ala. 175, 176 (1849), accords with this decision.

It was declared in Re Bramberry's Estate, 156 Pa. 623, 22 L. R. A. 504 (1896), that any kind of property may be held by entireties, and the purchase money (secured by a mortgage) of an estate which the spouses had held by entireties was decided to be entirety property. See note to this case in 22 L. R. A. 594. See also infra, VIII. and IX.

If personalty cannot be held by entireties it follows that real estate held upon trust to be sold (without any ultimate trust for reinvestment in the purchase of realty) cannot be so held. And this was so decided in Blake v. Jones, supra.

That instruments payable to husband and wife will belong to the wife if she survives the husband, is also held in many cases which do not call the right an estate by entireties. As in case of government stock, Re Gadbury, 32 L. J. Ch. N. S. 780, 11 Week Rep. 995 (1863); note and mortgage, — Draper v. Jackson, 16 Mass. 436 (1820); mortgage and bonds, — Christ's Hospital v. Budgin, 2 Vern. 683 (1712); stocks, — Craig v. Craig, 3 Barb. Ch. 104 (1848); Dummer v. Pitcher, 5 Sim. 35 (1851); a bequest, — Hamm v. Meisenhelter, 9 Watts, 350 (1840); promissory notes, — Shields v. Stillman, 48 Mo. 88 (1871); a bond, — Coppin v. —, 2 P. Wms. 496 (1723); a devise, — Cowper v. Scott, 3 P. Wms. 119 (1731).

These are referred to merely as instances of this class of cases.

The proceeds of an entirety estate, sold since the ment; . . . nor shall the husband and wife be ejected from or dispossessed of such real estate by virtue of any such judgment," etc. That this section will protect the wife's realty when held in severalty is clear. Does it not also protect her interest in an estate held in entirety? What is this estate? As was said in Ames v. Norman, 4 Sneed, 683, 70 Am. Dec. 269, the husband and wife in such an estate "do not take in joint tenancy; constituting one legal person, they cannot be vested with separate or separable interests. They are said, therefore, to take by entireties; that is, each of them is seised of the whole estate, and neither of a part." The estate thus held is a unit of indivisible parts, differing from a joint tenancy in that the latter is a unit of divisible parts. In the case of the latter relation, when one joint tenant dies the survivor takes jus accrescendi. But in the case of the former estate, upon the death of husband or wife, no new estate arises; there is a mere change in the properties of the legal person holding the originally granted estate. Stuckey v. Keefe, 26 Pa. 397. Or, as was said in Thornton v. Thornton, 8 Rand. (Va.) 179: "The husband and wife have the whole from the moment of the conveyance to them, and the death of either cannot give the survivor more." And during their joint lives the common law in the case of this anomalous estate gave to the husband the full and entire control and possession of the property, and the right to collect the rents and profits, vesting this right, as in the case of the wife's estate in severalty, in jure mariti. Hall v. Stephens, 65 Mo. 670, 27 Am. Rep. 802. This estate, therefore, being a "unit of indivisible parts," in which the wife, no less than the husband, "is the owner of the whole from the moment of the conveyance to them," and equally with him entitled to the whole (McCurdy v. Canning, 64 Pa. 39), and it being apparent also that his right to collect his entire rents rests alone jure mariti, and there being no way for the purchaser of the husband's interest to dispossess him without at the same time dispossessing the wife, we have no hesitation in holding that the act of 1849-50 (Milliken & Vertrees' Code, § 8338) excludes such purchasers from possession against the wife.

It is urged, however, that the case of Ames v. Norman, supra, is against this conclusion. It is sufficient to say in reply that an examination of the briefs of the counsel will show that the application of the statute in question was not the subject of suggestion or argument in that case. Even had it been, as the right of possession, as has been already stated, was not an issue in the case, the statement in the opinion that "this act did not apply to a wife's interest in an estate by entirety was dictum. It is proper to say that other courts of the highest respectability have made a similar application of statutes very much like ours. McCurdy v. Canning, supra; Corinth v. Emery, 63 Vt. 505; Davis v. Clark, 26 Ind. 424, 79 Am. Dec. 471; Bruce v. Nicholson, 109 N. C. 202.

Other points raised in the assignment of errors have been disposed of in our oral opinion.

A decree reversing the chancellor, and embracing the conclusions of this court, announced in the oral and written opinion, will be rendered.

married women's acts, was held to belong to the spouses in shares, in Fogleman v. Shively, 4 Ind. App. 197 (1892); and Feely v. Buckley, 23 Hun. 451 (1882),—which last proceeded on the ground, since overruled, that entirety was abolished by those acts.

As to terms of years, see infra, VII. a.

b. In what tenures.

Entireties may exist in freehold (as in most of the cases), and in copyhold. Back v. Andrew, 2 Vern. 120 (1690), Prec. in Ch. 1 (1699); Bullock v. Dibley, 4 Coke, 23a (1563); Doe, Dormer, v. Wilson, 4 Barn. & Ald. 303 (1821); Green, Crew, v. King, 2 W. Bl. 1211 (1778).

Leases to husband and wife for life are included. Leitch v. McLellan, 2 Ont. Rep. 597 (1883); Britton v. Knight, 29 U. C. C. P. 567 (1879).

But the survivorship in such cases is of course only a continuation of the life use to the survivor.

c. In what titles.

Entirety may exist in a seisin, as in almost all the cases.

Or in an outstanding right. Wentworth v. Remick, 47 N. H. 226, 90 Am. Dec. 873 (1866).

d. In what species of estate,—legal or equitable.

Entirety may exist in the legal estate combined with the beneficial,—as in most of the cases.

It may exist in an outstanding legal estate. Jackson, White, v. Cary, 16 Johns. 302 (1819); Norman v. Cunningham, 5 Gratt. 63 (1848); Moore v. Moore, 12 B. Mon. 661, 663 (1851); Wright v. Saddler, 20 N. Y. 320 (1859).

It may exist in an equitable estate. Freeman v. Barber, 3 Thomp. & C. 574 (1874).

But in Stoeblor v. Knerr, 5 Watts, 181 (1866), a 30 L. R. A.

conveyance to the husband to be by him held upon certain conditions specified in an agreement which purported to make him a trustee for himself and his wife in special tail was held to vest the beneficial as well as the legal estate in him, so as to entitle a creditor of his to have it sold to satisfy the debt. Quere.

e. In what estates.

A fee simple may be held by entirety,—as in most of the cases.

A fee limited, qualified, or conditional may be held by entireties. Greneley's Case, 8 Coke, 73 b (1610); Beaumont's Case, 9 Coke, 140 (1613), citing 12 Hen. IV.; Formedon, 15, 21 Edw. III. 33, 35.

A fee tail may be held by entireties. Greneley's Case, supra.

An estate for the life of husband and wife and the survivor may be held by entireties. Georgia C. & N. E. Co. v. Scott, 13 S. C. 24 and 40 (1882); Wentworth v. Remick, 47 N. H. 226, 90 Am. Dec. 873 (1866); Doe, Dormer, v. Wilson, 4 Barn. & Ald. 303 (1821); Purefoy v. Rogers, 3 Saund. 386 b, 387 (1670); 21 Hen. VI. 24 B. pl. 5; 15 Edw. IV. 29, pl. 10; Torrey v. Torrey, 14 N. Y. 430 (1856). See infra, VIII. b. 5.

An estate for the joint lifetime of husband and wife may be held by entireties. Thomas v. De Baum, 14 N. J. Eq. 87 (1861).

An estate for the life of one of the spouses, and as to the other spouse in fee, may be held by entireties. COLE MFG. CO. v. COLLIER (Tenn.) post, 815.

No case of a limitation to husband and wife for the life of another has been found, but beyond doubt it also may be held by entireties.

An estate for years may be held by entireties. Hales v. Pettit, 1 Plowd. 250 (1562) (but that the husband alone could forfeit it, see supra, end of IV., citing 7 Hen. VI.); Goelet v. Gori, 21 Barb. 320 (1860).

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

William BROWN, Appl.,
v.
City of BARABOO, Resp.

(90 Wis. 151.)

Husband and wife taking by descent as next of kin take by moieties, and not by entireties, and without any right of survivorship.

(April, 3, 1895.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Sauk County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Reversed.

Statement by Pinney, J.:

This is an action of ejectment for the recovery of the undivided four sevenths of an undivided half of a certain parcel of land in the city of Baraboo. George W. Brown died, intestate, seised of the entirety of the premises, December 15, 1847, and without any children. Both his father, Chauncey Brown, and his mother, Clarissa Brown, survived him, and the latter predeceased her husband, dying, intestate, February 26, 1854. The plaintiff, also a son of the said Chauncey and Clarissa Brown, claims the interest in the premises for which he sues as an heir of his deceased mother, and as grantee of the interest of three others of her heirs. Having produced evidence to show that he was the owner of four sevenths of the interest in the premises, if any, of which his mother died seised, he claimed that upon the death of George W. Brown intestate the entirety of the premises descended equally to his said father and mother, as his next of kin, computing by the rules of the civil law. After the plaintiff had rested his case, the court gave judgment of nonsuit against the plaintiff, upon the ground that George W. Brown's mother, under whom alone the plaintiff claimed title, took no interest whatever in the premises, and that his father inherited the entirety. From this judgment the plaintiff appealed.

Messrs. William Brown and Bentley & Bentley, for appellant:

Those who take property as a class of persons described, where there is nothing in the law making the appropriation to distinguish their respective rights, take in equal shares.

Knapp v. Windsor, 6 Cush. 156; Snow v. Snow, 111 Mass. 889.

The term "qualified or limited fee" imports a fee limited to endure until a specified event. It then ceases and reverts to the donor if it has not meanwhile been disposed of, but all intervening dispositions have the same operation as a fee simple. The term "fee conditional" imports a fee limited in property not entailable to the parties and the heirs of their bodies. It differs from other limited fees in that dispositions made of it in the lifetime of the first taker are not valid beyond that life, unless there are issue inheritable under the limitation.

1. In what shares.

An undivided share held by the spouses in common with others may be held by entireties, and so may their interest in a joint tenancy. Hulett v. Inlow, 57 Ind. 412, 26 Am. Rep. 64 (1877); Fox v. Fletcher, 8 Mass. 274 (1811); Jones v. Chandler, 40 Ind. 588 (1872). And see infra, IX.

VIII. Creation of entirety estates.

a. By act of law.

Spouses who inherit as coheirs do not take by entireties, whether they married before inheriting as in BROWN v. BARABOO, or intermarry afterwards. Symond's Case, F. Moore, 92 (1536) (dictum).

Even though the estate inherited was equitable and the legal estate was transferred to them after the marriage by the statute of uses subsequently passed, because it transfers the same estate as they had in the use. Ibid.

But there is a statutory exception in Pennsylvania. Stat. 3 App. 1883, § 3 (Brightley's Dig. ed. 1894 p. 1068); Gillan v. Dixon, 85 Pa. 395 (1870).

The fact that money with which land is purchased in the wife's name was supplied in part by her husband does not make them tenants by entirety, but if the presumption that the purchase was intended as a gift to the wife be rebutted, the spouses take the beneficial estate in shares proportionate to the sums paid by them respectively. Harden v. Darwin, 77 Ala. 472 (1884); Tebbetts v. Tilton, 31 N. H. 273 (1855).

So also in Springer v. Young, 14 Or. 230 (1893), land purchased by the husband out of the proceeds of the sale of a donation claim which the husband and wife had held in common was held to belong to them in shares, the husband having afterwards recognized the right of the wife to a half share.

The husband can acquire seisin of the wife's estate on her behalf. Nesson v. Hampton (Eng. March, 90, pl. 145 (1640), and therefore presumably also of an entirety estate on behalf of both.

b. By act of the party.

1. Limitation to husband and wife without specifying how they are to take.

A limitation of property capable of being held by entireties, made to a husband and wife without specifying how they are to take, is construed as meant to limit it to them by entireties. Litt. 523, 528; Beach v. Hollister, 8 Hun. 519, 5 Thomp. & C. 568 (1875); Croan v. Joyce, 3 Bush. 454 (1867); Elliott v. Nichols, 4 Bush. 502 (1868); McCurdy v. Canning, 64 Pa. 39 (1870); McDermott v. French, 15 N. J. Eq. 78 (1862); McLeod v. Tarrant, 39 S. C. 271, 20 L. R. A. 848 (1893); Pray v. Stebbins, 141 Mass. 219, 55 Am. Rep. 462 (1896); Zitna Ins. Co. v. Resh, 40 Mich. 241 (1879); Robinson v. Eagle, 29 Ark. 208 (1874); conceded in Doe, De Peyster, v. Howland, 8 Cow. 277, 18 Am. Dec. 445 (1848).

Whether the limitation be by way of grant, as in the above cases, or by way of reservation of a particular estate in the land. Vinton v. Seamer, 55 Mich. 559 (1885).

Or by way of reservation of a rent in fee on a conveyance of the land which was itself held by entireties. Robb v. Beaver, 8 Watts & S. 107 (1844).

Even though the fact that they are spouses is not stated in the deed but must be proved by extrinsic oral evidence. Chandler v. Cheney, 37 Ind. 391 (1877); Dowling v. Sallotte, 33 Mich. 131 (1890); Hulett v. Inlow, 57 Ind. 412, 26 Am. Rep. 64 (1877).

And though the wife was named in the habendum only, the husband being named both in the habendum and in the premises. McLeod v. Tarrant, supra.

The creation of an estate in joint tenancy depends on the wording of the deed or devise by which the tenants claim title; for this estate can only arise by purchase or grant, that is, by the acts of the parties, and never by the act of law.

3 Bl. Com. 180; Knapp v. Windsor, 6 Cush. 160; Chitty's Bl. pp. 180, 181.

Chauncey Brown and Clarissa Brown, the father and mother of George W. Brown, heir of this property from George W. Brown, who was the son of Chauncey Brown and Clarissa Brown, and Chauncey Brown and Clarissa Brown, having heir of this property of George W. Brown, were, under the law, made tenants in common of this property.

Snow v. Snow and Knapp v. Windsor, supra; Higbee v. Rice, 5 Mass. 344, 4 Am. Dec. 63; 1 Chitty's Bl. p. 181, *146; Rev. Stat. 1839, 178, § 4, 184, § 38; Rev. Stat. 1849, p. 380, §§ 4, 9, 15, 17, 18.

Mr. R. D. Evans, for respondent:

Under the English statutes of distribution, if an intestate left no widow, nor lineal issue, the father took the whole of the personal property.

Schouler, Exrs. & Adms. § 501; Wms. Exrs. 1506; Blackborough v. Davis, 1 P. Wms. 51.

This construction, both as to personal and real estate, had been uniformly followed in Massachusetts prior to the enactment of this statute here. The next of kin according to the construction given to the statute (22 & 23 Car. II.), which has always been adopted here, would be the father of such child, if any, who would, of course, take the whole.

Sheffield v. Loeving, 13 Mass. 491.

The old doctrines of the common law forbade that mother and father should have equal title as parents.

Schouler, Exrs. & Adms. §§ 102, 103; Wms. Exrs. 423; Blackborough v. Davis, supra. Preferences have always been recognized among kindred of the same degree.

Schouler, Exrs. & Adms. § 108.

This preference modern legislation has greatly modified, but it has required the enactment of specific statutes to place the mother of an intestate upon terms of equality with the father.

Schouler, Exrs. & Adms. § 108.

Had Chauncey Brown, the father of said George Brown, been dead at the time of the death of said George Brown, his mother, if the construction claimed by appellant is correct, would have taken the whole of said George Brown's estate. But it is settled law in this state that the mother, in the circumstances specified, would not have taken the whole,—would have taken equally with the surviving brothers and sisters of said George Brown, or the one-eleventh part of said estate.

Westcott v. Miller, 42 Wis. 454.

Would she take a larger interest, her husband being alive?

And though the conveyance purported to be a confirmation of a previous estate which was not held by entireties. Litt. 535, 523.

And (as regards the beneficial estate) even though the purchase money was paid by the wife only, if she acquiesced in the conveyance to both. Ward v. Krumm, 54 How. Pr. 35 (1876).

See, however, infra, VIII. c. citing Trimble v. Reis, 37 Pa. 443 (1860).

And though the conveyance be expressly made as an advancement by the wife's father. Garner v. Jones, 53 Mo. 28 (1873).

But when the wife's father had long retained a deed in his possession and finally delivered it for the use of the wife only after her husband had deserted her, the spouses were held to be trustees for the wife alone, so that her husband's creditors could not have the estate sold. Barncord v. Kuhn, 36 Pa. 383 (1860).

There were other points in this case. The court held that a judgment in Pennsylvania does not touch property which the defendant acquires after the judgment, and that the entirety estate was therefore originally exempt; and was afterwards effectually surrendered to the father. The estate, however, was on fee, and therefore could not be surrendered in the strict sense of that word, but reconveyed. The reconveyance was oral by tearing up the deed and agreeing to accept a new one to the wife alone, which was granted. The decision, if supportable, must be rested on the ground that so much of the beneficial estate as did not pass to the separate use of the wife remained in the father by way of resulting trust for want of an intention to part with it.

In Garner v. Jones, 52 Mo. 71, 72 (1873), the court said that Barncord v. Kuhn must have been controlled by the statute of 1848 respecting married women.

And the general rule holds notwithstanding an enactment that a limitation to two or more persons shall create a tenancy in common (unless otherwise expressed) because the spouses are, "one person." 30 L. R. A.

son in law" (rather sicut una persona). Shaw v. Hearsey, 5 Mass. 521 (1809); Beach v. Hollister, 3 Hun, 520, 5 Thomp. & C. 538 (1875); Hemingway v. Soates, 42 Miss. 17, 2 Am. Rep. 556, 97 Am. Dec. 425 (1868); Robinson v. Earle, 29 Ark. 206 (1874); Hall v. Stephens, 65 Mo. 676, 27 Am. Rep. 302 (1877).

Especially if this construction be aided by a provision in the same statute that partition may be made by those holding by entireties, which provision was held to imply that entireties must still exist. Bertles v. Nunan, 12 Abb. N. C. 202, 92 N. Y. 152, 44 Am. Rep. 351 (1883) (where the question was whether the administrator of a surviving wife could sell), overruling Meeker v. Wright, 7 Abb. N. C. 299 (1879), reversing 11 Hun, 538 (1877),—which is commented on in 12 Abb. N. C. 208, 290, and therein stated to have been reversed in 27 Alb. L. J. 190.

But in Clark v. Clark, 56 N. H. 105 (1875), an opposite decision was pronounced on a similar enactment on the ground that the married women's act in New Hampshire had destroyed the unity of person, a theory not admitted in the New York cases.

But an enactment that a limitation to two or more (omitting the word "person") shall create a tenancy in common applies to a limitation to married spouses. Hoffman v. Stigers, 23 Iowa, 309 (1860).

And the rule holds notwithstanding an enactment that no estate shall be adjudged a joint tenancy unless an intent to that effect be expressed. McDermott v. French, 15 N. J. Eq. 73 (1862); Craft v. Wilcox, 4 Gill, 504 (1846); Den, Wyckoff, v. Gardner, 20 N. J. L. 556, 45 Am. Dec. 388 (1846).

As to the effect of an enactment that a joint estate shall pass as an estate in common, see supra, VI. b.

2. Limitation especially by entireties in a state where entirety does not exist.

A limitation of property situate in a state where entirety estates have been abolished or never existed, made to a husband and wife expressly to hold

The father excludes all other next of kin.

Wms. 48; Robertson, Law of Personal Succession, 10 Law Lib. § 8, ¶ 8, p. 148; Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, 9th ed. p. 545; 4 Wms. Exrs. 4th Am. ed. chap. 1; Sheffield v. Lovering, 12 Mass. 490.

Pinney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. It was provided by the statute of descent in force at the time of the death of George W. Brown that "when any person shall die seised of lands, tenements, or hereditaments not by him devised, . . . where there are no children of the intestate, the inheritance shall descend equally to the next of kin in equal degree, and those who represent them, computing by the rules of the civil law." Terr. Stat. 1839, p. 194, § 38. Consanguinity, it is said, is either lineal or collateral. Lineal consanguinity is that which subsists between persons of whom one is descended in a direct line from the other, as between an intestate and his father or grandfather, etc., in the direct ascending line, or between him and his son or grandson, etc., in the direct descending line; and every generation in lineal, direct consanguinity constitutes a different degree, reckoning either upward or downward. This method of computation of degrees of kindred in the direct line obtains as well in the civil and canon law as in the common law. 2 Chitty's

Bl. 203. The difference in the method of computation of degrees exists only in relation to collateral consanguinity. As George W. Brown left no children, his father and his mother were his next of kin, and in the first degree. They stood as such in equal degree, and the statute declared, in substance, that his inheritable property should descend to them equally, as his next of kin. The common-law canon of inheritance, by which males were preferred to females in the same degree, was abrogated by this statute. "It is a general rule that those who take property as a class of persons described, where there is nothing in the law making the appropriation to distinguish their respective rights, take in equal shares." Reeve, Descent, 105, 123; Knapp v. Windsor, 6 Cush. 156; Snow v. Snow, 111 Mass. 890; Batch v. Stone, 149 Mass. 43. The statute leaves no question, but declares in express terms that "the inheritance shall descend equally to the next of kin in equal degree." It is very evident that the real estate in question descended equally to the father and to the mother of the deceased; and as they took by descent, and not by purchase, as by grant or devise, we think that they took as tenants in common, and by moieties, and not by entireties, and, therefore, that, upon the death of the mother, her interest did not go to the father, her husband, by right of survivorship. The creation of an estate in joint tenancy, it is said, "depends on the wording of the deed or devise by which the tenants claim title, for this estate can only arise by purchase or grant, — by entireties, is construed so as to produce as nearly as possible the effect intended.

Hence, a limitation of land in Pennsylvania (where it was at the time of the decision undetermined whether the married women's act had abolished entirety estates) to a husband and wife to hold in the manner prescribed in Stuckey v. Keefe, 26 Pa. 387 (1856), in which case the parties had been held to take by entireties¹, was held to operate as a limitation to both spouses so long as both should live, and after the death of one to the survivor in fee. Bates v. Seely, 46 Pa. 248 (1863).

See also VIII. b, 6, citing Bartholomew v. Muzzy, 61 Conn. 387 (1892).

3. Limitation to husband and wife as joint tenants.

A limitation of property capable of being held by entireties to a husband and wife expressly as "joint tenants" seems by the old authorities to make them tenants by entireties, the entirety estate being regarded as a joint tenancy with peculiar incidents; although it is clear from the authorities cited supra, II. that if they were ordinary joint tenants before the marriage they continue so after it. The modern authorities are divided.

In Pollak v. Kelly, 6 Ir. C. L. Rep. 373 (1866), it was held that such a limitation makes them tenants by entireties.

In Re Bramberry's Estate, 156 Pa. 623, 22 L. R. A. 594 (1898), and McDuff v. Beauchamp, 50 Miss. 531, 535 (1874) (in which case the limitation is stated to have been to them jointly), the court declared that whatever words would make other persons joint tenants would make husband and wife tenants by entireties.

And this was held to be so in McDuff v. Beauchamp, supra, notwithstanding an enactment that a conveyance to two or more persons should create an estate in common. So in many old books it is laid down that husband and wife cannot take by moieties.

On the other hand, it has been held by the New York cases that a limitation of realty in New York, expressed to be to them jointly, will make them ordinary joint tenants,—at least since the married women's acts. Joos v. Fey, 129 N. Y. 17 (1901); Cloos v. Cloos, 55 Hun. 450, 24 Abb. N. C. 219 (1890); Wurz v. Wurz, 27 Abb. N. C. 58 (1891), overruling Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank v. Gregory, 49 Barb. 155 (1867).

So, a limitation of realty in Maryland to husband and wife "as joint tenants the survivor of them and the heirs and assigns of each survivor" was held to make them joint tenants since the married women's acts, and that each could serve accordingly. Fladung v. Rose, 58 Md. 13 (1881).

The court doubted what would have been the effect of a limitation before the acts.

So, a limitation of realty in Indiana to them as joint tenants was held to make them ordinary joint tenants, irrespectively of any statute. Thorburn v. Wiggins, 136 Ind. 173, 22 L. R. A. 22 (1893).

So under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1894, § 5341. Wilkins v. Young (Ind.) 41 N. E. Rep. 68 (1895).

In Illinois, in Mette v. Felten, 143 Ill. 357 (1894), such a limitation was held to give a right of survivorship, notwithstanding Cooper v. Cooper, 76 Ill. 57 (1875), supra, VI., and notwithstanding somewhat complicated statutes in force there.

4. Limitation to husband and wife as tenants in common.

A limitation of property capable of being held by entireties to husband and wife expressly as tenants in common, or, what is the same thing, in undivided shares, seems effectual according to the old authorities to make them so.

In Co. Litt. 199 b, it is said: "If a man let land that is, by the act of the parties,—and never by the mere act of law." 2 Chitty's Bl. 180. By the common law, where an estate is granted to husband and wife, they take by entireties, and not by moieties. Neither could sell without the consent of the other, and the survivor took the whole. Ketchum v. Walworth, 5 Wis. 95, 68 Am. Dec. 49. This result was upon the ground that the estate was created by act of the parties, and that in such cases husband and wife are but one person in law for the purposes of the grant; but where the estate is created by act of law, as by descent, the rule is otherwise, and they take as tenants in common and by moieties. The father and mother of George W. Brown inherited his estate equally, by reason of the relation of each to him, and not by reason of their relation to each other, as husband and wife. The right of each is separate and distinct, and is in no way dependent upon the right of the other. In Knapp v. Windsor, 6 Cush. 157-161, the whole subject is considered, and Shaw, Ch. J., says: "It appears to us that the analogy between the acquisition of property by operation of law, giving to each individual of a class a share suo jure, and a grant giving a certain amount of property to several persons named, two of whom are husband and wife (as in that case), and named and designated as such, is very slight. The former has its operation from the provisions of law, which are general and unlimited, and look simply at the relation of each to the intestate, and intend to give to each because so related; the other takes its effect from the presumed intent of the grantor or deviser, who has the power to make such gift as he pleases." This case is an exhaustive and instructive consideration of the subject, and, we think, fully sustains the conclusions at which we have arrived. We have not been referred to any authority, nor do we know of any, sustaining the position that, where husband and wife take by descent as next of kin, they take by entireties, and not by moieties, or that, as between them, the right of survivorship obtains. Many authorities were cited showing that, as to personal estate in such a case, the father and husband would take it, to the exclusion of the mother and wife; but this is because the estate is personal, which, as soon as it is property of the wife, becomes the property of the husband by right of marriage. "It would be idle to distribute to her, when by the very act of distribution it would become the property of the husband. But it is otherwise in the case of real property. This is not his, but belongs to her, and she is as capable of inheriting it as her husband." Reeve, Descents, 123. During coverture he is entitled to the use of her real estate, or the rents and profits of it. Subject to this right, she might convey or devise it, and it would descend to her heirs. We hold, therefore, that upon the death of George W. Brown his real estate descended equally to his father and mother, as tenants in common, and that upon her death her moiety descended to her heirs at law. It follows, therefore, that the nonsuit was erroneous.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

to husband and wife to hold, the one moiety to the husband for life and the other moiety to the wife for life, and the lessor confirm the estate to hold to them and their heirs; as to the moiety of the husband, it enureth only to the husband, and as to the moiety of the wife they are joint tenants, for the husband holdeth such estate in the wife's moiety in her right as is capable of confirmation. (The meaning of the statement that they are joint tenants appears supra, L., citing Stroebe v. Fehl, 22 Wis. 337 (1867).)

And in the modern English case of Marchant v. Cragg, 31 Beav. 401 (1862), the master of the rolls said that the passages in Littleton to the effect that a husband and wife cannot hold by moieties meant that they cannot hold a joint estate by moieties, and he added: "Any property may be given in equal shares to husband and wife;" and he so decided with regard to a personal fund on the ground that the law regulating it was the same on this point as that regulating real estate."

In New Jersey a limitation to them expressly as tenants in common makes them so. MacDermott v. French, 15 N. J. Eq. 78 (1862); Burtlar v. Rosenblath, 42 N. J. Eq. 655, 59 Am. Rep. 62 (1887) (dictum). And so in Indiana. Brown v. Brown, 133 Ind. 476 (1892).

So as to limitations for life. Hadlock v. Gray, 104 Ind. 596 (1885).

And, in New York, any expression which will make other persons tenants in common will make husband and wife so independently of any statute. Hicks v. Cochran, 4 Edw. Ch. 107 (1843).

And so according to Miner v. Brown, 133 N. Y. 208 (1892), will any limitation indicating an intention to that effect, or even any limitation accompanied by expressions which cannot be operative unless the wife is admitted to be on equal present enjoyment with her husband, and that her estate is not to be subvertent to his exclusive control (reasons which would not apply since HILMS v. FISHER). And on this ground a limitation in a will to them "for their use, benefit, and support during their natural lives" was held sufficient to make them tenants in common. This, however, seems extreme. The question in Miner v. Brown, supra, was whether an execution against the husband was effective against the land during the wife's life. The court held it invalid as regarded one moiety. But the court intimated an opinion (p. 314) that the survivor might be entitled absolutely, thus restricting the tenancy in common to the joint lifetime. They in fact merely anticipated HILMS v. FISHER, on other grounds.

The above decisions in effect overruled Dias v. Glover, Hoffman, Ch. 71 (1890), where the limitations to them "as tenants in common and in equality of estate, and not as joint tenants," was held to make them tenants by entireties.

In Pennsylvania, however, it was, till recently, held that the common law absolutely forbids the making of husband and wife tenants in common by one and the same conveyance; and also, that a limitation intended to make them so would enure (on the cy pres principle) to make them tenants by entireties. A limitation to them "as tenants in common and not as joint tenants" was held so cooperative in Stuckey v. Keefe, 26 Pa. 397 (1850); Martin v. Jackson, 27 Pa. 504, 67 Am. Dec. 489 (1856); and Diver v. Diver, 56 Pa. 106 (1867).

And this, even though the limitation was subsequent to the abolition of survivorship between joint tenants. Martin v. Jackson, supra.

And to the married women's act. Diver v. Diver, supra.

But since these decisions it has been held in Penn-

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

Mary P. BRANCH, Appt.,

v.

Sallie M. POLK et al.

(.....Ark.....)

1. A joint conveyance to husband and wife vests in them an estate in entirety.
2. A wife may execute a mortgage on her interest in lands held by the entirety, where the state Constitution and statutes have excluded the marital rights of the husband in such property during the wife's life, and given her control of her property.
3. Separate mortgages made by husband and wife on land held by the entirety, each made without the joinder of the other, purporting to cover an undivided half interest in the land, although made to the same person and for the same purpose, will give to the mortgagee on the death of the husband no lien beyond an undivided half interest.

(December 14, 1895.)

A PPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Phillips County in favor of defendants in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage. Modified.

Statement by Riddick, J.:

Mary P. Branch brought suit in the Phillips circuit court against Sallie M. Polk and the heirs of Lucius E. Polk, Sr. For cause of action she alleged that Lucius E. Polk, Sr., executed to her, on the 1st day of March, 1891, several promissory notes, amounting in the aggregate to between $6,000 and $7,000; that to secure the payment of these notes he executed to her a mortgage on an undivided half interest in certain lands in Phillips county, Ark.; that the defendant Sallie M. Polk, at that time the wife of said Lucius E. Polk, in order to further secure the payment of said notes, did, on said 1st day of March, 1891, also execute a mortgage upon an undivided half interest in said lands owned by her; that Lucius E. Polk had died since the execution of the notes and mortgage; and that said notes were due and unpaid. She prayed that the mortgage be foreclosed, etc. Mrs. Polk filed her separate answer to the complaint, wherein she admits the execution of the notes and mortgage as alleged, that at the time of the execution of the same she was the wife of L. E. Polk, and that he has since died, and that said notes are past due and unpaid; but, to quote the language of sylvania that a limitation expressly unfolding the incidents of a tenancy in common and prescribing that the estate shall have these incidents will operate, independently of statute, to make them tenants in common,—as, a limitation stating that one spouse is to take one undivided half, and the other the other, and that each is to be capable of disposing of his or her share, and that on the death of either his or her share is to pass to his or her representatives. Re Young's Estate, 166 Pa. 645 (1895), reversing 8 Pa. Dist. R. 443 (1894). The reason given—that they might have been made to take thus by separate conveyances—would apply equally to a simple limitation to them in common. The subject there was a mortgage, but the decision professed to be general applicability. Strange to say, the court approved of Stuckey v. Keefe, supra, and professed their willingness to follow it if the wording were similar.

A conveyance expressly made to husband and wife as tenants in common and not joint tenants is also held in the District of Columbia to create a tenancy in common, and not by the entirety. Carroll v. Raby, 22 Wash. L. Rep. 820.

The American decisions on both sides of this question are fully considered in Baker v. Stewart, 40 Kan. 454, 468, 2 L. R. A. 434 (1893). Those of them which deny the power to make the spouses tenants in common are founded on the expressions in the old books that they cannot take by moieties.

Words importing a tenancy in common in a devise to several persons of whom two are husband and wife are construed as meaning that the other persons are to take in common with one another and with the spouses, not that the spouses so take as between themselves. Bricker v. Whatley, 1 Vern. 233 (1684).

5. Limitation to husband and wife for their lives.

A limitation to husband and wife for their lives is construed as including the life of the survivor, whether it be by way of grant (Cooper v. Cooper, 76 Ill. 57 (1875), citing Brudnel's Case, 5 Coke, 9 (1592); Torrey v. Torrey, 14 N. Y. 430 (1856); Han- 80 L. R. A.

nan v. Towers, 3 Harr. & J. 147, 5 Am. Dec. 427 (1810); Todd v. Zachary, Busbee, Eq. 237 (1853); and see Hodlock v. Gray, 104 Ind. 596 (1885)), or of reservation. McRoberts v. Copeland, 85 Tenn. 211 (1886).

And a limitation of a life estate to husband and wife, contained in a conveyance in fee of an estate which they held by entirety, gives them a life estate by entirety. Jones v. Potter, 89 N. C. 220 (1883); McRoberts v. Copeland, supra.

6. Limitations in peculiar forms.

The phrase "party of the second part" is a sufficient description of the husband and wife in the habendum of an indenture in which the husband and wife were parties of the second part. Den, Hardenbergh, v. Hardenbergh, 10 N. J. L. 49, 18 Am. Dec. 371 (1828).

A limitation to "A and his family" means to A and his wife and children if any, and consequently makes him and his wife tenants by entirety of their share in common with the children. Hall v. Stephens, 65 Mo. 670, 27 Am. Rep. 302 (1877).

A limitation in a deed to a husband and wife for life and "to the survivor of them in his or her own right" was held to vest the estate in them for life with remainder in fee to the survivor. Mittel v. Karl, 133 Ill. 65, 8 L. R. A. 655 (1890).

A limitation to one of the spouses for life and afterwards to the other cannot make them co-owners, though in the premises of the deed the grant was to the former without words of limitation. Riegin v. Love, 72 Ill. 553 (1874).

A limitation to husband and wife "as joint tenants and to the survivor of them," with the addition of a statement that it is understood that in case of the death of the wife "her children are to inherit her interest," means that in case of the death of the wife after that of the husband they are to inherit her interest, but that if she dies first her husband is to take the whole.

And the fact that the husband permitted them to occupy a part from their mother's death until his own makes no difference. Barden v. Overmeyer, 131 Ind. 660 (1892).

the answer, "she denies that the deed of trust so executed by the said husband and delivered to the said plaintiff is a lien upon said lands described in said complaint, or an undivided half interest in the same, or upon any part, or any interest therein, or that the deed of trust so executed by herself and delivered to said plaintiff is a lien upon said lands, or any interest therein, or any part thereof, because she says that the sole and only title which she or her said husband had or held to said land or any part thereof was the title derived through a deed executed by Clarence Quarles, as commissioner in chancery of the circuit court of Phillips county, Ark., dated the 10th day of December, 1877, wherein and whereby he conveyed the whole of said several tracts of land to her said husband and herself. . . . And so she says that, for the reasons aforesaid, said mortgages or deeds of trust, executed as aforesaid by herself and husband, are no lien upon the said hereinbefore described lands." There was a demurrer to this paragraph of the answer, which was overruled by the court. Plaintiff electing to stand on her complaint and demurrer, the complaint was dismissed, and plaintiff appealed.

Mears, Rose, Hemingway, & Rose, and Tappan & Porter, for appellant:

Although it may be true that the mortgage by the wife could not operate during her husband's lifetime, so as to disturb his and her joint possession, yet on his death it became immediately operative under our statute.

Of course, on the death of the husband the entire estate vested in the wife.

Robinson v. Eagle, 29 Ark. 202; Kline v. Ragland, 47 Ark. 116; Noelley v. Lancaster, Id. 179, 58 Am. Rep. 752.

There is no doubt but that the husband may charge the estate by entireties, subject to divestiture if the wife should survive him.

Ames v. Norman, 4 Sneed, 693, 70 Am. Dec. 269.

But if the husband can do so, the wife, being now as free to convey as he is, can do the same thing.

Bodine v. Killeen, 53 N. Y. 98; Gibson v. Herriott, 55 Ark. 85.

The husband could not by any conveyance prejudice the right of the wife to the whole of the land in case she survived him.

Den, Wyckoff, v. Gardner, 20 N. J. L. 556, 45 Am. Dec. 888.

The wife owned the rest of the estate not vested in her husband; and that estate might be "conveyed by her the same as if she were a feme sole."

Ark. Const. 1874, art. 9, § 7; Roberts v. Wilcorson, 36 Ark. 356; Donahue v. Mills, 41 Ark. 421; Criscoe v. Hambright, 47 Ark. 235; Stone v. Stone, 43 Ark. 160; Manf. (Ark.) Dig. 642.

A limitation to a woman and her husband to be held by her as her own property, the husband to have the possession during his lifetime, and the possession to return to her if she survives him, gives the estate to him for life with remainder to her in fee. Edwards v. Beall, 75 Ind. 404.

A limitation to husband and wife and his heirs gives the entirety estate to both in fee if contained in a will. Jones v. Chandler, 40 Ind. 588 (1872).

But, in a deed, a similar limitation substituting "her" for "his" gives the estate by entirety to both spouses so long as both live, with remainder to the heirs of the wife. Davis v. Davis, 46 Pa. 842 (1863).

A limitation to husband and wife, one equal half to each with subsequent proviso, makes them tenants in common. Hicks v. Cochran, 4 Edw. Ch. 107 (1843).

A valid conditional limitation that the wife continue to live with the husband unless she has good cause for divorce may be included in a conveyance creating an estate by entireties. Smith v. Smith, 23 Wis. 176, 99 Am. Dec. 153 (1868).

A limitation of realty in Connecticut to a husband conditionally on his surviving his wife, and to the wife conditionally on her surviving him, was held to imply a limitation to both during the joint lifetime, and thus to produce the effect of an estate by entireties, which estate cannot be created in Connecticut. Bartholomew v. Muzzy, 61 Conn. 387 (1892).

See, further, supra, VII. c, citing Stoeblor v. Knerr, 5 Watts, 181 (1836), and V. A. "Rule in Shelley's Case."

c. Conveyance by entireties to spouses one of whom already has an estate in the land or other subject-matter.

The acceptance by a married woman of a conveyance to herself and husband of property already belonging to herself does not produce any effect, but she continues sole owner,—at least if it happened before the married women's act. Jackson, White, v. Cary, 16 Johns. 302 (1819).

Probably since this act the result would be the same, notwithstanding her contracting power, unless she had made a contract for value to the contrary. At least we shall see below that her acceptance, after her husband's death, of a conveyance to her of land of her own which her husband had conveyed to the person making the conveyance to her, does not alter her prior title. Infra, X. b, 1, citing Greeneley's Case, 8 Coke, 71b (1610).

So, an acceptance by one of the spouses of a conveyance to both, of land of which the former was already equitable owner, operates on the legal estate only, leaving the former spouse still sole beneficial owner. Moore v. Moore, 12 B. Mon. 668 (1851).

As regards a conveyance to the spouses of premises in which one of them already has a particular or terminable estate, see supra, V. b, Merger.

A conveyance of land in which one of the spouses already owns a share, made to both by the persons entitled to the other shares, and so made in order to carry out a partition of lands of which the premises formed part, does not operate as a conveyance but as a common-law partition, merely substituting a divided purparty for an undivided share, and consequently leaving the title undisturbed, and the estate (beneficially, and, it seems, legally also) still in the spouse, who before it solely owned a share. Stehman v. Huber, 21 Pa. 280 (1853); Harrison v. Ray, 108 N. C. 215, 11 L. R. A. 722 (1891); Dooley v. Baynes, 86 Va. 644 (1890); Yancey v. Radford, 86 Va. 638 (1890).

Even though the conveyance does not purport to be a partition deed, this fact being proved by oral evidence. Dooley v. Baynes, supra.

But the ground of decision in Yancey v. Radford, supra, was that the partition took effect by force of the oral agreement of the parties and consequent actual division, there being no statute to render a deed necessary; and that the deed, when executed, could not divest the estates from the allottees. See Yancey v. Radford, 86 Va. 642 (1890); and see p. 649, where the new Code of Virginia is referred to.

And in Harrison v. Ray, 108 N. C. 217, 11 L. R. A.

This statute applies to mortgages as well as to deeds absolute.

Kline v. Ragland, 47 Ark. 112; Brown v. Roquin, 57 Ark. 107; Jefferson v. Edrington, 53 Ark. 565.

The after-acquired title does not pass by way of estoppel, but simply by force of the statute, which operates precisely as does the statute of uses.

2 Washb. Real Prop. p. 405, *111; 8 Washb. Real Prop. *473.

The statute is with us a rule of property, not dependent in any manner upon covenants. As the statute makes no exceptions, the court can make none.

Erwin v. Turner, 6 Ark. 14; Branch of State Bank v. Morris, 13 Iowa, 186; Pryor v. Ryburn, 16 Ark. 671; Smith v. Macon, 20 Ark. 18.

It comprehends and supersedes the former doctrine of estoppel.

Crittenden v. Johnson, 14 Ark. 468.

Messrs. John J. Horner and E. C. Horner, for appellee:

If an estate in fee be given to a man and his wife, they are neither properly joint tenants nor tenants in common, for husband and wife being considered one person in law, they cannot take the estate by moieties, but both are seized of the entirety. The consequence of which is, then, neither husband nor wife can dispose of any part without the consent of the other, but the whole must remain to the survivor.

2 Bl. Com. 182.

Neither the provisions respecting joint tenancies (Rev. Stat. chap. 31, § 9), nor (Const. 1868, art. 12, § 6), respecting the separate estate of married women, destroyed the common-law estate by entireties.

Robinson v. Eagle, 29 Ark. 202.

The separate estate of a married woman is that alone of which she has the exclusive control, independent of her husband, and the proceeds of which she may dispose of as she pleases.

And the acceptance and registration of the deed by the spouse, who had been entitled to the undivided share (who was in this instance the husband), does not estop him from claiming the sole ownership. Harrison v. Ray, and Yancey v. Radford, supra.

But the opposite decision was made in Wright v. Saddler, 20 N. Y. 322, 323 (1859), and in Babbitt v. Soroggin, 1 Duv. 272 (1864), the deeds being there treated as mutual conveyances.

So, a mortgage to both spouses, of land which had belonged to the wife but had been sold and conveyed to the purchaser, made by him to secure the purchase money, passes to them as trustees for the wife only. Trimble v. Reis, 37 Pa. 448 (1860).

The husband's sanction of his wife's concurrence with him in a conveyance of a grant of a particular estate in his property does not make her tenant by entireties with him in the reversion (which was not reserved to any one in particular), especially if she concurred merely to release her dower. Strawn v. Strawn, 50 Ill. 33 (1869). See also supra, V b, Merger.

d. Invalidity, on other grounds, of a limitation.

A wife may disagree to a limitation to herself and husband by entireties. Green, Crew, v. King, 2 W. Bl. 1211 (1778) (dictum); Purefoy v. Rogers, 2 Saund. 866, 867 (1870) (dictum).

But if it be for her advantage her assent is presumed. Green, Crew, v. King, supra.

A conveyance by which an entirety estate would otherwise be created, but which is voidable or subject to encumbrance as against one of the spouses, is equally so against the other. Manwaring v. Powell, 40 Mich. 371 (1879).

IX. The share taken by husband and wife under a limitation to them and another or others.

A limitation to husband and wife in common with another or others is construed as meant to give them together no larger share; and a limitation to them jointly with another or others is construed as meant to give them together no greater interest than each of the other persons obtains, unless the contrary be expressed. Litt. 291; Co. Litt. 136, 137; *Bricker v. And though the will directed that the property should be divided between the husband and wife and the others in equal parts. Jupp v. Buckwell, supra.

And though the will was made after the married women's acts. Ibid., overruling Re March, L. R. 24 Ch. Div. 222, 52 L. J. Ch. 680, 49 L. T. N. S. 163, 31 Week. Rep. 885 (1888).

And the rule does not apply to a will made under Roman-Dutch law. Dias v. DeLivera, 5 App. Cas. 135, 49 L. J. P. C. 23, 42 L. T. N. S. 237 (1897).

The statutes for the protection of the property of married women were not designed to embrace estates which the feme covert takes and holds jointly with her husband, but those which she takes and holds (to the extent defined) as if she had no husband. The marital rights remain as they were at common law, unaffected by the statutes formed for the protection of the separate property.

wife being of the same relationship to the testatrix, was held to give to each of them a share. Warrington v. Warrington, 2 Hare, 56, 6 Jur. 372 (1842).

And the rule was denied application on a gift to seven persons named, two of whom were the wives of two of the others, the conjunction "and" appearing before the last name only. Re Dixon, L. R. 42 Ch. Div. 306 (1899).

Much stress is laid in several of the English cases on the use of "and" as a subcopula between the names of husband and wife as indicating an intent to treat them as one person. So in Bricker v. Whitley, and Re Wyld's Estate, supra.

And does not apply on a devolution of an intestate's estate. Knapp v. Windsor, 6 Cush. 157-161 (1850).

And a limitation of different interests to each is said (says Co. Litt. 187b) to give the husband and wife separate shares, each equal to that of the other party; as, a limitation to the other party for life, the husband in tail, and the wife for years.

The above rule may have been founded on the feeling that each family should take equally; for example, a man having two sons, one already married and the other not unlikely to marry, might limit an estate to the former and his wife and the latter, and yet might intend each son to take equally. The reason generally given for it, namely, the unity of person, can hardly be maintained since Jupp v. Buckwell, supra, in which the ground of decision was that the married women's act was not intended to give the spouses greater rights against third persons than they had before.

X. Disposition or encumbrance of entirety property. a. By both spouses concurring.

The spouses concurring can convey the entire estate or any interest derived under it.

And a conveyance by way of mortgage is no exception to the rule. People's Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Billing (Mich.) 62 N. W. Rep. 373 (1895); McDuff v. Beauchamp, 50 Miss. 531 (1874).

Robinson v. Eagle, 29 Ark. 202; Stillwell v. Adams, Id. 346; Wood v. Terry, 30 Ark. 385; Jefferson v. Edrington, 53 Ark. 545.

A contract on the part of the husband to sell the wife's land, though known and assented to by her, is not binding upon her or her heirs. She can only bind herself by executing a deed in the form prescribed by law.

Rogers v. Brooks, 30 Ark. 628.

No estoppel can accrue against a married woman in regard to lands not held as her separate estate.

Wood v. Terry, supra.

The legislature of Michigan, by the act of 1855, enacted that a married woman might convey her estate "in like manner and with like effect" as if she was unmarried. Our statutes deal only with the separate estates of married women, yet in Michigan an estate of entirety could not be conveyed by the deed of the wife in which her husband did not join.

Naylor v. Minoock, 96 Mich. 182.

Riddick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The lands upon which appellant claims a lien were held by Lucius E. Polk and his wife, Sallie M. Polk, under a joint conveyance executed to them by Clarence Quarles, commissioner. This joint conveyance to husband and wife vested in them an estate in entirety. Robinson v. Eagle, 29 Ark. 202;

But a mortgage of entirety property for a purpose which by statute is not binding on the wife is invalid against her,—as (in some states), for the purpose of securing a debt due by the husband. Wilson v. Logue, 131 Ind. 191 (1891); Dodge v. Kinzy, 101 Ind. 102 (1884); Bartholomew v. Pierson, 112 Ind. 430 (1887); State v. Kennett, 114 Ind. 160 (1887).

Therefore, in those states in which one spouse alone cannot convey any interest in entirety property (as in Indiana and Michigan), it is void as to the husband also. Dodge v. Kinzy, supra.

But it has been held in Indiana that such a mortgage, though voidable by the wife, is valid against those deriving title under her. Crooks v. Kennett, 111 Ind. 347 (1887); Bennett v. Mattingly, 110 Ind. 197 (1886).

Even though the conveyance by her was expressly made free from the mortgage. Crooks v. Kennett, supra.

This seems contrary to the cardinal principles of law, for in every other case those who derive under any person take free from whatever he himself was free from. See also the Indiana case cited infra, X. b. 2.

And, in accordance with this clear principle, one who derives title under a wife to land of hers which her husband had made a void conveyance of, was held entitled against his alienee, in Jenney v. Gray, 5 Ohio St. 49 (1855).

A wife who acquiesces in her husband's purchase of material to rebuild a barn on the premises is estopped to deny the right to a mechanics' lien therefor. Wilson v. Logue, supra.

A prohibition against the wife becoming surety for her husband's debt does not extend to a mortgage made to raise money for the purpose of benefiting the common property, or for that of securing a debt due by the wife, nor, therefore, are such mortgages invalidated thereby. McLead v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 107 Ind. 394 (1886); Fawcner v. Scottish American Mortg. Co. 107 Ind. 555 (1886); Bartholomew v. Pierson, 112 Ind. 430 (1887).

Kline v. Ragland, 47 Ark. 116; Den, Hardenbergh, v. Hardenbergh, 10 N. J. L. 49, 18 Am. Dec. 877; Bertles v. Nunan, 93 N. Y. 152, 44 Am. Rep. 361. After receiving this conveyance, each of the grantees gave to Mary P. Branch a mortgage on an undivided half interest in said land to secure notes executed to her by Lucius E. Polk. These mortgages were executed at different places and at different times. The one by Lucius E. Polk was executed on the 4th day of April, 1892, and his wife executed one on the 81st day of May, 1892. Neither of them joined in the mortgage executed by the other. Now, the right of survivorship is a distinction characteristic of an estate of entirety, and neither of the tenants holding by the entireties can by a separate deed affect the right of survivorship existing in the other. Ames v. Norman, 4 Sneed, 688, 70 Am. Dec. 269; Den, Hardenbergh, v. Hardenbergh, 10 N. J. L. 49, 18 Am. Dec. 871, and note; 8 Kerr, Real Prop. § 1975. In order to convey land held in entirety, the husband and wife must convey by a joint deed, or the deeds, if separate, must purport to convey the entire estate. Neither of the mortgages set up by the appellant purports to convey more than an undivided half interest in the land. It is contended by appellant that these two mortgages, being executed for the same purpose, must be taken and construed as one deed.

If this be conceded as correct, it would not strengthen the position of appellant, for it would still be a deed conveying an undivided half interest only. When persons owning lands as tenants in common each convey an undivided half interest therein, they have conveyed the title to the whole, for neither of them held more than an undivided half interest, and the deed of each conveys his entire interest; but the entire estate is vested in each of the tenants by the entireties, for they hold, not by moieties, but by entireties, and a conveyance of an undivided half interest by one tenant does not purport to convey his whole interest. The deed of the husband can have no effect after his death. When that happened, Mrs. Polk became the sole owner, his interest passing to her by right of survivorship. If appellant has any lien upon Mrs. Polk's land, it must be by force of her own deed, for she did not join in the deed of her husband, and is not affected by it. As the mortgage executed by Mrs. Polk only purported to convey an undivided half interest in the land, we think it clear that in no event can appellant claim a lien beyond this undivided half interest.

But the most serious question for us to determine is whether Mrs. Polk, during coverture, had the power by a separate deed to mortgage her interest in the lands held by herself and husband as tenants of the entirety.

the entirety property for the purpose of releasing a supposed right to dower does not pass the entirety estate as against her. Wales v. Coffin, 13 Allen, 213 (1866); Pierce v. Chace, 108 Mass. 254 (1871).

The execution by the wife of a deed purporting to convey the entirety estate without the insertion of her name as grantor does not appear to be sufficient to pass the estate as against her. Stone v. Sledge, 87 Tex. 49 (1894), citing cases to show that a similar rule prevails as to naming the grantor in conveyances generally.

A contract by the wife with a person that he should receive benefits out of the entirety property did not bind her before the married women's acts, even though she had accepted benefits under it. Pierce v. Chace, supra.

A misdescription of the premises in a conveyance by both spouses, originating in mistake, rendered the conveyance voidable and irreformable against the wife before the married women's acts, although she could only recover possession by refunding the purchase money or other consideration. Shroyer v. Nickell, 55 Mo. 264 (1874).

The husband and wife can reserve a rent to themselves by entireties out of the entirety land when conveying it. Robb v. Beaver, 8 Watts & S. 107 (1844).

A purchaser for value from the husband and wife of an estate which had been conveyed to them by entireties, having obtained from them the legal estate without notice that that estate had been purchased by them with the wife's money, and that they had intended to have it conveyed to her, is, of course, not affected by any equity which she may consequently have had. McDuff v. Beauchamp, 50 Miss. 537 (1874).

A married woman is liable at common law on a covenant of warranty given by her on a conveyance or demise of property by her. Wootton v. Hele, 1 Mod. 290 (1670).

b. By one of the spouses alone.

1. Neither can derogate from the survivorship right of the other.

Neither spouse can deal with an entirety estate in derogation of the other's right by survivorship, nor have disposes of the spouse who dies first any right against the survivor. Varnum v. Abbot, 13 Mass. 478, 7 Am. Dec. 87 (1815); Back v. Andrew, 2 Vern. 120 (1690); Doe, Freestone, v. Parratt, 5 T. R. 652 (1794); Fox v. Fletcher, 8 Mass. 274 (1811); *Den, Wyckoff, v. Whether the disposition be testamentary. Martin v. Jackson, and Varnum v. Abbot, supra.

Or by sale on execution for debt of husband. Brownson v. Hull, 16 Vt. 309, 42 Am. Dec. 517 (1844).

Or otherwise. Hawtry's Case, and Bullock v. Dibley, supra.

Even though the statute authorizing them to partition the entirety estate be in force at the time of the disposition. Zornstein v. Bram, 100 N. Y. 12 (1885), reversing 17 Jones & S. 476 (1882).

Especially if the entirety estate was vested before the passing of that act; which circumstance, however, was not deemed essential. Zornstein v. Bram, supra.

Consequently, the husband cannot bind the wife as regards the boundaries of the entirety land either by agreement or conveyance. Dyer v. Eldridge, 136 Ind. 654 (1894); Atkinson v. Henry, supra.

And, of course, the husband cannot take away the wife's land by fraudulently obtaining a decree of a court of justice for a conveyance to himself. Orthwein v. Thomas, 127 Ill. 554, 4 L. R. A. 434 (1899).

Nor does a decree made on a motion on which the husband was not represented and directing a con-

Whether a wife may in this state convey an interest held by her as such a tenant, as she may her interest in other real property, has not been determined by this court. The question decided in Robinson v. Eagle, supra, was that estates of entirety were not abolished by the Constitution of 1868. This ruling was approved in Kline v. Ragland, 47 Ark. 116. In neither of those cases was any question concerning the power of the wife to convey her interest in such an estate by a separate deed considered by the court. At common law the husband had, during marriage, the exclusive control of such estate. Fairchild v. Chastelleux, 1 Pa. 176, 44 Am. Dec. 117; Barber v. Harris, 15 Wend. 615; French v. Mahan, 56 Pa. 287. But the authority of the husband to dispose of the rents and profits of land held in entirety did not arise from any peculiarity of this estate, or from any special powers conferred upon him as a tenant of the entirety, but arose out of the rule at common law that, during coverture, the husband had the control of the real estate of the wife. 3 Kent, Com. 130; Hiles v. Fisher, 144 N. Y. 806, ante, 806. Hence we find that, in many of the states, where the wife has been clothed with the power to manage, control, and use her separate property, "the courts, following the logic of the situation, have extended this right to estates by entirety to the extent of denying the right of the husband or his creditors to deprive her of the use and enjoyment of her interest in such an estate during the life of her husband." 1 Ballard, Annals on Real Prop. § 241; Hiles v. Fisher, supra; Buttler v. Rosenblath, 42 N. J. Eq. 651, 59 Am. Rep. 53; McCurdy v. Canning, 64 Pa. 41; Chandler v. Cheney, 37 Ind. 891; Shinn v. Shinn, 42 Kan. 1, 4 L. R. A. 224. In this state a married woman has full control of her separate property, and may convey and dispose of it as if she were a feme sole. Our Constitution and statute have excluded the marital rights of the husband therefrom during the life of the wife. Const. 1874, art. 9, § 7; Sand. & H. Dig. § 4945; Neelly v. Lancaster, 47 Ark. 175, 58 Am. Rep. 752; Roberts v. Wilcoxson, 86 Ark. 355. We think that the effect of these provisions was to give the wife control of all the property owned by her, including her interest in an estate by entirety as well as other real estate. To say that it did not apply to an estate by entirety would be to deprive her of a share in the rents and profits of such an estate during the life of her husband, and would establish an exception to the operation of the Constitution and statute resting on no valid principle or reason. Hiles v. Fisher, supra. On the other hand, to say that neither she nor her husband could convey any interest in such an estate except by a joint deed would tie up the estate and preveyance to the wife, bind the husband's rights. Freeman v. Barber, 8 Thomp. & C. 574 (1874).

A lease to husband and wife was held extinguished by his acceptance of a feoffment, but it was said that it would be otherwise if the conveyance had been by bargain and sale enrolled, or by fine. Downing v. Seymour, 3 Cro. Eliz. 812 (1603).

Where husband and wife were joint tenants during coverture for sixty years his lease for seventy years was held good against the wife after his death. Grute v. Loocroft, 1 Cro. Eliz. 287 (1591).

The leasing power conferred on the husband by the statute, 22 Hen. VIII., chap. 28, extends by its express words to estates which husbands hold jointly (which word then included entireties) with their wives.

A patent for a walk in a chase taken by the purchaser in the names of himself, his wife, and a third person was held on his death not to be subject to his debts while the others lived. Kingdon v. Bridges, 2 Vern. 67 (1688).

The husband of a minor wife has the powers of a guardian over her estate during her minority. Bartlett v. Cowles, 15 Gray, 445 (1860).

And, presumably, this extends to an entirety estate.

Such powers enable him to sell trees growing on her land for an adequate price unless the cutting be injurious to the inheritance. Bartlett v. Cowles, supra.

The wife's acceptance of an estate of freehold after her husband's death in land of her own, which her husband has wrongfully conveyed to the person who afterwards conveys to her, did not estop her from setting up her own title; but, on the contrary, she was remitted thereto. Greneley's Case, 8 Coke, 716 (1610); Beaumont's Case, 9 Coke, 140 (1613), citing 12 Hen. IV., and Formedon, 15, 21 Edw. III. 845.

And no doubt the same rule would apply to an entirety estate. But it must be remembered that there is no remitter when the later conveyance operates by the statute of uses. Co. Litt. 342b.

Silence of the wife when the husband represents a poor title to be good does not estop her to claim 30 L. R. A.

her rights under the entirety estate. Phillips v. Hodges, 109 N. C. 248 (1891).

The wife's power to contract relative to separate estate does not extend to entirety estate. Speler v. Opfer, 78 Mich. 35, 2 L. R. A. 345 (1888).

The theory of the law, unless the married women's acts have made a difference, seems to be that the conveyance by the husband passes the estate, and that it remains in the donee unless and until disaffirmed by the wife or those deriving under her, which must, before those acts, have been after his death; in other words, it is voidable, not void.

Thus, in North Carolina a conveyance by the husband of the wife's land which he was by statute disabled from making was nevertheless held to be valid until she disagreed. Jones v. Carter, 73 N. C. 148 (1875); Stroebe v. Fehl, 22 Wis. 347 (1867) (dictum).

And consequently the husband's donee was held not to be a trespasser, and therefore not liable to pay damages to the wife for his occupation prior to her demand for possession. Jones v. Carter, supra.

The same rule seems applicable to entirety estates, and the cases cited below respecting the husband's disposition at common law for the period of the joint lifetime confirm this view.

But in Kip v. Kip, 33 N. J. Eq. 213 (1880), it was held that the wife could not claim a share of the purchase money obtained on a sale by the husband which was invalid as against her, but was restricted to her remedy by holding or claiming the possession.

The husband can convey the entirety estate to any person upon trust or condition to convey it to the wife, and a conveyance by the latter to the wife vests the estate in her solely. Donahue v. Hubbard, 154 Mass. 587, 14 L. R. A. 123 (1891).

vent either of them from controlling or disposing of his or her interest without the consent of the other. It would also result in placing it beyond the reach of the creditors of either of them, and such is the rule followed in several of the states. McCurdy v. Canning, 64 Pa. 39; Chandler v. Cheney, 37 Ind. 391; Naylor v. Minock, 96 Mich. 182, 35 Am. St. Rep. 595, note.

But it would seem that this rule is to a certain extent illogical, for under it the effect of the statutes giving married women control of their own property is also, in this instance, to curtail the power of the husband over his own interest in real estate. The object of these laws was not to affect in any way the control of the husband over his own property. Their sole purpose was to give to the wife—what she did not have at common law—the right to control and convey her own property as if she were unmarried. Bertles v. Nunan, 92 N. Y. 152, 44 Am. Rep. 361. While such legislation has taken away the control of the husband over the interest of the wife in estates of entireties, as it has removed his control from her other property, yet it does not seem reasonable to hold that it also affected his right to control his own interest in such an estate, or that it exempted such interest from seizure by his creditors. As was said in Buttler v. Rosenblath, supra: "Any device of this character for the protection of the husband's property from his creditors is unknown to the common law, and so contrary to public policy that it ought not to be engrafted upon our system of laws by the interpretation of this statute, unless the intent to do so is clearly expressed." The rational construction of these provisions of our Constitution and statute, which "uprooted principles of the common law hoary with age," swept away the marital rights of the husband during the life of the wife and gave enlarged powers to married women, is, not that they lessen the power of the husband over his own interest in an estate by entirety, but that they deprive him of the control over the interest of the wife which he formerly exercised jure uxoris, and confer upon the wife the control of her own interest. The right of the wife to control and convey her interest, we think, is now equal to the right of the husband over his interest. They each are entitled to one half of the rents and profits during coverture, with power to each to dispose of or to charge his or her interest, subject to the right of survivorship existing in the other. Hiles v. Fisher, 144 N. Y. 306, ante, 305; Buttler v. Rosenblath, 42 N. J. Eq. 651, 59 Am. Rep. 52. This rule, as was said by Chief Justice Andrews, in the recent case of Hiles v. Fisher, "best reconciles the difficulties surrounding the subject. The estate granted is not thereby changed. It leaves it untouched, with
